S^r. Rich. Saint George Norrey King at Armes, in fauour of this worke.

IT is farre from my purpoſe, to comend without cauſe, or by ouercurious floriſh to make a ſhadow ſeeme a ſubſtance, this worke needs no ſuch deceptio viſus; The ſubiect is of it ſelfe honorable, and able to ſtand without ſuch weake proppes. The glory of our Nation being almoſt buried in the pit of obſcurity, is herein reuiued, the continuance of Chriſtianity traced from age to age, the antiquity and ſituation of our Townes, Caſtles, Religious Houſes, Nobility, and all other memorable matters ſo liuely portraied, as in a glaſſe wee may rightly diſcerne the true ſhape, quality and condition of each of them in particular. This worke therefore being now brought vpon the publike ſtage and view of the world, may in my poore cenſure giue ſatisfaction to the learned Reader, and abide the touch of the malignant opposer; which being effected without hope of gaine, or vaine ostentation with so great care, both of body and mind, is the more precious, for, difficilia quæ pulchra. Wherein Gods power is made knowne in this his weake, but worthy instrument: and the glory of Great Britaine made more famous to the world, as well in the Geographicall demension of the Lands situation, as in the Historicall relations of her most famous Monarchs, and glorious Actions; no Kingdome hitherto so particularly described, nor Nations History by true record more faithfully penned: In honor whereof, I sacrifice these lines of my loue, vpon the Altar of this worke, and celebrate the Authors remembrance to future posterities.

To my friend Mr. IOHN SPEED, being very sicke.

GReat loue, and little skill may cause me to missay.
But certainly this sicknes cannot make thee die:
Though cruell symptomes, and these thirteene yeers assay
For thy deare country, doth thy health & strength decay;
Yet sith thy toylsome labour, and thy industry
Is for thy Countries sake, her fame on hie to raise:
Shee shall thy temples crowne with euerlasting bayes,
And in despite of death, shall cause thy memory
To liue in endles fame with all posterity.

Now may shee see her beauty, and her riches store,
What erst shee was in eu'ry age, and change of state,
And present greatnes such as neuer heretofore,
Since this great Monarch rul'd from north to southerne shore
And sith thy life is to thy Country dedicate,
Let none presume thy lawrell from thy head to reaue
For this hir story, which thy skilfull hand did weaue:
But liue, & weare it (Speed) vntil the worlds great fate
Shall bring all earthly things vnto their vtmost date.

To the right well deseruing Mr. IOHN SPEED the Author of this Worke.

IN this BOOKE, (Bibliothec, or Booke of Bookes; TIMES Library, PLACES Geographie)
All that is shewne for which the curious lookes
Touching this LAND, for place, or Historie,

In which thou hast with paine, with care, and skill,
Surueid this Land more neere then ere it was:
For which, they Wit thou strain'd hast to thy Will,
That wils as much as Witte can bring to passe.

The faire Hibernia that westerne Isle likewise,
In euery Member, Artire, Nerue, and Veine,
Thou by thine Art dost so Anatomize,
That all may see each parcell without * paine.

Heere Time, and Place, like friendly foes doe warre
Which should shew most desir'd Particulars;
But Place giues place, sith Time is greater farre;
Yet Place, well rang'd, gets glory by these warres.

No helpes thou hadst, nor no assisting aide,
In this attempt: but, Vertue gaue thee might
That well to doe, that well thou hast assaide
Which shall (in grace) out-liue immortall spight.

Hadst thou among the Romans liu'd when they Did signiorize the World; A Signiory
Should then (at least) haue guerdon'd thy Suruey,
Thy Mappes, Desciptions, and thine Historie.

But, thou thou dost liue when all Arts saue the * eight (Illiberall-liberall Arte) a begging goe;
That Arte alone, with her true friend Deceipt,
Gets all; then all seekes but that Arte to know.

But, by thy Arte though nought be purchased
But emptie Fame (that feeds, but fattens not)
Yet shall it feed thy NAME till DEATH be dead;
While empty noble Names away shall rot.

The Leaues this Book contains, and Maps here grau'n,
Are still as Feathers to thy Fames faire Wings,
To fanne fresh Aire vpon the face of Heauen;
And, raise the same aboue all ending Things:
That when Confusion wracks this double FRAME,
A Spirit shall moue on CHAOS Call'd thy Fame.

The vnfained louer of thy person,

THE PROEME.

TO THE LEARNED AND LOVERS OF GREAT BRITAINES GLORY.

HAuing thus farre trauelled in the portrait and deſcription of this famous Empire of GREAT BRITAINE, I might here haue reſted, and claimed the priuiledge that yeeres and imbecillity haue brought me vnto: had not a further deſire in others vrged it a matter incident, hiſtorically to lay down the originals of thoſe Nations, and ſucceſſions of thoſe Monarchs, which either by birth or conqueſt haue aſpired to the Imperiall Crowne. And albeit I finde my ſelfe both tired in the former; and moſt vnfit to proſecute this latter, yet will I endeauour to giue herein my beſt aſſayes; though as my labours, ſo my wants alſo, thereby will be made more vulgar to the world.

For if thoſe men were blame-worthy againſt whom Heraclite exclaimeth, who with long toile and great trouble finde a little pure ſubſtance in a great deale of baſe earth: how ſhall I then free me from the like imputation, that from ſo many mines of pure metals, haue gotten ſo little Oare, and the ſame neither well tried in my defectiue fornace, nor yet artificially caſt off through the default of the mould; wanting both skill for to faſhion, and meaſure to performe the true proportions that in ſuch a proiect is to be required; and how often theſe my defects haue diſſwaded my proceedings, is beſt knowne to him that is the ſearcher of the heart. Heraclite.

But by what fate I am inforced ſtill to goe forward, I know not, vnleſſe it bee the ardent affection and loue to my natiue Country; wherein I muſt confeſſe that Nature in thoſe gifts hath beene both liberall, yea and prodigall, though Fortune as ſparing and faſt handed againſt me, euer checking the Bit with the Raines of neceſsity, and curbing the meanes that ſhould illuſtrate my labours: which moues me oft times to thinke, that if the great Philoſopher Theophraſtus, had cauſe on his death-bed to accuſe Nature, for giuing man ſo long a leſſon, and ſo ſhort a life; then I againſt Fortune may as iuſtly exclaime, that hath aſsigned me ſo great a ſubiect and ſo little meanes. And therefore let it not ſeeme offenſiue that I draw my waters from the Ceſterns of others, who am not able to fetch them at the ſpring-head my ſelf: Neither that I ſtrike vpon the ſame Anuile vnto their ſound, though nothing ſo loud, nor with the like ſtrength; wherin yet this fruit at leaſt will (I hope) redound of my endeuours that I ſhal incite the more learned: if not otherwiſe, yet in emulatiõ of me, to free the face drawn by Apelles, from the cenſure of the fault or defect in the foot, and not onely to amend, but euen to new-mould the whole. Which thing though my dayes are neer ſpent; and with Barzillai I may ſay that muſicke to me is now vnpleaſing: yet doth my care thirſt after the ſet of that ſtrain, as Socrates thoughts ran euer on his Booke: who the night before he was to ſuffer death, was deſirous to learne muſicke, becauſe he would die, learning ſtill ſomething. Moſes the firſt Gouernor of that Common-wealth, which whiles it ſtood, was the glory of the earth, and a paterne to all kingdomes Theophraſtus. 2 Sam. 19. 35. Socrates. Deut. 11. 19. 20.

succeeding, left this for a Law to remaine for euer, That the Fathers should teach their children; and should commit vnto writing those things which the Lord in their dayes had done; and enioyned the children likewise to Enquire of the times that were past, euen from the first creation of man: For when as Empires and Kingdomes, Common-weales and Cities, do end and perish, yet the Histories thereof do remaine and liue; And that made Cicero to say as he did, That Salamina should be vterly forgotten, before the things that were done in Salamina should perish: And therefore as among the wise answers of Thales, the Histories of Countries are to bee accounted for principals, either as Cicero calleth them the Mistris of life, and expositions of Times; so likewise let vs from the lyricall Poet Simonides learne this further, That he is perfectly happy which knowes his natiue country, to be truly glorious. And as Cassidore calles him a worthy Citizen, that seeketh the commodity of his country: So contrariwise he is by Bale esteemed but a fruitles clod of earth, that sucks the sappe of his soile only to himselfe, whose memoriall shall perish as the dispersed smoake in the clouds, though for a time hee mount aloft in his swelling pride. This naturall loue and true affection to our natiue Country we may further learne from the ancient Patriarks and Fathers themselues; who besides a desire that they had to theirs, continually to liue therein during life, commanded their bodies to be buried therein after death: from whose Bowels they first had assumed their breaths, and in whose bosome they layd their bones, as in their last bed of rest. Yea, of the vnreasonable creatures, the Birds and Beasts, wee may learne this loue, that alwayes are willing towards their home. And if it happen that Countries grow vnkinde as Homers did, that in his old age and blind, suffered him to beg his bread; or that a Prophet in his owne country is not esteemed, as Jeremy felt it, and CHRIST IESVS taught, yet did the one for his peoples captiuity, wish his eyes a fountaine of teares, and the other for his countreys destruction lamented and wept, holding it vnlawfull to take the childrens bread, and to giue it vnto others.

That this our Country and subiect of History deserueth the loue of her inhabitants, is witnessed euen by forraine Writers themselues, who haue termed it the Court of Queene Ceres, the Granary of the VVesterne world, the fortunate Jsland, the Paradise of pleasure and Garden of God; whose Tipographicall descriptions for the whole Jland, and Geographicall surueyes for the seuerall parts, exceed any other Kingdome vnder the cope of Heauen; that onely excepted which was conquered and diuided by Josuah; And for fruitfulnesse and temperature may be accounted another Canaan; watered with Riuers that do cleaue the earth, as the Prophet speaketh, and maketh the land as rich and beautiful, as was that of Ægypt. Our Kings for valour and Sanctity, ranked with the worthiest in the world, and our Nations original, conquests, and continuance, tried by the touch of the best humane testimonies, leaue as faire a Lustre vpon the same stone, as doth any other, and with any Nation may easily contend (saith Lanquet) both for antiquity and continuall inhabitants, from the first time that any of them can claime their Originals.

And although our many Records are perished by the inuasions of strangers, through their couetous Conquest of so faire a Land, or in the ciuill dissensions of home-bred aspirers that haue sought the possession of so rich a Crowne, yet Truth hath left vs no lesse beholding vnto her, then mightier Nations, and them that would be farre more famous. Neither is it to bee wondred at, that the Records of GREAT BRITAINE are eaten vp with Times teeth, as Ouid speakes, when as in Times ruines lye buried their Registers, that haue beene kept with a stronger guard, as Titus Liuy in the entrance of his History affirmeth of the Romanes. As for those things (saith hee) as are reported either before or at the foundation of the City, more beautified and set out with Poets fables, then grounded vpon pure and faithfull reports, I meane neither to auerre nor disproue. Of whose vncertainties, let vs a while heare the reporters themselues speake, before we proceed to the certaine successions of our British Monarchs: vntill which time the credit of our History may well be said to waigh with (if not down peize) many others. Varro (that learned Romane writer, who liued an hundred yeeres before the birth of our Sauiour Christ)

calleth the first world to the Flood vncertaine; and thence to the first Olympias fabulous: Because in that time (saith he) there is nothing related (for the most part) but Fables among the Greekes, Latines, and other learned Nations. And therefore Plutarch beginneth the liues of his worthy men no higher then Theseus: because (saith he) what hath been written before, was but of strange things, and sayings full of monstrous fables imagined and deuised by Poets, which were altogether vncertaine and most vntrue. And Diodorus Siculus (that liued in Augustus Cæsars time, a great searcher after Antiquities, and for thirty yeers continuance a traueller into many Countries, for information and further satisfaction) writing his History called Bibliotheca, containing forty Bookes, and yeeres of continuance one thousand, one hundred thirty and eight, of his first sixe himselfe giueth this censure in his Proeme. These Bookes (saith he) containing the Acts of ancient men, before the destruction of Troy, with the ancient Histories aswell of Grecians as Barbarians, are called fabulous: Which mooued Lucretius the Poet to demand this question:

Cur supra bellum Thebanum & funera Troia,
Non alias quondam veteres cecinere Poetæ?

Why haue not Poets in their workes of fained stories brought,
Things done before the Warres of Thebes, or Troyes destruction wrought?

Yea and of Troyes story it selfe, if wee may beleeue Thucydides (whom Bodine commendeth for an absolute Historian) though it be ancient (saith hee) yet a great part thereof is fabulous. And Tully out of Plato complaineth of as much: For you Grecians (saith he) as children in learning, deliuer onely things vncertaine, and haue mingled fables with the VVarres of Thebes, and of Troy, things (perhaps) which neuer were, but gathered out of the scattered Verses of Homer and others, not digested by Aristarchus, and are yet vncertaine and obscure. And that the Greekes indeed were but babes in Antiquity, Josephus in his Nations defence against Appion, sufficiently doth approue, where hee affirmeth, That inuention of their Letters was not so old as the siege of Troy, insomuch that the Poesie of Homer (then the which there is none more ancient among them) was not committed to writing, but sung by roate. And the Latine tongue it selfe by M. Cato is said, not to haue been in vse foure hundred and fifty yeeres before the building of Rome. And Titus Liuy their famous Historian, freely confesseth, That the vse of Letters and learning among the Romanes, was very rare and hard to be found before the taking of Rome by the Gaules. Yea, and of the vncertainty of Romes foundation, how lauishly soeuer Historians haue written, not only Fenestella hath continued whole Pages, but Plutarch likewise in the life of Romulus, hath many sayings, wherof this is one; The Historiographers (saith he) do not agree in their writings, by whom, nor for what cause the great name of Rome (the glory whereof is blown abroad through the world) was first giuen vnto it; some affirming, that the Pelasgiues after they had runne ouer a great part of the world, lastly stayed themselues in that place where Rome was new built, and for their great strength in Armes, gaue name to that City Rome, which signifieth power in the Greek tongue. Other say, that certain Troyans after their siege, in certain vessels saued themselues by flight, and being put into the Thuscan Sea, anchored neer to the Riuer Tyber: whose wiues being extreamely Sea-sick, through the counsell of Rama a Lady, the wisest & worthiest among them, set fire on the whole Fleet; whereupon their husbands (though sore offended) were inforced to make vse of their present necessity, and neer vnto Palantium planted this City, whose Fame presently grew great, & in honour of Lady Roma named it Rome: and from hence they say the custome of * kissing in salutations came; after the example of these wiues who to appease their husbands wraths with smiles & imbracings kissed their mouthes. Some will haue the name Rome from Roma the daughter of Italus and of Lucaria, or elsof Telephus the son of Hercules, & of the wife of Æneas. Others of Ascanius the son of Æneas. THE FIFTH BOOKE.

CHAPTER I.

BESIDES those fruitfull Ilands that dispersedly are scattered about the Mayn, like to beautiful pearls that incompasse a Diademe, the Ile of GREAT BRITAINE doth raise it selfe first to our sight, as the Bodie of that most famous & mighty Empire, whereof many other Kingdomes and Countries are parcels and members. Being by the Almighty so set in the maine Ocean, as that shee is thereby the High Admirall of the Seas; and in the terrestriall Globe so seated, as that she is worthily reputed both The Garden of pleasure, and The Storehouse of Profit, opening her Hauens euery way, fit to receiue all forraine traffick, and to vtter her owne into all other parts: and therefore (as the Soueraigne Lady and Empresse of the rest) deserues our description in the first place.

BRITAINE Admirall of the Seas.

(2) This Iland is so spacious and ample, that Cesar (the first Romane discouerer thereof) supposed that he had found out another World: for to his seeming it appeard, that the Ocean was rather contained within that Mayne, then that Mayne, to be compassed with the Ocean about. And Iulius Solinus, for her circuit and largenesse, saith that it deserueth the name of Another World. But Aristides a Greeke Author speakes much more properly, who by way of excellency termeth BRITAINE, The Great Iland: As likewise Tacitus, that vndertooke to describe BRITAINE by his owne knowledge, who saith, that of all Ilands knowen to the Romans it was the greatest: And so doth Dionysius in his description of the World.

In Paneg. y. Orat. to Constantius.

Rutil. Numat.

(3) But as Strabo compares the then knowen World, to a Cloake, Rutilius Numatianus Italy, to an Oken leafe, and Dionysius Spaine, vnto an Oxe-hide: so the said Tacitus in the life of Agricola, from Liuie his ancient, and Fabius Rusticus his moderne, doth liken the fashion thereof to a long Dish, or two-headed Axe: whose forme notwithstanding may better be exposed to the eie, in the draught before seen, then can be explained in words to conceit, or vnto any other thing be compared besides it selfe: especially seeing that so many good Writers haue had but very bad succes in their resemblances of Countries. And this of them is rather vnlike to either, if wee speake of the whole, which then was vnknowen, as it seemeth by Tacitus. And the huge enorme tract of ground beyond Caledonia which runeth vnto the furthermost point, growing narrow and sharpe like a wedge, was first redoubled with the Romane fleet by Iulius Agricola, and BRITAINE discouered to bee an Iland, one hundred thirty and six yeeres after Iulius Cesars first entrance therein.

Fabius Rustic.

BRITAINE discouered to be an Iland 136 yeers after Iulius Cesars entrance into it. Tacitus in Vita Agric.

(4) Some haue beene induced by the narrownesse of the Sea, and likenesse of the Soile, to thinke that BRITAINE was sometimes ioined to the continent of France: whereunto Seruius Honoratius subscribeth in his Commentary vpon the first Eclog of Virgil, who there mentioneth, BRITAINE thought one continent with FRANCE. Seruius Honorat.

—— Penitus toto diuisos orbe Britannos,
The Britaine people quite from all the world disiond.

As likewise by Claudian another ancient Poet it is stiled, Claudian.

—— nostro deducta Britannia mundo,
The Britaine soile remooued from our worlds continent.

And Vinianus with them affirmes, that in the beginning, Britaine and Gallia were both one Land. The like doth Virgil verifie of the Ile of Sicilie, which in times past he reports to haue been one with Italie. Others hold, that all Ilands had their first separation from the Mayne by the rage of the generall Deluge, & that the mountaines thereby shewed their tops aboue the plaine grounds; and the plains setling lower, became deepe vallies, when or howsoeuer, by Gods diuine ordinance and wisdome, wee see that these Ilands situated in the Seas, doe no lesse serue and adorne the Ocean it selfe, then the Lakes and Pooles of water doe the drie land, and all of them (as members of one masse) to minister sustenance for the life of all things liuing, and pleasures to the vse and seruice of man.

Vinianus.

Sicilie thought once one continent with Italy. Dominius Niger. Thought of some that all Ilands had their first separation from the Mayne by the rage of the Generall Deluge.

(5) The Iland of BRITAINE, of all others the most famous (by Catullus reputed the furthest towards the West) is bounded on the South with Normandie and France, vpon the East with Germany and Denmarke, vpon the West with Ireland and the Atlanticke Ocean, and vpon the North with the vast Deucalidon Seas. The length thereof, measured by the graduations to both extremes, that is, from the Lyzard Point Southward in Cornwal, which lieth in the Latitude of 50 degrees and 6 minutes, to the Straithy head in Scotland (being the furthest point of this Iland towards owards the North) ſet in the degree 60, and 30 minutes containeth (according to the ſcale of the terreſtriall Globe) ſix hundred twenty foure miles: not to trouble the Reader with other accounts, ſeeing the ſame ſo exactly to agree with the ſpaces of the heauens. And the extent of Land in the brodeſt part is from the Lands end in Cornwall in the Weſt (ſituated in 14. degrees and 37 minites of Longitude, according to Mercater his Atlas) vnto the Iland Tenet in the Eaſt of Kent (lying in 22 degrees, 30 minutes) & containeth miles 340, as they haue deliuered, that with curious ſearch haue laid the dimenſion thereof.

Britaines length.

(6) The ſite of this Iland is ſet by the Mathematicks in the eighth Climate for Latitude, and the Longitude likewiſe placed betwixt the Parrallels foureteene and twenty ſix: at ſeat as well for Aire as Soile both fruitfull and milde; and for length of dayes, pleaſant and delightfull: for in the height of Summer the day is ſaid to be eighteene equinoctiall houres long, whereof ſixteen & a halfe are ſpent from Sunne to Sunne. Yea and Tacitus ſaith, that in the furtheſt North part of the Iland the nights are ſo ſhort, that betwixt the going out, and comming in of the day, the ſpace is hardly perceiued, and the Sunne ſeene neither to ſet nor ariſe: Becauſe (ſaith hee) the extreme and plain parts of the earth proiect a low ſhadow, and raiſe not the darkneſſe on high, ſo the night falleth vnder the skie and ſtarre. Better might hee haue ſaid, by reaſon of the inclination of his Circle to the Horizon deſcending not directly, but paſſing obliquely, razing as it were vnder their Horizan.

Britaines bredth.

BRITAINE in the 8. Climate for Latitude, and for Longitude placed betweene the parallels fourteene and twenty ſix.

In the furtheſt North part of Britaine the nights ſo ſhort, as the ſpace betwixt the daies going and comming can hardly be perceiued. In vit. Agricola.

(7) The aire, ſaith Strabo and Tacitus, is rather inclinable to ſhowers then to ſnow, And Ceſar commends it to bee more temperate, and the cold leſſer, then that in France, as not ſubiect to either extremes as the more Northerne and Southerne Countries are: to which temperature Ceſcenius Getulicus a very ancient Poet ſeemeth to haue reſpect, when of this Iland thus he verſifieth:

Non illîc Aries verno ferit æra cornu,
Gnoſia nec Gemini præcedunt cornua Tauri.
The horned Ram there buteth not the aire of tender ſpring;
The Twins, nor Bull do to this ſoil vntimely ſeaſons bring.

Ceſar. com. lib. 5. The cold in Britaine leſſe then in France.

Probus in Virgil. Georgic.

(8) And although the Seas thereof are accounted and called by Nubienſis the Arabian, The dark & dangerous Seas, in regard of the miſty vapors that ther from ariſe, yet in the winter ſeaſon thoſe clouds are diſperſed into ſtil ſhowers of raine, that doe diſſolue the rigour and great extremitie of the cold: yea and thoſe Seas themſelues ſtirred and working to and fro with the windes, doe thereby wax warme (as Cicero ſaith) ſo that a man may eaſily perceiue within that world of waters a certaine heat incloſed. And Minutius Felix prooning that GOD hath a ſpeciall regard to the ſeuerall parts of the world, as well as to the whole, ſaith, that BRITAINE, though otherwhiles wanting the aſpect of the Sunne, yet is it releeued with the warmth of her enuironing Seas; and as much refreſhed, we may wel ſay, by thoſe ſweet and gentle winds that in the height of Summer are ſent from thoſe ſeas, & doe abate the rigor of the Sunnes great ſcorching heat; and yeeldeth not only entercourſe for traffique into all parts of the World, but plentifully aboundeth with all ſorts of fiſh, to the great benefit of the Inhabitants; and bringeth foorth Pearles, as Tacitus ſheweth, which were vſually caſt out with the flood, and gathered at the ebbe. Theſe Pearles, though not altogether ſo orient as they in India, by Amianus in his 23 booke and 12 chapter, are called Rich gems. And Pliny in his ninth booke and thirty fifth chapter, vſeth the like terme: The deſire whereof (as Suetonius ſaith) drew Ceſars affection for the Conqueſt of Britaine.

(9) The ſoile (ſaith Tacitus) ſetting aſide the Olive, the Vine, and ſuch other plants as are onely proper to hotter Countries, taketh all kind of Graine, and beareth it in abundance: it ſhooteth vp quickley, and ripeneth ſlowly: the cauſe of both is the ſame the ouer-much moiſture of the ſoile, and the aire. And Ceſar writeth, that for timber it was ſtored of all kindes, as in Gallia, the Beech and Firre-tree onely excepted. For abundance of Graine, Britaine is ſaid to bee The ſeat of Queene Ceres, by Orpheus the old Poet; and the Granary and Storehouſe for the weſterne world, as Charles the great tearmed it. And by our owne anceſtors in the blacke Booke of the Exchequer it is called a Paradiſe of pleaſure. From whence the Romans were wont yeerely to tranſport (with a fleet of eight hundred veſſels bigger then Barges) great ſtore of corne for the maintenance of their Armies. But vnto the particular relation of each ſeuerall bleſing belonging to this moſt happy Iland, wee will not againe enter, ſeeing that in euery County we haue ſufficiently, and no more then truly, ſpoken thereof. Only, if you pleaſe, heare what hath been ſaid of this Land by the Romane Orators, and firſt in the Panegyricke to Conſtantius the Emperour.

In vit. Ceſar. cap. 47.

Britaine aboundeth with all ſorts of graine.

Ceſar. Com. lib. 5.

Britaine called the ſeat of Q. Ceres.

Romans laded 800 veſſels with corne in Britaine for their armies eliewhere. Zoſimus.

(10) O happie BRITAINE, and more fortunate then all other Lands beſide, which firſt didſt ſee Conſtantine Emperour! For good cauſe hath nature endowed thee with all bleſſings both of aire & ſoile: wherin there is neither exceſſiue cold of Winter, not extream heat of ſummer: wherein there is ſo great abundance of graine, that it ſufficeth both for bread and drinke. There the forreſts are free from ſauage beaſts, and the ground void of noyſome ſerpents: in whoſe ſtead an infinite multitude of tame cattle that are with their vdders ſtrutting full of milke, and loden with fleeces to the ground. And verily (that which for the vſe of our liues wee moſt eſteeme) the daies are therein very long, & the nights neuer without ſome light, for that thoſe vtmoſt plaines by the ſea ſide caſt and raiſe no ſhadowes on high; and the aſpect both of skie and ſtarres paſſeth beyond the bound of the night: yea the very Sunne it ſelfe, which vnto vs ſeemeth for to ſet, appeareth there only to paſſe by a little, and goe aſide.

Panegyric. to Conſtantius.

In Britaine neither exceſſiue cold of winter, nor extreame heat of ſummer. Britaine abounding with all plenty of foode for mans ſuſtenance and delight.

Britaines nights neuer without ſome light.

And in another, ſpoken to Conſtantius, the father of Conſtantine the Great, thus is ſaid:

Though Britaine be but a ſingle name, yet ſurely the States loſſes haue beene manifold, in forgoing a Land ſo plentifull in fruit and graine, ſo rich in paſturage, ſo full of mines and veines of mettal, ſo gainefull in tributs and reuenewes, ſo accommodated with many hauens, and for circuit ſo large and ſpacious.

Panegyr. ſpoken to Conſtantius.

BRITAINE full of mines of metals.

And a Poet of good antiquity, of natures motherly affection towards this our Iland, hath thus written:

Tu nimio nec ſtricta gelu, ſydere feruens,
Clementi cælo temperiéque places.
Cùm pareret Natura parens, varióque fauore
Diuideret dotes omnibus vna locis,
Sepoſuit potiora tibi, matrémque profeſſa,
Inſula ſis fœlix, plenàque pacis, ait.
Quicquid amat luxus, quicquid deſiderat vſus,
Ex te proueniet, vel aliunde tibi.
Nor freezing cold, nor ſcorching hot thou art;
Thy aire a heauenly temper, ſweetly breath'd:
So pleas'd Dame nature when ſhee firſt bequeath'd:
To euery ſoile of her rich gifts a part;
Then Mother like beſt choice for thee ſhe ſought:
Be thou (quoth ſhe) the Bleſſed ile of peace.
What euer pleaſure yeelds, or wealths increaſe,
From thee ſhall grow, or ſhall to thee be brought.

Remaynes.

(11) And that BRITAINE hath beene taken for thoſe fortunate Ilands whereof the Poets haue imagined a perpetuall ſpring time, is certaine by Iſacius Tzetzes a Greeke Author of good account. And in Robert of Auesburie we read, what time Pope Clement the ſixt had elected Lewis of Spaine to be Prince of the Fortunate Ilands, raiſing him powers both in Italy and France, the Engliſh Leigier Ambaſſadours, that lay then in Rome for King Edward the third, were ſo deepely ſet in the opiuion, that this preparation was made againſt BRITAINE, that they wrote their ſuſpicions conceiued, and preſently with-drew themſelues into England, to certifie the King of theſe deſignes. And it ſeemeth Pope Innocent the fourth was of the ſame minde, when (as Matth. Pariſ. writeth) hee ſaid, Verè hortus deliciarum eſt Anglia: vere puteus inexhauſtus eſt: Et vbi multa abundant, de multis multa multa possunt exterqueri, &c. Certes, the Kingdome of England is the very Paradise of pleasures, a Well which can neuer be drawen drie: where many things doe abound, and whence many things may bee exported, &c. With which his conceit he was afterward so far transported with a longing desire, as hee made great meanes and earnest suit to the King of England (as the said Author writeth, ad ann. 1250.) that hee might come into England to see that Country which was euery where so much renowned. In a word, BRITAINE is so rich in commodities, so beautifull in situation, and so resplendent in all glory, that if the Omnipotent (as one hath said) had vouchsafed to fashion the world round like a ring, as he did like a globe, it might haue been most worthily the onely Gemme therein. Whose Vallies are like Eden: whose Hilles are as Lebanon: whose Springs are as Pisgah: whose Riuers are as Iordan: whose Walles is the Ocean: and whose defense is the Lord IEHOVAH.

Adam. 1246.

Pope Innocent maketh suit to the King of England to see Britaine.

BRITAINE sustained at once no lesse then 11. Kings commanding great powers

(12) The body then of this Imperiall Monarchie sheweth not onely the greatnesse of it selfe in it selfe, but also extendeth her beautifull branches into many other Countries and Kingdomes farre iacent and remote. This greatnesse is made the more sensible, for that the Iland in times past sustained at once no lesse then eleuen Kings in their royall estates, all of them wearing Crownes, and commanding great powers. Such was the Heptarchy of the Saxons seuen Kingdomes, seated on the South of Seuerus his Wall. Two Kingdomes thence had their sites in that Northerne part, and their seuerall Kings of Scots and Picts ruling on both sides the Clude, euen vnto the Deucaledonian Seas. And two Kingdomes (if not more) diuided into North and South, and their Kings of the ancient Britaines ruling the West part of this Iland beyond the Clawdh Offa, or Offa his Ditch, commonly called WALES.

(13) The Ilands likewise belonging to this Empire had Kings of their owne, as that of Man, the Orcades, and in Ireland at one time fiue Kings raigning together. France also is annexed, and so was Cyprus sometimes with some Prouinces of Syria, subdued by K. Richard the first, surnamed Cœur-de lion. And at this present in the new World of America a Colonie of BRITAINS is seated in that part now called VIRGINEA; wherby the borders of our Soueraignes command and most rightfull title may bee inlarged, and the Gospell of Iesus Christ further preached, which no doubt will in time be imbraced, to the saluation of many and great honour to the BRITAINES. And that the borders of this most royall Tent haue beene wide spread in former times, White of Basingstocke is of opinio, who affirmeth that the limits of the British Empire in old time was from the Orcades vnto the Pyrenean Mountaines. And that K. Athelstan after his conquest of those Northern parts with that of Denmarke wrote so his title: which further is confirmed by the Charter of K. Edgar for the foundation of the Cathedrall Church at Worcester, wherein likewise he so stiled himself. The inlargement whereof we pray to be accomplished, especially in those parts where God is not knowen, according to the saying of the Prophet, that the curtaines of our habitations may bee further spread, with increase on the right hand and on the left: and that our seed may possesse those GENTILES, and dwell in their Cities: Whereby the ninth Nation may bee conuerted vnto CHRIST, as eight others before this time by English-men haue been.

CHAPTER II.

The first inhabiters of this Iland being meerely barbarous, neuer troubled themselues to transmit their Originals to posterity. Cæsar Com. lib. 6. Druides the onely wise men among the first inhabitants of this Iland. If the first inhabitants of this Iland had written any thing of their originall, yet it must needs haue perished. Gildas de excidio Britannie. No vnderstading of the first affaires of this Iland, but from forraine Writers.

AS touching the first Inhabitants & originall Names of this Iland, things so far cast into the misty darknesse of obscurity and obliuion, that there is no hope left vs, so lately born to discouer them; especially knowing that the first Inhabitants being meerely barbarous, neuer troubled themselues with care to transmit their Originals to posterity: neither if they would, could haue done, being without Letters, which only doe preserue and transferre knowledge vnto others. But admit they had letters, yet was it not lawfull for them to commit their affaires to writing, as Cæsar doth testifie of the Druides, the onely wise and learned men among them, that had the managing both of Iustice and religious Rites. And had they committed these things to writing, yet doubtlesse had they perished in the reuolutions of so many ages as are passed, and so many conuersions or euersions of the State. Gildas and Ninius, the Britaines first Historians, confesse plainly, that they had no vnderstanding of the ancient affaires of this Iland, but from forraigne writers; and neither that aboue two hundred and odde yeeres before the birth of our Sauiour Christ. At which time Polybius a most graue Writer, and an attendant vpon Scipio, saith, that the Regions Northward from Narbona (as this is) were vtterly vnknowen; and whatsoeuer was written or reported of them, was but a dreame. And therefore vntill such time as the Romane Writers reach foorth their hands to direct vs, wee shall wander, as without a guide, and shall seeme to heape more rubbish vpon former ruines.

Polybius.

Romane Writers the best directers for the antiquity of Britaine.

(2) Yet let this bee granted, that the Originall names of Countries & Prouinces were first assumed from their possessors, whereof Iosephus in the seuenth Chapter of his first Booke of Antiquities is a sufficient Witnesse, who in the dispersion of Noahs sons and his nephewes, nameth the Countries according to their families. So did the children of Dan name Laish after their father: Iair his Cities that he conquered in the Land of Gilead: and Iudea from Iudah whose King was of him. And that this also was the practise of the Gentiles, Perionius doth shew, who saith, that himself so knew no Nation in the earth, which would not haue their names either from their Prince, Captaine, or King: the example whereof he inferteth, that Spaine was so named from Hispalus, Italy from Italus, and the like.

The originall names of Countries and Prouinces assumed first from their possessors. Iudg. 18. 29. Iudg. 10. 4.

Perionius de originall Gallica. Spaine named from Hispalus, Italy from Italus. Samothes the first sonne of Iapheth the first inhabiter of this Iland, who named it Samothea 252. yeeres after the flood.

(3) And accordingly from Samothes the sixth sonne of Iapheth (whom Moses calleth Meschech) the brother of Gomer, and of Iauan, whose seed is said in the tenth of Genesis to haue repleniished the Iles of the Gentiles

Gentiles, is brought by ſome Authors into this Iland, the yeere after the generall Floud two hundred fifty and two, where he ſeated, and gaue Lawes to his people, and left to his poſterity the name thereof to bee called Samothea, after his owne. But ſith the credit of this Samothes and his Samothea ariſeth onely from a ſmall and new Pamphlet, bearing the name of Beroſus the Chaldean, bolſtred out vnder a ſhew of aged Antiquity, and thruſt into the World vnder the countenance of the ancient Hiſtorian himſelfe: I meane not to enforce, ſeeing my purpoſe is to expoſe this moſt beautifull Iland in her owne beſeeming attire, and not deformed by theſe rotten and patched rags. And of this forged Beroſus wee haue better cauſe to vpbraid Iohannes Annius his Countenancer & Commenter, then the Egyptian Prieſts had to twit Solon, in accuſing the Grecians, that for Hiſtory had not attained to the yeeres of a gray head. For it exceeds not much one hundred and twenty yeeres ſince the ſame Booke firſt appeared in the World; and then vehemently ſuſpected as fabulous by Lodouicus Viues, and afterwards conuicted by the learned Gaſperus Varrerius in a ſeuerall Treatiſe, and now vniuerſally reiected of all skilfull Antiquaries.

The credit of this Samothes and his Samothea ariſeth only from a ſmall and new pamphlet, bearing the name of Beroſus the Chaldean.

(4) But the name ALBION is better receiued, being found ſo tearmed of the Grecians in ancient time, as in the Booke De Mundo, written to Alexander, and ſuppoſed to be Ariſtotles, Pliny in his Naturall Hiſtory, Ptolomy, Strabo, and others: yet vpon what ground it ſhould be ſo called, there ariſe many coniectures. Pomponius Mela, Nicolas Perottus, Rigmanus Phileſius, Ariſtotle, and Humfrey Lhuyd, deriue it from Albion Mareoticus a Gyant, and ſonne of Neptune, that conquered (as they ſay) theſe Samotheans, and ſeated himſelfe in this Iland the yeere after the Floud three hundred thirty fiue. And if that be true which Perottus and Lilius Giraldus haue written, then may this Albion giue name to this Iland. Notwithſtanding, Strabo, Munſter, and Frier Bartholmew, will haue it ſo named, ab albis rupibus, of the rockes and white cliffes appearing towards the coaſts of France: which carrieth the more likelihood through the credit of Orpheus a moſt ancient Poet, who in his Argonauticks (if ſo be they were his) calleth the Iland next vnto Hibernia, or Hernin, which queſtionleſſe is this of ours, Αυηδν μέσην that is, the white Land. And accordingly haue the welſh Poets called it Inis Wen. And this is further confirmed from Cicero, who termeth theſe whitiſh cliffs mirificas moles: as alſo by the antick Coins of Antoninus Pius, and Seuerus the Romane Emperors, whereon BRITAIN is ſtamped in a womans attire ſitting vpon rocks. And the ſame being chalky, or of a plaſter-like ſubſtance, Fracaſtorius ſuppoſeth was the cauſe of the ſweating ſickneſſe, and whereof Albion had the name. Vnleſſe ſome will deriue it from Alphon, which as Feſtus ſaith, doth ſignifie white in Greek; or Olbion, rich or happy, in regard of the fertility of the ſoile, wholſome temperature of the Aire, and the rich commodities in the ſame: either from Alpion for the high ſituation. But from the Latine albis rupibus it could not be deriued, when that language was vnknowen to the World. Marianus the Monke, Iohn Rous, Dauid Pencair, and William Caxton, from others more ancient, do fetch the name thereof from Albina the beautifull daughter of Diocleſian King of Syria, who with her ſiſters thirty in number, for the ſlaughter of their husbands, were baniſhed their Countrey, and without man, oares, or tackles, were committed to the mercy of the Seas, who after many aduentures, laſtly arriued vpon this ſhore, where they inhabited, and gaue name to this Iland, calling it Albion after the name of their eldeſt ſiſter: and accompanying with Diuels, brought forth a Progeny of Gyants, if we will beleeue the Legend of this moſt impudent liar, which is worthily reiected by Bidius, Volateranus, Harding, Bale, Iohn Rous, and others. But that the name Albion was both of great acceptance & long continuance, is apparent by the worthy Epitheton of King Edgar the Saxon, who in his Charter for the foundation of the Abbie of Ely, hath theſe words: Ego Edgarus Baſileus dilecta Inſula Albionis, ſubditis nobis ſceptris Scotorum, Cumbrorum, & omnium circumcirca Regionum, quieta pace frnence, &c. By which hee knitteth the whole Iland together, as Land worthily to be beloued, and calleth it ALBION.

(5) The next name aſcribed vnto this Iland is Britaine, and that firſt found and giuen by the Grecians, who were the firſt diſcouerers of theſe Weſterne parts of the world: either from their painted bodies, as their neighbours (if not anceſtours) the Gaules were named of their long ſhaggie haire, or of their rich metals therein gotten, and thence carried in abundance into other Countries; or from Brute, that with his diſperſed Troians conquered it, as he of Monmouth hath tranſlated; or what occaſion ſoeuer I diſpute not: onely it feares me I ſhal giue but ſmall ſatisfaction to the deſirous Reader, of the cauſe and originall of this name, being conſorted with ſo many vncertainties, wherein the further we follow this intangled threed, the further are we lead into the Labyrinth of ambiguitie. But as Plutarch, Liuy, and other Latine Writers haue complained of the many fictions & fables of Poets intermingled with the hiſtories of truth, whereby truth it ſelfe was often made incredible; ſo we in rehearſing the diuers names of Britannie, and the reaſons thereof by ſundry Writers alleaged, reſt free in our relations, either from impeaching the power of Antiquitie, or approouing thoſe things that are as yet wrapped vp in Times Obliuions, leauing the credit to them that haue left the ſame vnto vs, and the cenſure of their opinions to the iudgement of the learned, and thoſe of better experience.

Ieffrey ap. Arthur.

How this Iland came to haue the name Britannia is very vncertaine.

The fainings of Poets haue bred diſtruſt in many true Hiſtories.

(6) The vulgar receiued opinion, held on with foure hundred yeeres continuance, (ſome few mens exceptions had againſt the ſame) is, that this Iland tooke the name of Britannia from Brute the ſonne of Syluius, of whom more ſhall bee ſpoken in the next Chap. for the peopling of this Iland, and from whom ſome (following a ſuſpected Gildas) doe write the name Britaine: for ſo doth Hierome, who tranſlating Æthicus that excellent Scythian Philoſopher, calleth both this and the Ilands adiacent, Inſulas Brutanicas. But beſides the many obiections made both by forraine and home-bred Writers, that ſeeme to make the Story of Brute doubtfull, Humfrey Lhuyd a Cambre-Britaine, a learned and diligent ſearcher of Antiquities, doth confidently denie the name Britaine to be taken from Brute; and among many other obſeruations, makes this an infallible argument, that the letter B, is not the firſt radicall of that name; and affirmeth boldly, that there is not any Britiſh word whoſe firſt radicall letter is B. And therefore hee will haue it to be anciently written PRYDCAIN, compounded of two Britiſh words, PRYD and CAIN, which ſignifie (as he ſaith) Beauty and White; the C. being loſt in the latter word, for the more eaſie pronuntiation in the Britiſh tongue; and the P. in the former changed into B. by the Latines, for the more gentle and pleaſant ſounds ſake: ſo that himſelfe thinketh, that thoſe learned and expert men in the Britiſh tongue, which wrote the Ilands name with B. doe therein rather follow the Latines, then iudging that to be the true name indeed: for proofe whereof hee citeth both ancient Copies, and Traditions of their own old Poets the Bardi, by whom (ſaith he) it was vſually called Prydain, as the fitteſt denomination for ſo beautifull a Land. But if either colour or commodities were her God-fathers at the Font-ſtone, why was ſhe not rather named, The Palace of Queene Ceres, as old Orpheus termes her; either Inſula florum, as it hath beene found written in a very ancient manu-ſcript? And yet to ſecond this his conceited name, I finde recorded by Biſhop Cooper, a learned Writer, that which makes for that purpoſe. At Euychurch (ſaith hee) two miles from Salisbury, in the digging downe of a wall, a Booke containing twenty leaues of very thicke velome was found, which from the hands of Maſter Richard Pace, chiefe Secretary to the King, I receiued; but being ſore defaced, could read no one ſentence thorow; thorow, yet did I well perceiue the word PRYTANIA, (not called ſo, from the adiuncts White and Beauteous) but rather from the Greeke word Πρυτανεία Prytanya, which as he ſaith, doth ſignifie mettals. For the Grecians flouriſhing in wiſedome, and experience, entred the Ocean, and finding this Iland full of Braſſe, Tynne: Lead, Iron, Gold, and Siluer, gaue name thereunto accordingly, and called it Prytania. Thus farre he. And ſome in regard of theſe rich commodities thence brought, will haue it named Britannia, as vpon like occaſion Vibius Sequeſter affirmeth Calabria ſometimes to haue beene ſo called. Others, and thoſe many, do hold a more ſtrange opinion, namely, that this Iland was called Britannia of Bretta a Spaniſh word, which ſignifieth Earth, for that it was ſeparated from the maine land, and, ſay they, it was once ioined with the continent of France. Of this opinion are Antonius Volſcus, Dominicus Marius Niger, Seruius Honoratus, Vinianus, Bodine, Twyne, and Verſtegan. But how that name from that ſeparation may be gathered I vnderſtand not: for if it be granted that this Iland alſo was cut from the continent (as it is thought all others in the world were) by the violent rage of the vniuerſall floud, yet it followeth not that this only ſhould claime that name, and from that occaſion more then any other, or then all of them ſo diuided and ſet apart in the maine Ocean. Others there are that would haue the name Britaine to bee brought from Britona a Nymph in Greece, daughter to Mars who (as they ſay) to auoid the laſciuious intents of Minos, forſooke the country, and paſſing the ſeas ariued in this Iland and by her the name aroſe, this hath Textor. But I might as well cite Calepine for his Anglia, & Marianus for his Albina, being all fables conſorting alike together and fictions of the ſame authority that Virgils Dido is. Heſychius deriueth the name Britaine from Britannus the father of Celtice, on whom Hercules begat Celtus the originall of the Celta, as Parthenius Niceus a very ancient author writeth. And Sir Thomas Eliot a learned Knight, draweth the name of this Iland from the Greeke fountaine alſo, but of other ſignification, viz. Πρυτανία, Prutania, by which terme the Athenians ſignified their Publike reuenues and yet that is iuſtly excepted againſt, ſeeing that it is a peculiar terme only to the Athenians, and that the Grecians called this Iland Βερτανία, not Πρυτανία, Goropius Becanus in his Originall of Antwerp ſaith, that the Danes ſought here to plant themſelues, and ſo named this Iland Bridania, that is, free Denmarke. And others deriue it from Prutenia, a country in Germany. But that both theſe are fictions it manifeſtly appeareth, for that this Iland was famous by the name of Britaine many hundred yeeres before that either Dania or Prutania were heard of in the world.

Pomponius Letus would haue it Briton, and that name giuen it from the Britons in France. Indeed it is probable, that from the Celtes, the old Gaules, our originals deſcended: but that the name ſhould come of thē, hath no colour of truth, ſeeing that thoſe Britons came from vs, and not we from them: and in Cæſars time that coaſt was called Armorica, but this of ours Britaine. Forcatulus deriueth the name thereof from Brithin a drinke, which as Athenæus ſatih was vſed among the Greeks. And others will haue it from the Bruty a roauing & ſtragling people in Italy: both which are accounted but idle conceits, and for no leſſe we will leaue them. White of Baſingſtock wil haue the name thereof deriued from an Hebrew word, and Iſidore from a word of her own language. Thus then is Britanny burthened with many titles vnder one truth; and theſe are the aſcriptions, cauſes & exceptions, as far as we are able to gather: all which muſt giue place to that which is to follow out of the collections and iudicious obſeruances of Maſter Cambden. Whoſe words I wil abridge, and by his good fauour bring to furniſh this chapter, the further to ſatisfie the vnſatisfied Reader.

(7) This then he holdeth for granted, that ancient, nations in the beginning had names of their owne: and that after from theſe the Greeks & Latines by wreſting them to the analogie or proportion of their ſpeech, impoſed names vpon Regiones and countries, which tooke their denominations from their people and inhabitants. So Iewry was named from the Iewes, Media from the Medes, Perſia of the Perſians, Scythia of the Scythians, &c. And why not then by the authority of Martial, Iuuenal, Auſonius, Procopius, and in old inſcriptions ſet vp by the Britaines themſelues, BRITTA, BRITO, BRITONES, BRITTVS, from BRIT, or BRITH, from whom any one being of that nation might be termed NATIONE BRITTO; as is ſeene ſo inſcribed in Saint Mary the Round at Rome? The Saxons likewiſe themſelues called the Britains Bryttas, and Witichindas the Saxon euerie where nameth the Britaines Britæ: ſo that the word BRIT is doubtleſſe the Primitiue, from whence BRITTO is deriued, and from whence the firſt glimpſe of light leading to the word BRITAINE, ſeemeth to appeare. And that all nations deuiſed their names of that, wherein they either excelled others, or were knowen by from others, whether in regard of their firſt founders honor, as the Ionesof Iauan, the Iſraelites of Iſrael, the Canaanites of Canaan; or whether in reſpect of their nature, conditions, and inclinations, as the Iberi after the Hebrew Etymologie becauſe they were Mincrs; the Heneti becauſe they were ſtraglers; the Nomades for that they were breeders of cattell; the Almanes for their eſteemed valour and manhood; the Frankners for beeing free; the Pannonians, as Dio conceiteth, of their coats with cloth-ſleeues; the Aethiopians of their blacke hue: and the Albanes becauſe they were borne with white haire, for ſo ſaith Solinus, that the colour of their heads gaue name vnto the people. Seeing then that theſe our Ilanders were known and called by a name common to both them & their neighbors, Cimbri or Cumeri, and had no better marke to be diſtinguiſhed and known from the borderers, then by their cuſtome of painting their bodies, whereof the moſt approued authors doe witneſſe, as Cæſar, Mela, Pliny, Martial and others, who affirme that the Britaines vſed to colour themſelues with woad, called in the Latine glaſtum (and Glaſe at this day with them doth ſignifie blew) what if I then ſhould coniecture (ſaith he) that they were called Britains from this their painted bodies? for what is thus ſtained or coloured, in their ancient countrey ſpeech is called BRITH. Neither let this Etymologie of Britains ſeeme to be either harſh or abſurd, ſeeing the very words ſound alike, and the name alſo as an expreſſe image repreſenteth the thing which in Etymologies are chiefly required; for Brith, and Brit, doe paſſing well accord: And the word Brith among the Britaines, implieth that which the Britans were indeed, to wit, painted, ſtained, died, and coloured, as the Latine Poets deſcribe them: hauing their backes pide or medly coloured, as Oppianus termeth them. From which colours and vſe of painting, the ancient Britaines (as he thinketh) had their names, and is yet in vſe among the Welſh. But this is certaine that a Britain is called in the Britiſh tongue BRITHON, and as BRITO came of BRITH, ſo did BRITANNIA, who as Iſidore ſaith, tooke the name from a word of their owne nation: for what time the ancient Greeks (that firſt gaue name to this Iland) either as rouers or merchants trauelled into other remote and farre diſioined countries (as Eratoſthenes reporteth) learned from the Inhabitants themſelues, or els of the Gaules which ſpake the ſame language, that this our nation was called Brith and Brithon: They then vnto the word BRITH, added TANIA, which in the Greek Gloſſaries betokeneth a REGION, and whereof they made a compound name Βερτανία, that is, the BRITONS-LAND. And that this is ſo, the countries alſo lying in the weſt part of the world, as Mauritania Luſitania, and Aquitania, doe ſufficiently confirme: for the Grecians being the firſt Surueiors of thoſe regions, of Mauri, who, Strabo ſaith, was called Numidia, made Mauritania; of Luſus the ſonne of Bacchus, Luſitania, and of Aquis (waters, as Iuo Carnotenſis is of opinion) called the country Aquitania: as alſo Turditania, and Baſtitania, Prouinces in Spain, might ariſe from the Turdi, and Baſti their poſſeſſors. And that this manner of compoſition is moſt vſuall in the names of countries we ſee: For came not Ireland by compoſition of the Iriſh word Erim? Did not Angle-terre grow together of an Engliſh and French word

Hierome in his questions vpon Genesis, proueth out of most ancient Authors, that the Greekes inhabited along the sea coasts and Isles of Europe thorowout as far as to this our Iland. Let vs read, saith he, Varroes bookes of Antiquities, and those of Sisinius Capito, as also the Greeke writer Phlegon, with the rest of the great learned men, and we shall see, all the Ilands well neere, and all the sea coasts of the whole world, to haue been taken vp with Greek inhabitants, who, as I said before, from the mountaines Amanus and Taurus euen to the British Ocean, possessed all the parts along the sea side. And verily, that the Greeks ariued in this our region, viewed and considered well the site and nature thereof, there will be no doubt nor question made: if we obserue what Athenæus hath written concerning Phileas Tauromenites who was in Britaine in the yeere one hundred and sixty before Cæsars comming: if we call to remembrance the Altar with an inscription vnto Vlysses in Greek letters, erected in Caledonia as Solinus saith, and lastly if we marke what Pytheas before the time of the Romans here, hath deliuered and written as touching the distance of Thule from Britaine. For who had euer discouered vnto the Greeks, Britain, Thule, the Belgick countries, and their sea coasts especially, if the Greek ships had not entred the British and German Ocean, yea and related the description therof vnto their Geographers? Had Pytheas, thinke you, come to the knowledge of six daies sailing beyond Britaine, vnlesse some of the Greeks had shewed the same? Who euer told them of Scandia, Bergos, and Nerigon, out of which men may saile into Thule? And these names seem to haue been better knowen vnto the most ancient Greeks, then either to Pliny or to any Roman. Whereupon Mela testifieth, that Thule was much mentioned and renowned in Greek writers: Pliny likewise writeth thus; Britain an Iland famous in the monuments and records both of the Greeks and of vs. By this meanes therefore, so many Greeke words haue crept into the British, French, and withall, into the Belgick, or Low-Dutch language. And if Lazarus Baysius, and Budæus doe make their vant and glory in this, that their French-men haue bin of old φιλόμουσοι, that is, louers and studious of the Greeks, grounding their reason vpon few French words of that Idiome, which receiue some marks and tokens of the Greek tongue: if Hadrianus Iunius ioyeth no lesse, because in the Belgick words there lie couertly Greek Etymologies: then may the Britains make their boast in whose language many words there be deriued from the Greeks. Thus farre M. Cambdens iudgement for Britannia.

Which name we find first mentioned by Polybius the Greeks historian, who liued and trauelled with Scipio thorow most parts of Europe, about 265. yeers before the birth of Christ. And after him Athenæus a Greek author of good account, and before the yeere of grace 179. mentioneth the name of Britaine, and that vpon this occasion: King Hiero saith he, framing a ship of such hugenesse and burden, as was admirable to the world, was much troubled for a tree, whereof he might make the maine mast: which at last with much adoe was found in Britaine, by the direction of a Swineheard: and by Phileas Tauromenites the Mechanick conueied into Sicilie, whereby that want was sufficiently supplied. To this let not the Criticks from Cæsar say; that Britaine brought forth neither Beech nor Firre, as he in his fift book of commentaries affirmes (if by fagus he meane the Beech) seeing that the same kind doth most plentifully grow in all parts of this Iland, and the Firre-trees for masts in the North west of Scotland vpon the bankes of the Lough argicke of such great height and thicknesse, that at the root they beare 28. handfuls about, and the bodies mounted to 90. foot of height, they beare at that length 20. inches Diametre, as hath been measured by some in commission, & so certified to his Maiesty: and at this present growing vpon the lands of the right worthy Knight Sir Alexander Hayes, his Maiesties principall Secretary for Scotland.

But among the Latine Writers Lucretius was the first that before Cesar mentioneth Britaine in these verses:

Nam quid Britannum cælum deferre putamus,
Et quod in Ægypto est, quà mundi claudicat Axis:
We see the difference in the spheeres where Britaines Sunne doth goe
From Egypts Clime, wherein Charles-waine is forc'd to draw so low.

Lucretius.

(8) Other names hath this Iland beene termed by, and that either by way of note for her situation, as Insula Cæruli, the Iland in the Sea, so written in the sonet or parodia made against Ventidius Bassus, and by Claudian confirmed, whose sides (saith hee) the azure Sea doth wash. And in a very ancient manuscript it is found written, Insula florum, an Iland of flowers, for the abundance of Graine therein growing: as also for her subiection to the Romans, hath beene called by Ægisippus, the Romane world, and by her owne Historian Gildas, Romania: for beeing first subdued by them, the very name of seruitude (saith he) stucke fast to the soile. And Prosper Aquitanicus in expresse words calleth it, the Romane Iland, and so did the South-saiers when the statutes of Tacitus and Florianus the Emperours were by lightning ouerthrowen, who propheciedd, that an Emperour should arise out of their familie, that should send a Pro-consull to the Romane Iland. Vpon the like cause of conquest & subiection we read in Amianus, that what time the Iland had affaied a dangerous reuolt in the raigne of Valentinianus the Emperor, Theodosius as then Gouernor of Britaine, reducing them vnder their wonted obedience, in honor of Valentinianus, caused the Iland to bee called VALENTIA, which name notwithstanding died either with, or immediatly after the death of the said Emperour.

(9) But about the same time, when as by Gods decree the Romanes fulnesse was come to the wane, and the greatnes of their glory did abate; by the downefall of that one Empire, many Kingdomes beganne to arise, and to haue their Rulers, Lawes, and Limits of themselues. Among the rest, this Iland Britaine shortly came to be diuided into three seuerall Kingdomes, & each of them to retaine an absolute power in their owne dominions, and were knowen by their seuerall and proper names. The first was Scotland from Scotia, and that from Scythia, as the best suppose, whose Southerne bounds was the famous Wall from Carlile to Newcastle, and from thence the enorme tract of all that Northerne promontory was called Scotia, or Scotland. The second was Cambria, of vs called Wales, sited in the West of this Iland, incloising those waste mountaines with a ditch drawen from Basingwarke in Flint-shire in the North, to the mouth of Wye neere Bristoll in the South, so separated by great Offa the Mercian King. And the third was Angle-lond, the East, the most fruitfull, and best of the Iland, lying coasted with the Erench and Germane Seas, so named when the vnited Heptarchie of the Saxons was ruled by king Egbert, who by his edict dated at Winchester, Anno 819. commanded the same to bee called Angle-lond, according to the name of the place from whence his ancestors the Angle-Saxons came, which was out of the continent part of Denmarke, lying betwixt Iuitland and Holsatia, where to this day the place retaineth the name Engloen. And therfore Calepine is to be reiected, that would haue the name from Queene Angela, and Goropius, of good Anglers; either from Pope Gregorie his attribute of Angell-like faces; or from others that would faine it from Angula the Giant-like brother to Danus; or force it from Angulus Orbis.

This Iland Britaine diuided in to three kingdomes. The first, Scotland, whose partition southward is from Carlile to Newcastle.

The second. Cambria or Wales, whose partition is from Basingwark to Wye.

The third. Angle-lond coasted with the French and German Seas.

This Iland named Angle-lond of a place in Denmarke called Engloen.

Gregory 1.

(10) Neither indeed was it called England before the daies of Canutus the Dane; but with Angle-land, retained still the names both of Albion and Britaine, as in a Saxon Charter made by King Edgar, the tenth in succession from Egbert, and no lesse then one hundred forty and nine yeeres after this Edict is seene, where in the beginning he stileth himselfe thus: Ego Edgar totius Albionis Basileus, &c. And in the end of the same charter thus: Edgar Rex totius Britannia Donocon-

This Iland not called England before the daies of Canutus the Dane.

This Iland vsually called both Angle-lond, Albion, and Britain, before Canutus daies.

nem cum sigillo S. Crucis confirmaui. And yet vpon his Coines wrote himselfe Rex Anglis, whereby wee see the rellish of the former names not vtterly extinct, though a new was imposed by the Saxons.

The name England not changed either by the Dane or Norman Conquerours.

(11) This last name this Iland still retained, though two seueral Conquests of two seuerall Nations were made of the same. Neither did William the Conqueror attempt to alter it, it sounding belike so Angel-like in his eares, accounting himselfe most happie to be King of so worthy a Kingdome: the glorie wherof is further inlarged by the ranking of Christian nations, assembled in their generall Councels, wherein England is accounted the fifth, & hath place of precedency before kingdoms of larger territories.

Hath the fifth place in all Generall Councels.

This name of England continued for the space of seuen hundred eighty and three yeeres, vnto the comming in of our Soueraigne Lord King IAMES, in anno 1602. who by the hand of GOD hath vnited all these Diademes into one Imperiall Crowne, & reduced the many Kingdomes in one Iland, vnder the gouernment of one Monarch: and after the manifold conquests, irruptions, and dissensions, hath setled an eternall amitie; & extinguishing all differences of names, hath giuē the whol Iland the ancient name of GREAT BRITAINE, by his Edict dated at Westminster, quartring the royal Armes of his seuerall Kingdoms in one royall Scutchion, and for his mott, as is most meet, Hath continued and kept the name England the space of seuen hundred eighty and three yeeres.

Now reduced to the name of Great Britaine.

CHAPTER III.

Britaine replenished with people before Noahs flood.

IT is not to bee doubted, but that this Iland with the Vniuersall was replenished with people, immediately after that men began to be multiplied vpon the earth, euen in the daies of the former Patriarkes, and long before the Flood of Noah, as sundrie ancient Writers haue related. And surely if wee consider in those first ages of the world the long life of man (the only meanes to multiplication) and the worlds continuance for one thousand six hundred fiftie and six yeeres before it was destroied, wee shall easily yeeld, that euery Country and corner of the earth was plentifully peopled and inhabited. And so much doe the Sacred Scriptures intimate vnto vs, where, by the Prophet Esay it is said: Thus saith the Lord, that created heauen; God himselfe, that framed the earth, and made it: he hath prepared it; he created it not in vaine; he formed it to be inhabited.

Isa. 45. 18.

(2) But when the wrath of GOD was executed vpon the world for sin, & all ouer-whelmed with a Flood of waters, the whol earth therby became altogether vnpeopled, eight persons only with the breed-reserued creatures saued in the floting Arke: Whose Port or Hauen was the mountaine of Araret in Armenia; whence with the blessing of procreation, mankinde againe began to be multiplied vpon the earth; and from the confusion of Babels building, to be scattered by Tribes and Colonies, according to the diuersitie of Languages, into diuers parts and Countries of the world, giuing nams to the places where they seated, according to the names of their Princes or chiefe Commanders. Amongst whom the sonnes of Iapheth the eldest sonne of Noah (whom Moses declareth to haue peopled the Iles of the Gentiles) betooke themselues into Europe, these westerne parts of the world: as Sem did into Asia, and Cham into Africa: whose posterities accordingly dispersed, Iosephus in his first Booke of Antiquities hath both branched into their seuerall diuisions. and reduced them to their first roots and originals.

(3) Now that the Iles of the Gentiles mentioned by Moses, were these of Europe, all learned men confesse: and therefore those especially of Britannie and Sicilie, as Wolfangus Musculus is of opinion. And that Europe fell to Iaphets portion, Iosephus and Isidore doe agree: who affirme his off-spring to haue inhabited from the Mount Taurus all Europe Northward, so farre as the British Seas, leauing names both to places and people. And Gildas, as Nubrigensis witnesseth, and Polydore Virgil granteth, will haue this Iland inhabited euen from the Flood. But of these ancient things, saith Sebastian Munster, no man can write certainly, it depending only vpon coniecturlas, and the same by heare-say, and flying reports of priuate men, as Origen spaketh.

For so iudgeth a learned Britain himselfe, who saith his countrymen the Welsh which are vnlearned, as yet know no other name for their land and people, but only Cumbri.

(5) And that of these Gomerians were also the Gaules, learned Clarenceaux that brightest lampe to all Antiquities, out of Iosephus and Zonaras sufficiently hath obserued; who that they were also called Cimbri, he proueth out of Cicero, & Appian Alexandrinus; that those Barbarians whom Marius defeated, Cicero plainly termeth Gaules, where he saith, C. Marius represt the armies of the Gaules, entring in great numbers into Italy: which, as all Historians witnesse, were the Cimbrians. And the Habergeon of their king Belens digged vp at Aqua Sextia, where Marius put them to flight, doth shew the same: whereon was engraued in strange characters BELEOS CIMBROS; as also the testimony of Lucan doth no lesse, who calleth the Ruffine hired to kill Marius, a Cimbrian, whom Liuy & Plutarch in the life of Marius affirme to be a Gaule. They also who vnder the conduct of Brennus spoiled Delphi in Greece, were Gaules, as all writers with one voice agree, and yet that these were named Cimbri, Appian in his Illyricks doth teſtifie. And for Brennus their Grand-Captaine, our Hiſtorians report him to be a Britaine: as likewiſe Virgil (though in taunting wiſe) termeth that Grammarian the Britaine Thucydides, whom Quintilian affirmes to be a Cimbrian.

The Turkes, the Ionet, Medes, and Thracians come of Noahs nephewes.

(6) And if of the reſt of Noahs nephewes, ſeated in ſeuerall countries, the Nations proceeding from them, are knowen by their originall names, as the Turkes of Togorma, whom the Iewes to this day ſo terme, the Ionet from Iauan, the Medes from Madai, the Thracians from Tiras, and ſo of the reſt, whoſe names as yet ſound not much vnlike to their firſt planters; why then ſhall not we thinke, that our Britaines or Cumerians, are the very of-ſpring of Gomer, and of Gomer tooke their denomination, the name ſo neere according? Sith granted it is, that they planted themſelues in the vtmoſt borders of Europe, as Iſidore hath ſaid. For the Ark reſting in Armenia, and the people thēce flowing like waters from the ſpring, repleniſhed thoſe parts firſt that lay next their ſite, as Aſia the leſſe, and Greece before Italy: Italy before Gaule, and Gaule before Britaine. And if we conſider the occaſions that might be offered, either for disburdening the multitudes of people, for conqueſt, deſire of nouelties, ſmalneſſe of diſtance, or commodities of the aire and ſoile, we may eaſily conceiue this Iland to haue been peopled from thence. For it ſtandeth with ſenſe that euery country receiued their firſt inhabitants from places neere bordering, rather then from them that lay more remote: for ſo was Cyprus peopled out of Aſia, Sicile and Candie out of Greece; Corſica and Sardinia, out of Italy, Zeland out of Germany, Iſland out of Norway, and ſo of the reſt. Now that Britaine had her firſt inhabitants from Gaule, ſufficiently is proued by the name, ſite, religion, manners, and languages, by all which the moſt ancient Gaules and Britaines haue been as it were linked together in ſome mutuall ſociety; as is at large proued by our Arch-Antiquary in his famous worke, to which I refer the ſtudious reader.

(7) And although the inner parts of the Iland were inhabited, as Ceſar ſaith, of ſuch whom they themſelues out of their owne records, report to haue been borne in the Iland: yet the ſea coaſts were peopled by thoſe, who vpon purpoſe to make war, had paſſed thither out of Belgia, and Gaule, who ſtill caried the names of thoſe cities and ſtates, out of which they came: as the Belgæ, the Attrebatij, Pariſi, and the like names of people both in Gaule, and in Britaine, that after the warres there remained. Which is the more confirmed in that both the Prouinces were gouerned by one and the ſame Prince, as Cæſar in his owne remembrance knew, and nameth one Diuitiacus to hold a good part of Gaule, and alſo of Britaine vnder his gouernment. Yea and Tacitus the moſt curious ſearcher into Britaines affaires, in the life of Agricola thus diſciphereth them. Now (ſaith hee) what manner of men the firſt inhabitants of Britannie were, forraine brought in, or borne in the land, as among a barbarous people, it is not certainly knowen. Their complexions are different, and thence may ſome coniectures bee taken: for the red haire of the dwellers in Caledonia, and mighty lymmes import a German deſcent. The coloured countenances of the Silures, and haire moſt commonly curled, and ſite againſt Spaine, ſeeme to induce, that the old Spaniards paſſed the Sea, and poſſeſſed thoſe places. The neereſt to France likewiſe reſemble the French, either becauſe they retaine of the race from which they deſcended, or that in Countries butting together, the ſame aſpect of the heauens doth yeeld the ſame complexions of bodies. But generally it is moſt likely, the French being neereſt, did people the Land. In their ceremonies and ſuperſtitious perſwaſions, there is to be ſeene an apparant conformity. The Language differeth not much: like boldneſſe to challenge and ſet into dangers: when dangers come, like feare in refuſing: ſauing that the Britaines make ſhew of great courage, as being not mollified yet by long peace.

(8) Whereby wee ſee, that theſe Cimbrians (of whom, as Appian Alexandrinus ſaith, came the Celts, and of them the Gaules, as Plutarch in the life of Camillus affirmeth, with whom both Plato and Ariſtotle agree) were the ancient progenitors of theſe our Britaines: and them, with the Gaules, to be both one and the ſame people, is allowed by Pliny, that placeth them both in the continent of France; for ſo Euſtathius in his Commentarie vnderſtandeth Dionyſius Afar, that theſe Britaines in Gaule gaue name to the Iland now called GREAT BRITAINE, as Pomponius Letus and Beda before him had done. Theſe things conſidered, with the neerneſſe of their ſites for ready entercourſe, made both Ceſar and Tacitus to conceiue as they did. Neither were theſe things following ſmall motiues vnto them: for their religion was alike, ſaith Lucan and Tacitus: their boldneſſe in warres, and maner of armes alike, ſaith Strabo, Tacitus, Dion, Pliny, Herodian, and Mela: Their building alike, ſaith Ceſar and Strabo: their ornaments and manners alike, ſaith Pliny and Ceſar: their wits alike, ſaith Strabo and Tacitus: their language alike, ſaith learned Bodine: and in all things the vnconquered Britaines to the ancient Gaules alike, ſaith Tacitus. And all theſe doe warrant vs (me thinkes) to come from the Cimbrians, whoſe ſonnes, and our fathers, were the Celts and Gaules: the bands of whoſe amities were ſo linked together, that the Britaines gaue aid, and aſſiſted the Gaules againſt Ceſar, which was no ſmall cauſe of his quarrell againſt them.

Geffrey of Monmouth died in Anno 1152.

(12) But why do I attribute the worke to him, as the Author, ſith he profeſſeth himſelfe to be but the tranſlator of that hiſtory out of the Britiſh tongue, which Walter the Archdeacon of Oxford brought out of Normandie, and deliuered vnto him? For the further confirmation thereof, and more credit to his ſtory, Henry of Huntington, who liued in the time of king Stephen, and wrote likewiſe the hiſtory of this land, bringeth the line of Brute from Æneas the Troiane, and his arriuage and conqueſt to happen in the time of Heli his Prieſthood in the land of Iſrael, as Geffrey ap Arthur hath alſo done: not taking (as ſome thinke) any thing thereof from him, but rather out of an ancient booke intituled De Origine Regum Britannorum, found by himſelfe in the library of the Abbey of Bec, as he trauelled towards Rome: which hiſtory began at the arriuall of Brute, and ended with the acts of Cadwalader, as by a treatiſe of his owne inditing, bearing the ſame title, hath been compared, and found in all things agreeing with our vulgar hiſtory, as induſtrious Lamberd affirmeth himſelfe to haue ſeen. And Ninius is ſaid by the writer of the reformed hiſtory, to bring theſe Britaines from the race of the Troians, foure hundred yeeres before that Geffrey wrote: yea and long before Ninius alſo, Talieſin a Briton Poet in an Ode called Hanes, os Taieſſ his courſe of life, in theſe words, Mia deythymyma at wedillion Troia, that is, I came hither to the Remnants of Troy.

(13) That William of Malmesbury (who wrote in the daies of King Henry the firſt) was before him of Monmouth, is moſt certaine; yet doth he make mention of Arthur a Prince (ſaith he) deſeruing rather to be aduanced by the truth of records, then abuſed by falſe imputation of fables; being the only prop and vpholder of his country. And Beda, his ancient alſo, nameth Ambroſius Aurelianus to be King of the Britaines, long before that Geffrey was borne: So was Brennus mentioned by Liuy; Bellinus, (if he be Belgius) hy Iuſtine; Caſſibelan by Ceſar; Cunobilin by Suetonius; Aruiragus by Martial; Lucius by Euſebius; Coel, Conſtantius, Caranſius, and others by Eutropius, and Paulus Diaconus; and Helena by Nicephorus, Ambroſe, and Socrates. Theſe are the affirmatiues that giue countenance to the Archdeacon of Monmouths tranſlation, and credit to Brutes conqueſts and ſucceſſours; yea and Iohn Harding his Herauld, in his home-ſpun poetry, can eaſily emblaze his armes to be Gules, charged with two lions rampant endorſed Ore; and the ſame to be borne by the Kings of Troy. And his banner diſplaied at his entrance is ſaid to be Vert a Diana of gold fitchel, crowned, and inthronized, the ſame that Æneas bare, when he entred the land of the Latines. But the cenſures of theſe relations I leaue to the beſt liking of iudicious Readers, only wiſhing them to be vnlike the inhabitants vnder the rockes of the Cataracts of Nilus, whereof Cicero and Amianus make mention, who were made deafe by the continuall noiſe of the fall of Nilus: leſt by the ſound and loud voices of theſe writers, the exceptions of others cannot be heard, which from the fulneſſe of their pennes I will likewiſe declare, without offence, I hope, vnto any.

(14) Firſt (with a reuerend reſeruation had to the ſacred hiſtories) Varro the moſt learned Latine writer, diuiding times motions into three ſeuerall parts, that is, from the creation to the flood, which he termeth altogether vncertaine: from the flood to the firſt Olympiad (by Beroaldus computation ſet in the yeere of the world 3154. and thirty one of the raigne of Ioas, king of Iudah: ſeuen hundred ſeuenty and foure yeers before the birth of our Sauiour) he calleth fabulous: and the laſt age from the firſt Olympiad to himſelfe, he nameth hiſtoricall. Now the ſtory of Brute beginning two hundred ſixty ſeuen yeeres before the firſt Olympiad, falleth in the time wherin nothing els is related, either of the Greeks or Latines, the only learned writers, but fables and tales, as both himſelfe and others haue told vs, much more then, among the barbarous, vnlettred, and vnciuill nations, as all theſe parts of the world then were.

The like helpes had he from Abbat Eſſius, for the country of Eaſt-Angles; from Cymbertus and the brethren of Laſtinge for the prouince of Mercia, and Eaſt-Saxons. And from the brethren of Lindisfarnum, for the country of Northumberland; beſides his owne paines in collections, knowledge and experience: all which he did diſgeſt and hiſtorically compile, and before the publication thereof ſent it to king Ceolulphe at that time raigning in Northumberland, to be approued or corrected by his moſt learned skill: yet in none of theſe found he that hiſtory of Brute nor his ſucceſſors, which as ſome would haue it, was then vnbegotten in the world.

A deuice to put by this William of Newburghs accuſation.

But I know the anſwer to this ſo great an accuſation: namely, that this William making ſute vnto Dauid ap Owen Gwyneth, Prince of North-wales, for the Biſhoprick of Saint Aſſaphs, after the death of Geffrey, and thereof failing, falſly ſcandalized and impudently belied that moſt reuerend man. Deſcript. Camb. cap. 7. He flouriſhed in Anno 1210. Giraldus Cambrenſis calleth Bruts hiſtory the fabulous ſtory of Ieffrey.

(17) For Sylueſter Giraldus, commonly called Cambrenſis, that flouriſhed in the ſame time with the ſaid author, made no doubt to terme it The fabulous ſtory of Geffrey. The like is verified by Iohn Weathamſtead Abbat of Saint Albanes, a moſt iudicious man that wrote in anno 1440. who in his Granarie giueth ſentence of this hiſtory as followeth. The whole diſcourſe of Brutus (ſaith he) is rather poeticall, then hiſtoricall, and for diuers reaſons is built more vpon opinion then truth; firſt becauſe there is no mention thereof made in the Romane ſtory, either of his killing his father, or of the ſaid birth, or yet of baniſhing the ſonne. Secondly, for that Aſcanius begat no ſuch ſonne who had for his proper name Syluius by any approued Author: for according to them, he begat only one ſonne, and his name was Iulius, from whom the family of the Iulij tooke their beginning. And thirdly, Syluius Poſthumus, whom perhaps Geffrey meaneth; was the ſonne of Aeneas by his wife Lauinia, and he begetting his ſonne Aeneas in the thirty eight yeer of his raigne, ended his life by courſe of naturall death. The kingdome therfore now called England, was not heretofore, as many will haue, named Britaine of Brutus the ſonne of Syluius. Wherfore it is a vaine opinion and ridiculous to challenge noble blood, and yet to want a probable ground of the challenge: for it is manhood only that enobleth a nation; and it is the mind alſo with perfect vnderſtanding, and nothing els, that gaineth gentility to a man. And therefore Seneca writeth in his Epiſtles to Plato, that there is no King but he came from vaſſals, and no vaſſall but he came from Kings. Wherefore to conclude, let this ſuffice (ſaith he) that the Britaines from the beginning of their nobility haue been couragious and valiant in fight, that they haue ſubdued their enemies on euery ſide, and that they vtterly refuſe the yoke of ſeruitude.

Aſcanius had no ſonne whoſe proper name was Syluius.

A ridiculous thing to vſurpe gentility.

Wiſedome the true nobility.

Seneca Epiſt. 44.

(18) Now that William of Newborough, had ſufficient cauſe (ſay ſome) to exclaime againſt the fantacies of Merline, and the fictions of Arthur, is made manifeſt in the ſequel, not only by the decree of that obtruded Councel of Trent, wherein was inhibited the publication of Merlines books; but alſo (in effect) by the ſtatute enacted the fifth yeere of our laſt deceaſed Queene Elizabeth of bleſſed and immortall memorie, wherein is forbidden ſuch fantaſticall predictions, vpon occaſions of Armes, Fields, Beaſts, Badges, Cognizances, or Signets, ſuch as Merline ſtood moſt vpon; and likewiſe William of Malmsbury ſaith, that Arthur being the only proppe that vpheld his country, deſerued rather to be aduanced by truth, then abuſed with fables wherewith that ſtory is moſt plentifully ſtored. And alſo, that Weathamſtead had reaſon to account Brutes acts and conqueſts, to be rather poeticall then any waies warranted by the records of truth, appeareth by the ſilence of the Romane writers therein, who name neither Brute nor his father in the genealogie of the Latine Kings: and if any ſuch were, (ſaith the contradictors) how could they be ignorant of the vntimely death of their king, ſlaine by the hand of his naturall (though in this act vnnaturall) ſonne? or what ſhould moue them, being ſo lauiſh in their own commendations, to be thus ſilent in their Brutes worthineſſe, that with ſeuen thouſand diſperſed Troians warred ſo victoriouſly in Gallia, conquered a kingdome of Giants, ſubdued a moſt famous Iland, raigned glorioufly, and left the ſame to his poſterity; none of them, either in proſe or poetry once handled, but left to deſtiny to be preſerued by a long enſuing meanes, or to periſh in obliuion for euer? And ſurely this moued the whole ſenate of great Clerks to giue ſentence, that neuer any ſuch Brute raigned in the world; ſuch as were Boccace, Viues, Hadrian Iunius, Polydore, Buchanan, Vignier, Genebrard, Molinæus, Bodine, and others.

Brute not mentioned in the genealogie of the Latine Kings.

(19) Yea, and there are ſome Criticks that faine would take aduantage from the defenders of Brutes hiſtory themſelues, as from Sir Iohn Prys, that produceth many vncertain enſamples of the originall of other nations; which granted, (ſay they) doth no waies confirme the truth or certainty of our owne; neither is it any honour to deriue theſe Britaines from the ſcumme of ſuch conquered people as the Troians were. Humfry Lhuyd likewiſe denying abſolutely the deriuation of the Britaines name from Brute, and bringing it from two compounded words, (as we haue ſaid) doth thereby weaken the credit of his conqueſt of this Iland to their vnderſtanding, as alſo the catalogue of his ſucceſſors, which are ſaid to raigne ſucceſſiuely for many hundred of yeeres after him. And another induſtrious Britiſh writer, hauing the help of two moſt ancient Britiſh copies, the collections of Caradock of Carnaruan, their owne Bardies euery third-yeeres viſitation, and twenty ſeuen authors of good account, (all of them cited in the preface of his Chronicle) beſides his helps had in the offices of records for this realme; yet aſending no higher then to the perſon of Cadwallader, Prince of Wales, whoſe raign was in the yeere of Chriſts incarnation 682. and no leſſe then one thouſand ſeuen hundred twenty and ſixe yeeres, after that Brute is ſaid to come into this Iland, doth not warrant (ſay they) the ſtory that is included betwixt, but rather euē the ſame is interlaced with many doubtfull vncertainties, and ſo left diſputable by the ſaid compiler himſelfe; as namely whether that this Cadwallader whome the Britaines claime to be their king, be not the ſame Cheawald whom the Saxons would haue theirs; both liuing at one time, both in acts alike, and names neere, both abandoning their kingdomes, both taking the habit of religion, both dying in Rome, both buried in one Church, nay, ſay they, in one Sepulchre. The like he bringeth of the Britaines Iuor, and the Saxons Iue, in the like coherences of names, acts, deuotions, and deaths: ſo that this hiſtory of Brute carrieth not ſo ſmooth a current for paſſage as is wiſhed, nor is that Gordeons knot ſo eaſily vnlooſed.

And yet goeth further: Though the Scripture (saith hee) alledge Iudah, Hezron, Salomon, and Ezekiah, to be but yong when they begat their sonnes, which (as Rabbi Isack saith) might be at thirteene yeeres of age: And although Saint Augustine say, that the strength of youth may beget children yong; and Hierome bringeth instance of a boy that at ten yeeres of age begot a childe: yet this doth not helpe to excuse the mistaking of yeeres for the British Kings aboue mentioned.

Thus far Iohn Lewis: and for the exceptions made against Brute: wherin I haue altogether vsed the words of others; & will now (without offence, I hope) adde a supposall of mine owne, seeing I am fallen into the computation of times, which is the onely touch-stone to the truth of histories, especially such as are limited by the bounds of the sacred Scriptures, as this for Brutes entrance is. And that the same cannot bee so ancient (supposing it were neuer so certaine) as the vulgar opinion hitherto hath held, the circumstance of time, to my seeming sufficiently doth prooue.

The Authors owne opinion of Brutes history.

(20) For Brutes conquest and entrance are brought by his Author to fall in the eighteenth yeere of Heli his Priesthood in the Land of Israel, and so is fastned into a computation that cannot erre. Now the eighteenth yeere of Helies gouernment, by the holy Scriptures most sure account, is set in the yeer of the worlds creation 2887. after the vniuersall flood 1231. and before the birth of our blessed Sauiour 1059. yeeres. Brute then liuing in this foresaid time, was foure descents from the conquered Troians (as he of Monmouth hath laid downe) which were Æneas, Ascanius, Syluius, and himselfe: so that by these generations succession in order, the very yeere almost of Troys destruction may certainly be pointed out and knowen: which in searching hath been found so doubtfull, that by some it hath beene thought to be a meere fable. Yet with more reuerence to antiquity obserued, let vs cast and compare the continuance of these foure generations vnto Brutes Conquest, not shortning them with Baruch, to be but ten yeeres to an age: neither lengthning them with Iosephus, who accounteth one hundred and seuenty yeeres for a generation: but with more indifferency let vs with Herodotus, who wrote neerer these times, allow thirty yeeres for a succession, as hee accounteth in his second booke. Now foure times thirty make one hundred and twenty, the number of yeeres that these foure Princes successiuely did liue: by which computation likewise measured by Scripture, the ruination of Troy fell in the thirty eight yeere of Gideons gouernment in Israel, and was the yeere after the worlds creation 2768. But the authority of Clemens Alexandrinus, alleged out of Menander, Pergamenus, and Letus, destroieth that time of Troies destruction, and placeth it fully two hundred and thirtie yeeres after, euen in the raigne of King Salomon: for in his first booke Stromaton thus he writeth: Menelaus from the ouerthrow of Troy came into Phœnicia, at that time when Hiram King of Tyrus gaue his daughter in mariage vnto Salomon King of Israel. Where, by him we see, that Troies ruines and Salomons raigne fell both vpon one time. And so Brute hath lost of his antiquity, by this account, 230. yeers; and entred not in Helies Priesthood, but rather in the vsurpation of Iudahs Kingdome by Athalia, and in the yeere of the world 3118.

Baruch. 6. 2. Ioseph. contra Appion. lib. 1. Herodotus in Euterpe. Iudg. 8. 28. Clemens Alexand. Appion. lib. 1. & 2.

(21) To whom let vs ioine Iosephus, an Author of great credit, & without suspicion in this case, who in his Nations defence against Appion, in both his bookes, confidently affirmeth himselfe able to proue by the Phœnician Records of warrantable credit, that the city Carthage was built by Dido, sister to Pigmalion, one hundred fifty and fiue yeeres after the raigne of King Hiram, which was Salomons friend, and one hundred forty three yeeres, and eight moneths after the building of his most beautifull Temple. Now wee know by Virgil, from whom all these glorious tales of Troy are told, that Carthage was in building by the same Dido at such time as Æneas came from Troies ouerthrow, through the Seas of his manifold aduentures. If this testimonie of Iosephus be true, then fals Troies destruction about the twentieth yeere of Ioas raigne ouer Iudah, which was the yeere of the worlds creation 3143. whereunto if we adde one hundred & twenty yeeres for the foure descēts before specified, then wil Brutes conquest of this Iland fall with the twelfth of Iothams raigne in the Kingdome of Iudah, which meets with the yeere of the worlds continuance 3263. And so hath he againe lost of his antiquity no lesse then 375. yeeres.

(22) And yet to make a deeper breach into Brutes story, and to set the time, in a point so vncertaine, as from which neither circle nor line can be truly drawen; Manethon the Historian Priest of Egypt, in his second booke cited by Iosephus, affirmeth that the Israelites departure from Egypt was almost a thousand yeeres before the warres of Troy. If this be so (as it seemeth Iosephus alloweth it so) and one hundred and twenty yeeres more added, for the foure descents aboue mentioned, the number will fall about the yeer of the worlds creation 3630. long after the death of Alexander the Great, and Greeke Monarch. By which account the great supposed antiquity of Brute, is now lessened by seuen hundred fifty and two yeeres; and the time so scantelized betwixt his and Cæsars entrance, that two hundred forty six yeeres onely remaine: a time by much too short for seuenty two Princes, which successiuely are said to raigne each after others, and from Brute to Cæsar recorded to haue swaied the regall Scepter of this Iland.

Manethon cited by Ioseph. cont. Appion. lib. 1. Israelites depart from Egypt 1000. yeers before the warres of Troy, by Iosephus account. Ioseph. cont. Appion. lib. 1. Brutes conquest rather after Alexander the great.

Two hundred forty six yeeres a time to short for the raigne of seuenty two Kings.

(23) But vnto these obiections I know the answer will be ready; namely the diuersities of Scriptures account, being so sundry and different, that the story of Brute cannot thereby bee touched, but still standeth firme vpon it selfe. Indeed I must confesse, that from the first Creation, to the yeere of mans Redemption, the learned Hebrewes, Greeks, and Latines, differ much, and that not only each from others, but euen among themselues so farre, that there can be no indifferent reconciliation made, as by these seuerall computaitons may be seene, as followeth:

And yet doe these disagreements helpe little the Obiectors if this be considered, that the maine foundation of these diuersities consisteth chiefly in the first world before the Flood, wherin it is manifest, that the reputed Septuagint addeth to the Hebrew Originall fiue hundred eighty and six yeeres. And from the Flood to Abrahams birth, is accounted eight hundred & fifty yeeres more then Moses hath. As likewise the like is done in the latter times: for from the Captiuity of Babylon to the death of Christ, one hundred thirty and seuen yeeres are added more then the Sunnes course hath measured: so that it seemeth the differences were not great for the times of Heli, Salomon, nor Iudahs Kings, in whose raignes Brute is brought to people, and possesse this Iland. But leauing these diuersities, and to come to a certainty, let vs calculate, the yeeres of the holy historie according as Funcitius, Beroaldus, and sundry other Theologike Chronologers

Ioseph. Antiquit. lib. 1. cap. 7.

Funcitius. Beroaldus.

The accounting of yeeres by the Scripture is a moſt ſure maner of computation.

nologers haue done, who from the Scriptures moſt ſure account ſo tye the ſtories of times together, that like to a golden chaine, the linkes are faſtned each to other, and the whole ſo compleate, that a yeere is not miſſing from the fall of man, vnto the full time of his redemption.

From the creation to the flood, 1656.

(24) Firſt then from the Creation to the Flood are reckoned yeeres 1656. gathered by a triple account, from the ages, begettings, and deaths of the fathers. The like is thence obſerued for foure hundred twenty and ſeuen yeeres, that is, to the ſeuenty fifth of Abrahams life, wherin God began to tie the times accounts in holier ſummes: for Terah, the firſt recorded Idolater, was the laſt in honour that had the Sunnes courſe meaſured by mans life. And now the bonds of time tie the Promiſe to Abraham, to bee before the Law foure hundred and thirty yeeres, as the Apoſtle to the Galathians affirmeth. From the Law to the building of Salomons Temple, and that in the fourth yeere of his raigne, were yeeres foure hundred and eighty: and from that foundation, to his death, were thirty ſix yeeres: for his whole raigne was forty. From his death and Kingdomes diuiſion, vnto the burning of that Temple, which was executed in the nineteenth of Nebuchadnezzar King of Babel, were yeeres three hundred and ninty, as by the daies of Ezekiels ſiege and ſleepe appeareth in the ſecond and fifth verſes of his fourth Chapter. From the burning of the Temple, to the end of Iudahs captiuity, were yeeres fifty and one, for the whole time of Babels bondage contained ſeuenty yeeres, as Ieremy 25. 11. whereof nineteene were expired; and fifty one remaining vnto the firſt yeere of Cyrus their deliuerer, whom the Lord in that regard calleth his anointed, Iſay 45.1. In the firſt yeere of whoſe Monarchie he publiſhed an Edict for the returne of the Iewes and new building of their Temple, as in the books of Chronicles and of Ezra is ſeene. And from this firſt yeere and proclamation of King Cyrus, vnto the laſt yeere and death of Chriſt our Sauiour, the great yeere of Iubile, the acceptable time, wherein he trod the winepreſſe alone; to the finiſhing of the ceremonies, the taking away of ſinne, the reconciling of iniquity, the bringing in of euerlaſting righteouſneſſe, to the ſealing vp of viſion and prophecie, and to the anointing of the moſt holy; were yeeres foure hundred and ninety, as the Prophet Daniel from the Angell Gabriel receiued, and vnto vs hath deliuered, Dan. 9. 24. all which added together, make the number to be three thouſand nine hundred and threeſcore yeeres. And by this ſaid computation, I haue accounted Brutes ſtory, as all others wherein I ſhall bee occaſioned to ſpeake.

(25) Laſtly, if from among theſe miſty clouds of ignorance no light can be gotten, and that wee will needs haue our deſcents from the Troians; may wee not then more truly deriue our blood from them through the Romanes, who for the ſpace of foure hundred threeſcore and ſix yeeres were planted amongſt vs? in which continuance it is moſt certaine, they tooke of our women to be their wiues, and gaue their women to be wiues vnto vs, ſeeing that ſome of their Emperors did the like themſelues, and from whoſe blood, ſaith Beda, the Britaine Ambroſius lineally deſcended. And if beauty & parts be the inſtigatours vnto loue, as in the firſt world we ſee it was, no doubt then the features of the Britaines were mouing Angels vnto the Romanes, whoſe faces euē in thoſe times were accounted to be angelicall, and whoſe perſonages as yet, are reſpected as the beſt (if not better) then any other in the world. But that the Romans themſelues deſcended from the Troians, or Æneas ſhould be the roote of the Iulian family, howſoeuer the fictions of Poets as a ſpring tide haue flowed from the fulneſſe of their pennes, yet Tacitus their beſt writer, accounteth thoſe things not far vnlike to old fables, wherein he iudgeth that Nero to win credit before the Conſuls, & to get reputation in the glory of eloquence, vndertooke the pleading of the Ilienſes cauſe, declaring the Romanes deſcent from Troy: and the Iuly from the loines of Æneas, which notwithſtanding he cenſureth as is ſaid. And Ioſephus in the diſperſion of Noahs ſonnes and families, affirmeth that Romus was the Originall of the old Romanes and he of Chus, and Cham, if he meane as he ſpeaketh. To conclude; (by what deſtiny I know not) nations deſire their originals from the Troians, yet certaine it is, that no honor from them can be brought, whoſe city and fame ſtood but for ſix deſcents, as vnder the raignes of Dardanus, Erichthonius, Tros, Ilus, Laomedon, & Priamus, during which time they were thrice vanquiſhed; twice by Hercules in the daies of Laomedon, and the third time raſed by the rage of the Grecians in the raigne of King Priamus, and the Troians themſelues made as it were the ſcum of a conquered people. And therefore as France hath caſt off their Francio King Priamus his ſonne, Scotland their Scotia King Pharaoes daughter, Denmarke their Danus, Ireland their Hiberus, and other Countries their Demi-gods; ſo let BRITAINES likewiſe with them diſclaime their BRVTE, that bringeth no honour to ſo renowned a Nation, but rather cloudeth their glorie in the murders of his parents, and imbaſeth their deſcents, as ſprung from Venus that laſciuious Adultereſſe: of whom ſaith du Pleſſis, I am aſhamed that the heathen were not aſhamed of this ſhamefulnes; but much more that Chriſtians bluſh not to name her in their verſes.

Britaines may more truly deriue their deſcent from Troy by the Romanes.

Britaines tooke wiues of the Romanes, and they of the Britaines.

THE MANNERS AND CVSTOMES OF THE ANCIENT BRITAINES.

CHAPTER IV.

HAuing thus farre ſpoken of the ancient Names of this famous Iland, and of the Nations acknowledged to bee the firſt Planters and Poſſeſſors thereof; it remaineth that ſomewhat be mentioned of the Manners and Cuſtomes of thoſe people and times, though not ſo pleaſing or acceptable as were to be wiſhed, for that the clouds of ignorance and barbarous incinility did then ſhadow and ouer-ſpread almoſt all the Nations of the earth: wherein I deſire to lay imputation no further then is ſufficiently warranted by moſt autentike Writers: and firſt from Cæſar, who formoſt of all the Romanes diſcouered and deſcribed our ancient Britaines.

Of their Perſons. Cæſ. Comment. li. 5. where hee vſeth the word Lutens.

(2) Touching their perſons: All the Britaines (ſaith Cæſar) vſed to die themſelues with woad, which ſetteth a blew colour vpon them, and that maketh them more terrible to behold in battle. But Pomponius Mela therein mo-

ueth a doubt. They died their bodies (ſaith he) with Woad; but whether to make a gallãt ſhew, or for what other cauſe elſe is vncertaine. And yet Herodian herein abſolutely determineth, where hee ſaith, that the Britaines knew no vſe of garments at all; but about their waſtes and neckes wore chaines of iron, ſuppoſing them a goodly ornament, and a proofe of their wealth: and their bare bodies they marked with ſundry pictures repreſenting all manner of liuing creatures, and therefore they would not be clad, for hiding the gay paintings of their bodies: To which painting Pliny alſo agreeth, and deſcribeth that hearb woad, to be like to the Plantine in Gallia, naming it Glaſtum, with the iuice whereof (ſaith he) the women of Britaine, as well wiues as young women, anoint and die their bodies all ouer: reſembling by that tincture the colour of the Æthiopians, in which manner they vſe at ſolemne feaſts and ſcrifices to goe all naked. And Dio Nicæus out of the epitome of Xiphilinus ſaith, that the cuſtome of that Nation was, to abide in tents all naked and vnſhod. Notwithſtanding, Cæſar doth elſewhere report, that they clad themſelues in leather, which perchance is meant of the ciuiller ſort of them, and in time of battell. Solinus likewiſe ſpeaking of the Britaines, ſaith, their Country is peopled partly with Barbarians, who by meanes of artificiall inciſions of ſundry forms, haue from their childhood diuers ſhapes of beaſts incorporate vpon them; and hauing their markes deeply imprinted within their bodies, looke how their groweth for ſtature, ſo doe theſe pictured characters likewiſe increaſe. Neither do theſe ſauage Nations repute any thing a greater teſtimonie of their patience, then by ſuch durable skars to make their lims drinke in much painting and colour. Theſe skarres by Tertullian are tearmed Britannorum ſtigmata, The Britaines markes. And vnto this skie-colour, or blewiſh dyings, it ſeemeth Martial had relation in his praiſes of Lady Claudia:

Claudia, cæruleis cum ſit Rufina Britannis,
Edita, cur Latia pectora plebis habet?
Sith Claudia comes of azur'd Britains race, whence comes her minde ſo deckt with Roman grace?

And of this vſe of painting, as our great Antiquary iudgeth; both the Britains had their primitiue deriuation, and the Picts (a branch of Britiſh race) a long time after, for that their accuſtomed manner, were called Picti by the Romans, that is, the painted people.

(3) The haire of their heads, ſaith Cæſar, they let grow, & wore long, which naturally was curled, and of colour yellow (as in the Panegyricke Oration aſcribed to Mamertinus, and ſpoken in praiſe of Maximianus, is to be ſeene) all other parts of their bodies being ſhauen, ſauing only the head and vpper lippe. Yet their complections were much different, as by Tacitus wee ſee, who auoucheth that ſome of thoſe Ilanders were red of haire, as the Calydonians in the Northerne Promontories; the haire of the Silures coloured & curled, like to the old Spaniards; and thoſe neereſt vnto Gallia reſembled their complections, though not altogether ſo yellow, ſaith Strabo. But their wit by Tacitus is preferred before them, and their ſtatures more tall, as Strabo affirmeth, whoſe lineaments ſhewed a good making of body; and meaſurable proportion in all parts anſwerable. Their women faire, and of exceeding good features, as is deſcribed by the Romane Writers. Such was Boudicea, ſaith Xiphilinus; Claudia and Helena, ſaith Martial and Eutropius.

(4) That the ſtrength of nature wrought long in the Britaines, we read of out Plutarch, who reporteth that the people liued one hundred & twenty yeeres, for that, ſaith he, their cold and frozen Country kept in their naturall heat: whoſe conditions by Diodorus Siculus are commended to be plaine & vpright, farre from the wilineſſe & craft of the Romans. And by Strabo their diſpoſitions are partly reſembled to the Gaules, but yet ſomewhat more rude and plaine; and thoſe moſt ciuill, who were the inhabitants of Kent, by reaſon of their oftner cõuerſing with other Nations, as Cæſar ſheweth. But the farther in the continent, the more rude, & leſſe acquainted with other kind of riches beſides cattell, as Pomponius Mela affirmeth.

(5) Now touching their domeſticke matters. Their buildings were many, and like to them of the Gaules ſaith Iulius Cæſar; notwithſtanding they giue the name of Townes to certaine combers of woods, which they haue fortified with rampires and ditches, whether they retreat, and reſort to eſchue the inuaſions of their enemies. Which ſtand them in good ſtead, ſaith Strabo: for when they haue by felling of trees, mounted, and fenced therewith a ſpacious round plot of ground; there they build for themſelues houſes and cottages, and for their cattell ſet vp ſtalles and folds, but thoſe for the preſent vſe onely, and not for long continuance. Which, as Diodorus Siculus ſaith, were vſually thacked with reed; but the cities without walls, and the country without townes, as Dion deſcribeth the Caledonians and Meats.

(6) Their wiues were ten or twelue a peece, as Cæſar hath alleaged, which they held common among brothers and parents, yet the iſſue reputed his, who firſt maried the mother when ſhe was a maide, and Dio indeed affirmeth no leſſe, adding withal, that the children thus begotten, were foſtred & brought vp in common among them. And Euſebius likewiſe teſtifieth, that many Britaines together kept one wife in common to them all. This community in mariage moued Iulia the Empreſſe of Seuerus; to twit the wife of Argetecaxus, that the faſhion of the women of Britaine in accompanying with men, was very impudent; to whom ſhe replied and ſaid, we Britiſh women do indeed herein differ from you Roman Ladies; for wee ſatiſfie our appetite, by accompanying with the worthieſt men, and that openly, but you with euery baſe fellow, in a corner.

(7) For their diet; it was a hainous matter with them to eate either Hen, Hare, or Gooſe, ſaith Cæſar, which notwithſtanding they bred for their pleaſures; neither fed daintily at full and rich tables, as Diodorus Siculus affirmeth, but rather in neceſſity could liue vpon barkes and roots of trees, and with a kind of meat no bigger then a beane, after which for a good time they did neither hunger nor thirſt, ſaith Dio Nicæus: who likewiſe teſtifieth, that the Britains did till no ground, neither eat fiſh, though their riuers therof be plẽteouſly ſtored, but liued vpõ prey, veniſion, and fruits: to which alſo Cæſar addeth milke, whereof (ſaith Strabo) they had not then skill to make cheeſe. And according to Solinus, their vſuall drinke was made of barley. But for tillage, Pliny ſeemeth to contradict Dio, affirming that the Britaines manured their grounds with Marle in ſteed of dung; which argueth no ſuch ſimplicity in gardning, Planting, and in other like points of husbandry as Strabo doth tax them with. And this foreſaid temperance of diet differeth much from that which Saint Hierome chargeth their neighbours the Anthropophagi of Ireland, who vſed to feed on the buttocks of boies, and womens paps, as their moſt dainty and delicate diſh.

(8) For their religion, or rather diabolicall ſuperſtition, it was as the reſt of the world (ſome few excepted) when Satan had clouded the truth of Gods doctrine, by the foggy myſts of confuſed darkneſſe. For Tacitus makes their ſuperſtitions, and ceremonies to be the ſame in conformity with the Gaules. And what that was, Dio Caſſius in his Nero, and Solinus in his hiſtory doe declare; who doe aſcribe to them the moſt inhumane offering of mans fleſh in their ſacrfices: And beſides their ancient Idols, ſuch as Dis, Iupiter, Appollo, Diana, and the like, they worſhipped Andates for their Goddeſſe of Victory, vnto all which they performed no ſmal adorations and honors, imputing their proſperities vnto them: vnto whom alſo they erected temples with ſuch magnificence as they then had; whoſe walls, as it ſeemeth, long after remained, whereon ſome of thoſe prophane portraitures with deformed lineaments were ſeene by mournfull Gil-

Herodian.

Pliny alſo addeth another ornament, and ſaith that the Britains wore rings on their middle finger.

The Britaines would not be clad, becauſe they would ſhew the gay paintings of their bodies.

Plinie.

Oribaſius calleth that herb Vitrum; and the Britains call that colour, glaſſe. whence our Engliſh word glaſſe (called alſo Vitrum in Latin) may ſeeme to be taken, by reaſon of the colour thereof.

das, carrying a sterne and grim countenance, after the wonted heathenish manner: here see we (saith he) vpon these desert walles, the vgly features of the Britains Idols, meerely diabolicall, & in number almost exceeding those of Egypt. So by Tacitus they are noted with the common custome of the Gentiles, which was, that they sought for the direction of their Gods by the looking into the entrals of Beasts, yea and of men too; and that they honored the Altars of their Gods with the sacrifice and blood of such as they tooke captiue in wars. And Plinie writing of Magick, saith, that in his daies the art thereof in Britaine was highly honored, and all the people thereunto so much deuoted, yea and with all such complements of ceremonies in the same to be performed, that a man would thinke the Persians had learned all their Magick skill from them, Priests and instructers had they, whereof the chiefe were called Druides, whose office was imploied about holy things, saith Cæsar; for they had the managing or publike & priuate sacrifices, and to interpret and discusse matters of religion. Vnto them doe resort great numbers of young men to learn at their hands, and they be had in great reuerence. For they determine almost all controuersies, and matters in variance, as well publike as priuate. And if there happen any thing to be done amisse, if there be any murther committed, if there rise any controuersie concerning inheritance or bounds of lands, they take the matter into their power, and award either recompence or penalties in the case. And if there be any, be he pruate person, or be it corporation, that will not stand to their iudgement, they interdict him, which punishment among them is held most grieuous. They that are so excõmunicated, are accounted in the number of the wicked and vngracious: all men shun them, all men eschue their company and communicaton, lest by conuersing with them, they should defile themselues and receiue harme. If they demand law, they may not haue it: neither may they enioy any place of honor. Ouer all those Druides, there is one Primate, which hath chiefe authority ouer them. When he is dead, if there be any of the rest that excelleth in worthinesse, he succeedeth: or if there be any equall, he is chosen by voices of the rest, and diuers times they striue for the soueraignty by force of armes.

Plinie: Magick highly honored of the Britaines.

Cæsar. com. 6.

The Druides determine almost all controuersies.

Excommunication of great force in the time of the ancient Britaines.

Among the Druides one Primat and chiefe ouer the rest.

These men at a certaine season of the yeere, in the borders of the Caruntes (whose country is counted the middle of all Gallia) do sit together in a place hallowed, whereunto resort from all sides all such as haue any controuersies: and looke what is decreed and Iudged by them that they stand vnto. This order of discipline is thought to haue had beginning in Britaine, & from thence to haue been brought into Gallia. And at this day, they that are desirous to attaine this skill more exactly, do commonly repaire thither to learne it. These Druides customably are exempted from the wars, neither do they pay taxes and tallages with other folke: for they are pruiledged as from the wars, so from all other burthens. Allured with so great rewards, many euen of their owne accord, do register themselues in that order, and diuers are sent thither by their parents and kinsfolke. Where they are reported to learne a great number of verses by heart. Whereof it commeth to passe, that diuers continue twenty yeeres in learning. Neither do they thinke it lawfull to put them in writing, whereas in al other things, for their accounts, as well publike as priuate, they vse the Greek letters.

They assemble once a yeare at a place in France to heare controuersies.

Here appeareth that Academies were then amongst the Britans, and from their example deriued into other countries.

They are exempted from war.

Their schollers must learne a great many verses by heart.

They vse the Greek letters lest their skill should be too common.

This order they seeme (in mine opinion) saith he, to haue taken for two considerations: partly because they will not haue their discipline published among the common people; and partly because they will not that they which shall learne, trusting too much to their bookes, should haue the lesse regard of remembrance: in that it hapneth well neere to most men, that vpon trust of the helpe of their booke, they are slacker in learning things by heart, and lesse care to beare them in mind. This is one of the chiefest things that they labour most to beat into mens minds, that the Soules die not, but doe after death passe from one to another: and hereby they thinke men should be most stirred vnto virtue, when the feare of death is nothing regarded. Also they dispute many other things: as of the stars, and their oft mouings: of the bignesse of the world, and the earth: of the nature of things: of the strength and power of the goddes immortall: and do therein instruct the youth. Vnto these Druides and their doctrine had Lucan the Poet relation in his first booke towards the end, where he writeth thus of them.

Their Theology is, that the soule dieth not, but passeth from one to another.

(9) These Britaines being meerly barbarous, as most of the Western parts of the world then were, liued priuatly to themselues with scarce any commerce, or entercourse with any other nation: neither indeed were much known to forraine people for a long time. For the first notice of them extant, was by Polybius the Greeke writer, that accompanied Scipio in his warres about the yeare of the worlds creation 3720. and two hundred and nine before the birth of our Sauiour Christ. Which Author nameth their Iland to be plenteously stored with Tynne: but of other things therin is silent, seying that al those parts which lay betwixt Tanais and Narbor bending Northward, in his daies were vnknowne & vncertaine, and therefore the reporters of them he held as dreamers. So doth Cambden another Polybius account it a prodigall humor of credulity, to be perswaded that Himilco from the estate of Carthage to discouer the coasts of Europe, in the said expedition entred this Iland: or that Hannibal should war in this Iland, because Polybius in the Eclogues of his tenth booke saith, that he was inclosed within the streets of Britaine, which place is mistaken for the Brutij in Italy: or that Alexander came from the East Indians, to Gades, and from thence into Britaine, though Cedrenus say so, seeing all other writers are against it; or that Vlysses, (ancient enough if he be that Elishah the sonne of Iauan, the fourth sonne of Iapheth) should visit Britaine in his trauels, whereof Brodæus maketh doubt; though Solinus report that an Altar in Caledonia was erected, and Vlysses in Greeke letters thereon inscribed. Which might very well be: for who doubteth but that the Greeks, in their vaine deuotions, did both build and sacrifice vnto their Gods, which they made of their worthiest men? and sith Vlysses, (in regard of his farre sea-trauels) was had in speciall account among all nauigators, why might not such monuments be reared, and his name inscribed, as farre as the Grecians trauelled, though his person neuer came there?

The like examples we haue now of Cap. Henry. &c.

The Romans not mentioned either by Thucydides or Herodotus.

ent times, as that nither Thucydides nor Herodotus made mention of them: yea and with much adoe at last were heard of by the Grecians themselues: as Iosephus affirmeth; And if the Gaules and Spaniards, (inhabitants in the continent) for many yeeres together were vtterly vnknowen to the worlds historiographers; shall we then thinke, that this remote Iland, and people then far from ciuility, were noted foorth with markes of more certainty? surely to my seeming, nothing lesse: seeing that their next neighbors the Gaules knew not so much as what manner of men they were: none resorting thither, except some few merchants, and they no further, then vpon the sea coasts, neither able to describe the bigneſse of the Iland, the puissance of the inhabitants, their order for war, the lawes that they vsed, the customes of the people, nor their hauens for the receit of ships; all which Cæsar by diligent inquiry sought after, but could find no satisfaction till he had sent some purposely to search it out.

(10) Neither is this their want of knowledge to bee wondred at, seeing the entercourse of their trafficke was vpheld by so meane commodities: for Strabo saith, that their merchandizing chiefly consisted in Iuory Boxes, Sheeres, Onches, Bits, and Bridles, Wreathes and Chains, with other conceits made of Amber and Glasse; for which notwithstanding they were compelled to pay customes and impostes vnto Octauian Augustus, as elsewhere shall be shewed.

(11) And as their commodities were very mean, so were their meanes either for exportation or importation very slender in those times; I meane their shipping. It is true, that some are of opinion, that Ships were first inuented in these our Seas: but that this should be true, I haue cause to doubt, that Art being long before inspired by God himselfe into the heart of Noah for making the Arke: and no doubt practised by that patterne of many others. But that the ancient Britaines had ships of reasonable vse, though of simple Art, Cæsar testifieth, saying, that the keeles and ribs of their ships were of light wood, and couered ouer with leather: which kinde the now-Britaines call Corraghs: and with them (saith Polybistor) they did saile betwixt Britannie and Ireland, (which sea for roughnesse and danger may bee compared with any other whatsoeuer) though the bulke of their vessels were but of some flexible wood, couered with the hides of Buffles: and as long as they were sailing, so long did they abstaine from meat: whereby it seemeth they neuer sailed any great iourneys. And of this their shipping Pliny also speaketh, and Lucan singeth, thus:

Their shipping very meane. Ships first inuented in Britaine, is a matter to be doubted.

But after-times brought the Britaines to more exquisite skill in nauall affaires, insomuch as the royall Nauy of this Kingdome hath beene reputed (and so is at this day) not only the inuincible walles of our owne, but the incredible terror of al other kingdoms which haue or shall enuy our happy peace: and the aduentures likewise of Merchants, and the skill of our Seamen, hath left no corner of the world vnsearcht.

(12) And their trafficke amongst themselues was not of much worth, in that, as Cæsar saith, the Coynes which they had were either of brasse, or else iron rings sized at a certaine waight, which they vsed for their monies. Of which kind I my selfe haue seen found, and lately taken vp in little cruses or pitchers of earth. But as times grew more ciuill, and trafficke more frequent, they shortly after stamped both siluer and gold; and thereon the faces of their Kings, euen in the daies of Iulius Cæsar, who was the first that had his owne

Many of these are amongst vs remaining, whereof I haue inserted some few, as in their due places shall follow, which I receiued from the liberall hand of that most learned Knight Baronet, & worthy storer of Antiquities, Sir Robert Cotton, of Cunington. These Coynes are cõmonly imbossed outward and shield-like, whereon the inscription or face, is seen; the reuerse hollow, and therein their deuise set: and by these formes are they known to be ther Britains, no other nation stamping the like, except some few among the Grecians.

(13) We come lastly, to speake of the manner of their warfare, which Cæsar thus describeth. First (saith he) they ride round about all parts of the battell, casting their darts: and often times with the terrible noise of their horses, and the ratling of their chariot wheeles, they amaze the enemy and breake their array. And when they haue wound themselues in among the troopes of horsemen, they leape forth of their waggons, and fight on foot. In the meane while the waggoners withdraw themselues somewhat out of the battell, and set their waggons in such order, that if they be ouercharged by the enemy, they may haue speedy and easy recourse vnto them. By meanes whereof they are both as ready to remoue as the horsemen, and as stedfast to stand in the battell as the footmen, and supply both duties in one. And they are come to such perfectnesse by daily practice and exercise, that euen in steepe and falling places they will stop their horses running a full gallop, and guide and turne them in a short roome, & run vpon the vergies, and stand stedfastly vpon the beames, and quickly recouer themselues backe againe into the waggons.

They amaze the enemy with the ratling of their chariot wheeles.

These would often giue ground to egge their enemies from their maine battell, and then would leape out of their chariots and fight on foot. And they kept also such an order in fighting on horseback, that whether the enemies chased, or were chased, they were alwaies in danger. For they neuer fought in great companies together, but scatteringly a great way distant the one from the other, and had stals lying in diuers places one to supply another, hauing euer fresh & lustly men in the roomes of them that were weary. Of this their manner of fight in chariots, Strabo also declareth; and Diodorus Siculus saith, that the Britaines liued after the manner of the first age of the world, vsing chariots in their fight, as the report goes of the ancient Greeks at the Troian warres. Pomponius Mela also describing these Britaines, affirmeth that their fight was not only with horsemen & footmen, but also with waggons and chariots, harnessed, and armed at the ends of the axle-trees with hookes and sithes, after the manner of the Gaules; but with apparance of greater courage, as Tacitus saith; as being not yet mollified by long peace. Their strength in field consisteth most of footmen, yet some countries there are (saith he) that war in waggons, the greatest persons guiding the same; and so much doth Iuuenal intimate, who in shew of prophecy, but indeed in flattery of the Emperor Domitian, salutes him after this manner:

Dio Nicæus from Xiphilinus more particularly declareth their strength: Their horses (saith he) are but little, yet therewithall swift of pace: their footmen also run very speedily, but in their standing are the strongest: their armor are shields, and short speares, in the nether end whereof is fastened a round bell of brasse like vnto a ball, which at the first onset of incounter they shake with great courage, supposing that such a ratling noise doth much amate the enemy. And Herodian saith, that their shields were narrow and speares short, wearing swords hanging down their naked loines, hauing neither knowledge nor vse either of corslet or helmet.

all for the Britains to fight vnder the conduct of women, (which the Romans found to their smart) nor to make any difference of sexes for gouernment. A more noble patterne whereof, neuer had any age, then in our late glorious Virgin Queen, (the wonder of her sexe, and of al future ages,) who, as she was inferior to no Prince euer liuing, for her admirable gouernment in vpholding of her kingdomes peace, so was she a match (to say no more) to the proudest monarchs, in her managing of her wars; as (when occasion was offered) she was ready to make good, in her owne roiall person in the field. But besides the vse of armes, the ancient British women had another imploiment in the field, which I will only set downe in Tacitus his words, speaking of Paulinus Suetonius his assailing of Anglesey: The British Army (saith he) stood on the shore thicke of men and munition, and women running vp and downe among st them, like furies, carrying burning firebrands in rusull attire, and with their haire hanging about their shoulders. The Druides meane while went with their hands lift vp to heauen, pouring out praiers and imprecations. The strangenesse of which sight so amazed the Roman souldiers, that they stood still like stocks, whiles the other wounded them at their pleasure; till Paulinus encouraged them, and they excited one another, not to be so daunted by an army of women and wizards. &c.

The British womens rusull attire and the Druides behauiour in praier amaze the Roman souldiers.

(15) In the relations of these things, let no man thinke, that the glory of these ancient and warlike nation of Britains, is any waies disparaged, or made inferior to them that would be more famous, whose beginning haue been as meane, and state as rude, if not more. For let vs consider the Romans so lauish in their owne worths and greatnesse; who notwithstanding, bring their name and originall from Romulus, a bastard by birth, nourished by a beast, educated among a sort of rustick shepheards: and grown to the ripenesse of his owne affections, he became ring-leader of a damned crue, that liued by robberies and without lawes: besides the shedding of his naturall brothers blood, as Titus Liuius their owne historian witnesseth: and both himselfe and followers, had in such contempt and derision by their neighbour nations, that they both disdained and refused to giue them their daughters in mariage, lest in time they also should become lawlesse, vntill that by subtilty and force, they had rauished their virgins, and thereby made them vnworthy of other matches. Yet when their after fortunes and successe, had mounted them vpon the wings of glory, and seated them on the necks of their subdued neighbors, their Cæsars would needs be more then mortall, and their pedigrees must lineally be brought from the Gods.

Titus Liuius, &c.

The Romans deriue their name from an infamous person.

(14) And, to let passe many others, the like may be said of the beginners of the Scythian and Turkish Empires, two golden pillers raised vpon leaden bases: howsoeuer now, the power of their command, circles three parts of the earth. Nay, what more is, that pretious, roiall, and Gods only people, from whom the eternall King of Kings descended, in their offrings made in time of their highest glory, were by the Lord thus commaunded to acknowledge and say: A Syrian was my father, who being ready to perish for hunger, went down into Egypt, and soiourned with a small company. And the richest stone of that most beauteous building in his highest pride is counselled by the Prophet, to look back to the rocke whence it was hewen, and to the hole of the pit whence it had been digged.

THE GOVERNMENT OF GREAT BRITAINE.

CHAPTER. V.

WEE come, at length, to speake of the gouernment and politicall estate of the Britaines, which doubtlesse (the times then considered) was as honorable in their rulers, and as manageable in the subiects, as any other nations in these West parts of the world: their temperance, religion, learning, and noble resolution shewing no lesse. But in this point I must craue pardon of our British Heraulds, and some learned Antiquaries, if I bring not a lineall succession from Brute, and a monarchicall gouernment in those times of obscurity, through whose mists no Egles cies could pierce, before the daies of Geffrey ap Arthur, as before was touched. And therefore following his counsell, who is best able in these things to giue direction; I will begin the succession of Great Britains Monarchs, at the entrance and person of Iulius Cæsar; at which time, it seemeth by him and other Latine writers (the best Recorders of kingdomes affaires,) this Iland was gouerned rather after the maner of an Aristocratie, that is, by certaine great Nobles and Potent men, then vnder the commaund of any One as an absolute Monarch: though herein is a difference, in that in the Aristocraticall regiment, the rulers are all Peeres of one Common wealth; whereas here, as many Princes, so many seuerall Publike weales. For so Cæsar himselfe found the state of Britaine to be diuided into Prouinces vnder the names of her inhabitants; and to be ruled by diuers Peeres, or petty Kings.

(2) And such a Gouernor was Cassibelan, ouer the Trinobants: Cingetorix, Caruilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax, all foure Rulers together in Kent: Comius supposed to be King of the Atrebatij, and to be the same Comius of Arras, whom Cæsar imploied to tease and worke the Britaines to his subiection: Caractacus the warlike King of the Silures, Galgacus the worthy King of the Caledonians; yea and women also, without exception of sex, held gouernment among them, such was faithlesse Cartismandua Queene of the Brigantes, and famous Bondicea Queene of the Icenians. Whereby it seemeth that euery seuerall Prouince owed seruice and allegeance only to their owne Prince. And as their gouernments were confined vnto certaine bounds and limits, so were the Inhabitants diuided and distinguished by diuers Names: of whom because we shall haue occasion hereafter often to speak, it shal not therfore be amisse in this place once for all, table-wise to lay downe the same; whereby our narrations may passe vntroubled without more explanations, and the readers mind carried with lesse incombrances. Those ancient names of people, and places for abode, throughout the whole Iland, from Ptolemie were as follow.

Their emulations & ambition.

(3) These States ambitiously banding each against others, to raise their owne Prince to a more soueraigne supremacy, and to enlarge their Prouinces vpon the borders of the next, were euer ready, the least occasion ministred, saith Pomponius Mela, to enter quarels, and seldome held amity, or were quiet. This was the cause, as Tacitus tells vs, which brought that puissant nation into bondage: and was the only helpe to the Romans victories: for seldome it chanced (saith he) that two or three states met in counsell, and concurred in opinion to repulse the common danger: so that whilst they resisted and fought one by one, all at length were subdued. But this was not at once performed by Iulius Cæsar the first Roman enterer, who (as he saith) rather shewed the place to posterities, then gaue them the possession thereof, supposing it his glory sufficient, to haue done what he did. For vnto the daies of Domitian, they held play with the Romans, and that with such valour, that the subduing of some small part of this Iland was accounted by themselues to match the conquests of other mightier countries, and more notes of honour shewed in their publike triumphs for one Britaines misfortune, then vsually was solemnized for whole kingdomes subdued.

(4) That such people possessed, and that many Kings together raigned here in Britaine, Pomponius Mela doth shew: Britaine (saith he) bringeth forth Nations, and Kings of nations, though they be all without ciuility and barbarous. And Cæsars intendments being known vnto them, it is said that many of their Cities sent him by their Embassadors proffers of submission: whereby appeareth their diuersities of States, whereof only two held promise, and the rest failing was the occasion of his second expedition for Britaine. And Tacitus, speaking of the shipwrack suffered by the Romans in the raigne of Tiberius, saith, that many of their souldiers then distressed and torne, being cast vpon the coasts of Britaine, were by the people curteously releeued, and by their petty Kings sent backe vnto Germanicus their Generall into Germanie; which Princes or petty Kings, were drawn (as else where he saith) by emulation into many partialities and factions; which was indeed their owne destruction. And by Gildas these were termed cruel Tyrants, taking his authority out of Saint Hierome.

(5) Let thus farre suffice, in generall, of these ancient Britains; whose particulars we will further prosecute in the places of their resistances, lest otherwise they should seeme to fight only against themselues. And therefore so many of these Gouernors, as either yeelded their subiections to the Romans, or stood their opposites till their own strengths were spent, I will briefly touch, vntill such time as the land was made a Prouince, by the valour and industry of Iulius Agricola the first Roman that found it an Iland, and left it more ciuill, and in subiection to the Roman Empire; and by the way I will insert some of such ancient Coynes, as among them were then vsed, expressing their names, and places of coynage.

THE KINGS AND GOVERNORS
GREAT BRITAIN WITH THE ANCIENT COINES VSED IN THEIR TIMES.

CHAPTER VI.

THE first British Coyne (as is supposed) both by the fashion therof being shield-like, and Name thereupon inscribed REX COM: denoteth Comius, (if he be a Britaine) King of the Atrebatij in this Iland: whom some iudge to haue fled thence vnto Cæsar, as a traytor to his Natiue country; and in Gallia vanquished those parts, that lay coasted against the Wight, wherein (by Ptolemy) the people called likewise the Atrebatij inhabited: ouer whom he receiued the gouernment by the gift of Cæsar, and was by him imploied to worke the Britaines to his obedience. And that he was King of the Atrebatij in Britaine, may be strengthned by that which Cæsar in his second book of Commentaries affirmeth, where, by his owne knowledge he saith, that one Diuitiacus raigned ouer a great part of Gallia, and some portion of Britaine also: and so likewise this Comius is reported to be of great respect among our Britaines, and able in that country to doe much. Neither is it altogether vnlikely, seeing the Britaines distasted his loyalty to Cæsar, and his Ambassage for their subiection, with such dislikes, that they laid violent hands vpon him, and cast him in prison, vsing no such rigor against the rest of their owne Ambassadors. Notwithstanding when successe altered, they set him at liberty, and made him their meanes to pacifie Cæsar.

Other Coynes I haue inserted to such British Princes as by their inscriptions are knowne to be theirs. And whereas some are not yet noted by that honor to the world; I haue vnto such added only blankes, if happily more be reuealed hereafter, and the bowels of the earth deliuer to others her treasures hid, as formerly (and in these our searching daies) she hath already done.

(2) Cassibelan

(2) Cassibelan, as the most worthy among the Britains Kings, to withstand the common danger now ready to light vpon them all, by the inuasions and wars of the Romans, was by a generall consent chosen their chieftaine, though in times past, he had molested his neighboring prouinces to the inlargement of his owne. Whose signiories, as Cæsar saith, were seuered from the Cities towards the sea coast by the riuer Thames, about fourescore miles from the same. He had obtained the gouernment of the Trinobantes, by the slaughter of Imanuence, and the expulsion of Mandubrace his sonne. And, with great valour, held opposite to the Romans, vntill the reuolt of his chiefe Citie, the Cenimagues, Segontians, Ancalits, Bibroces, Cassians, and other states, which drew backe, and yeelded to the enemy; his confederates, the foure Kings of Kent, ouerthrown, his owne towne won, and himselfe forced to yeeld vnto Cæsar, and the land to pay a tribute of 3000. pound yeerly to Rome. A British Coyne of gold with the inscription CAS in scattered letters we haue inserted; as also another wheron is instamped the word VER, supposed to be his, because it is thought to haue bin coined in antient Verolam, the City of Cassibelan, in his daies, before the Romans won it.

(3) Cingetorix: Caruill: Taximagull: Segonax: } whom Gæsar calleth Kings that raigned in Kent, were instigated by Cassibelan suddainly to set vpon, and to assault the Roman forces, that lay lincamped vpon the sea shore whilst he kept Cæsar occupied further in the mayne: which thing they attempted, but failed of their hoped expectation, their men being slaine, three of them chased, and Cingetorix the chiefest taken captiue. This heauy news and vnfortunate successe, sed Cassibelan to sue vnto Cæsar, and by the meanes of Comius obtained his peace.

(4) Mandubrace a Prince of the Trinobantes, but a traytor to his country; whose father Imanuence being slaine by Cassibelan, and his owne life likewise sought after, and in danger, fled vnto Cæsar into Gallia, and followed his fortunes in the wars; wherein, he was a great spurre vnto Cæsars forwardnesse for Britain, both to be reuenged vpon the murtherer of his father, and to recouer the gouernment of the Trinobantes vsurped by Cassibelan: preferring his owne ambitious desire, and the reuenge of one mans death, before the freedome of his natiue Countrey, or the deaths of many his countrimen, that daily stopt the Romans passage with streames of their blood. He recouering his chiefest City with the protectiō of the Romans, yeelded subiection, & forty hostages to Cæsar: whose example drew others to sell their own liberty, & to buy many miserie at too deare a rate, and with too late repentance: him doth Beda call Androgorius.

This City with the free towne Verolam afterwards felt the heauy hand of mercileſſe Bodvo in her reuenge againſt the Romans; who laid the beauty and gorgeous buldings thereof ſo leuell with the earth, that thoſe walles and mounted turrets neuer ſince aſpired to halfe their wonted heights.

(7) Adminius

(7) Adminius the first ſonne of Cunobline, King of the Britaines, by Suetonius his report, vpon ſome offence was baniſhed the Iland by his father; and with a ſmall traine fled ouer the ſeas into Belgia, where Caius Caligula was in making his ridiculous expedition againſt the Ocean. And yeelding himſelfe to his protection, added matter to his vaine-glorious humors, as of a great victory and conqueſt; ſending the newes thereof to Rome, with an eſpeciall command that his letters ſhould be deliuered in the Temple of Mars, and that in the aſſembly of a full Senate. It is iudged by learned Cambden that the Roman Coyne aboue prefixed, vpon whoſe reuerſe is inſcribed Metropolis Etiminy Regis, to be meant of this Adminius the ſonne of Cunobeline, whoſe Citie Camalodunum, Claudius Ceſar the Emperour afterwards wonne, and wherein a temple was built and conſecrated vnto him, attended by the Prieſts Auguſtals: which heauily burdened the poore eſtates of the Britaines.

Sueton. in vita Caligulæ, ſect. 44.

(8) Catacratus another ſon of Cunobeline, immediatly after the death of his father, found himſelfe agreeued at the Romans, for the retaining of certaine fugitiues the betraiers of their natiue country; whereof one Bericus was a chief and a great firebrand of Claudius his attempts againſt the Britaines. This Catacratus maintained reſiſtance againſt Aulus Plautius the Emperors Deputy, with ſuch noble reſolution and warlike encounters, that often he endangered both his perſon and army. But Fortune and victory attending the Romans, brought at length Catacratus their captiue into bands, with great ſlaughters of his Britaines, himſelfe led ſhortly after in great triumph through Rome in honour of Plautius his ſo fortunate ſucceſſe. The miſeries of others thus made the Romans to mount the chaire of their triumps; and the chaines of their captiues, the records of their preſent aſpired pride.

But the bordering Dobuni ſeeing his fall, made their own ſtandings ſurer by yeelding themſelues ſubiects to Rome.

Dio calls him Cataeratus;

(9) Togodumnus the third ſonne of Cunobeline, and ſucceſſor to Catacratus, proſecuted his countries quarrell with the like boldneſſe and reſolution as his brother before him had done: & was the only touch-ſtone that gaue Veſpaſian his luſtre, whoſe interpoſition (as Tacitus ſaith) was the beginning of that greatneſſe whereunto afterwards he aſpired. And with ſuch manhood followed the chaſe of the Romans, that in a bloodly battell he ended his life, and brought Plautius their Lieutenant vnto a ſtand, where ſtraitned in dangers both of place and people, he was forced to ſend to Claudius the Emperor; whoſe conceit was then grounded, that in Britaine was greateſt glory to be gotten, and therefore came to his aſſiſtance in perſon himſelfe, the firſt ſince Iulius Ceſar that attempted their conqueſt. His recorded compoſitions made with Aruiragus, the marriage of his daughter and building of Gloceſter, I leaue to be read out of Geffrey of Monmouth, and to be allowed at the choice of his hearer; only noting that the poſſeſſion of ſo faire a land drew the affection and aged perſon of this Emperor to vndergoe ſo farre diſtant and dangerous a iournie, as this of Britaine lay from Rome.

Tacitus in vita Agricolæ.

(10) Cogidunus a Britaine borne, receiued in pure gift at the hands of the Romans, certaine Cities, ouer which he peaceably raigned their King. For when they had conquered the neereſt part of this Iland, and reduced it into the forme of a Prouince; according to their ancient policie, it was their cuſtome, (ſaith Tacitus) to vse Kings themselues for instruments of bondage, both in admittance of their authority, and in protecting them against their opposits. Other memoriall of him none remaineth, but that he is reported to haue rested euer most faithfull to the Romans, and was of them accordingly esteemed, albeit his owne people bare him no such good will, but rather accounted him and others his like, to be Romes only instruments, and Britaines vipers, that brought in strangers to eat out the home-bred inhabitants, and fettered the freedome of their land, with the heauy chaines of a forrein subiection.

(11) Caractacus the most renowned Prince of the Silures, in nine yeeres resistance waded through many aduentures against the common enemy. For when as the Icenians Cangi, and Brigantes began to faint and giue ouer, he only with the Ordouices held out with such seruice and fame, that thereby he grew both famous and fearefull to the Romans. But Destinies determining the downfall of Britaine, the props that were set to stay it still vp, proued too slender, and brake vnder the waight. For this bold Caractacus ouerthrown in battell, his wife, daughter, & brethren taken Prisoners, and his forces defeated, committed himselfe to the protection of Cartismandua the Brigants faithlesse Queene: who by her was deliuered to the Romans; and by P. Ostorius brought to Rome; where beholding the riches and glory of that City, he openly and boldly checked the auarice and ambitious humors of the Romans, who being owners of so great and glorious things, were (notwithstanding couetous & greedy for the poore possessions of the Britaines. And there being led in triumph, with admiration he was beheld of all the spectators, and for his vndanted spirit and magnanimous resolution released of bands, and taken in to fauour by Claudius the Emperor. And the Lords of the Senate assembled together, made glorious discourses touching Caractacus captiuity, affirming it to bee no lesse honorable then when P. Scipio shewed Syphax vnto the people, and L. Paulus, Perses, or of any other exhibited, vanquished and ouercome. The British Coyne here aboue shewed, by the scattered letters therein inscribed, is by the iudicious obseruers of such ancient monies supposed to be his.

Tacit. Annal. 12. cap. 8.

(12) Venutius, a famous King of the Brigantes, and husband to Cartismandua, (a woman of an high and noble linage, but of a base and vnsatisfied lust:) finding his bed abused by Vellocatus his seruant and harnesse-bearer, raised his power against her, and her paramour. With him sided his Brigants, and the neighbour countries adioining, whose good will went generally with the lawfull husband, fearing the ambitious authority of a lustfull woman. With her went the Romans, at the command of Didius their Deputie: and these striking battell won the day: yet so as the war continued to the Romans, the kingdome to Venutius, and the infamy with Cartismandua, both for betraying the pledge of her trust reposed by Caractacus in his distresse, and her truth to Venutius her noble Lord and husband: preferring the licentious pleasures of a vassall, before the bed of chaft mariage, or the nuptiall imbracements of a worthy King; and hath to ages following left her name noted with the scarres of infamy, that time nor continuance shall euer weare away. His ancient coyne is thought to be as thou seest here aboue described.

(13) Prasutagus } King and Queene of the Icenians, a people vnshaken by war, and themselues rich; (as Tacitus reporteth;) the only cause of their ruines, for which the Romans then warred; were brought to destruction vpon this insuing occasion. King Prasutagus dying, by will left Nero his heire (supposing by this meanes to leaue his state the safer,) together with the protection of his two daughters. These, contrary to trust, were abused and defloured, the mother Boduo turned out of all, and against all manly ciuility, or womanhood respect, contumeliously and despitefully whipped. In the reuenge of which vnsufferable wrongs she so opposed and oppressed the Romans, that at one battell seuenty thousand (or as Dion Cassius saith 80000. of their slaughtered bodies she sacrificed to her dead husbands ghost; and hath left the fame of her proceedings registred, euen by her enemies themselues, to her immortall and neuer dying memory. The strong Cities, Camalodunum, and Verolanium, lanium, ſhe ſacked with the rage of mercileſſe war; Petilius, Licutenant of the ninth Legion, ſhe diſcomfited; Catus the Procurator ſhe droue ouer the ſeas, Poſthumus the Campe-maſter durſt not reſiſt her, and all indeed feared the valour of this heroick Lady: whoſe lawes were not martiall to ſaue vpon ranſome: whoſe reuenge was not pacified with yeildings or ſubmiſſion, nor did ſhe thinke there was bloud enough in the Romans to imbrue the altars of her aſſiſting gods, or to waſh off the ſtaine of their ignoble and vnmanly iniuries. But when ſucceſſe altered, after loſſe, and valorous reſiſtance, ſhee made an end of her life by poiſon, leſt liuing ſhe ſhould ſee either her own miſeries in their triumphs, or leaue her remembrance in the records of their lauiſh and ſelfe-pleaſing hiſtorians. Her Coyne of gold we haue here expreſſed, the forme ſhield-like, and vpon the emboſſement thus inſcribed: BODVO.

(14) Aruiragus, the valiant britiſh King, whom Humfrey Lhuyd confidently affirmeth to be the ſame man that is called Meurigus, and is ſaid to withſtand Claudius in his enterpriſes for Britaine, vntill a compoſition of mariage was concluded betwixt the Emperors daughter and himſelfe. Notwithſtanding by Iuuenal it is plaine, that this Aruiragus was in his fame in the daies of Domitian, vnto whom the Poet, as a Prophet, would foredome his happy ſucceſſe in the diſpoſition of his gouernment ouer the Britaines, as in theſe his verſes are ſeene:

It bodes great honour to thy ſelfe, ſome King thou ſhalt depriue,
Or elſe Aruiragus from the rule of Britaines waine ſhalt driue.

An ancient Britiſh Coyne of ſiluer is here inſerted, and a mans head thereon inſtamped, which is ſuppoſed to be his, the letters alluding ſo neere to his name.

(15) Galgacus, a worthy and moſt valiant Prince of the Caledonians, for vertue, and birth, preferred before any other in the Northern parts of this Iland, and made their Generall againſt the inuaſions of Iulius Agricola, was the laſt Britaine, that againſt the Romans ſtood out: accounting thoſe only happy, which were free from the contagion of that Roman tyranny, and themſelues the flower of all the Britiſh nobility, that yet had not ſubiected their necks to their yoke. The reſiſtance which he made was great and warlike, but againſt the decree of God no man can ſtand; for the Romans, riſen to their greatneſſe, bare downe all that withſtood them; and in a bloody battaile ſubdued him, and his forces; making all ſilent before them where they came, and leauing deſolation in the places where they had been. Thus then was the whole Iland ſubiected to the Roman Emperors, about one hundred thirty and ſix yeeres after Caſars firſt entrance, and the land that had been ruled by many petty Kings, was brought now (as moſt parts of the world beſides were) vnder the gouernment of one abſolute Monarch. Grieuous, no doubt, was the loſſe of their liberties, but a greater gaine was gotten not many yeeres after; for from the rude and ſauage manners of the barbarous, they were reclaimed, and became moſt ciuill. And he that had giuen their Iland to his Chriſt, prepared their hearts to receiue him their King; vnto whoſe ſubiection alſo they were motiues to the Romans themſelues. Two ancient Britiſh Coynes ſtamped in ſiluer wee haue here ſet downe, attributing them both to this Galgacus of Caledonia. Notwithſtanding in theſe (as in the reſt) I muſt ſubmit my ſelfe to the more experienced, & the cenſures of theſe ancient things to the learned and more iudicious.

Pſal. 25

(16) Theſe then were the reſiſters of the Romans proceedings, that rather yeelded their breſts to the ſword, then their necks to the yoke of a forrein ſubiection, and made their aſſaulters more famous in their conqueſts, and themſelues more renowned to following poſterities: neither in theſe relations haue we followed the records of our owne, but the approued teſtimony of their beſt writers, who haue deliuered what we haue ſaid, and no doubt felt the like repugnancy of many others, both in the South and North of this Iland, though their names died with their valiant reſiſtance. And as theſe Britains held the Romans at euen hand the ſpace of one hundred thirty and ſix yeeres; neither then were ſubdued without themſelues, that euer ſided with the enemy againſt themſelues, and whoſe factions made way for the feet of their conquerors, as from Tacitus wee haue declared: So their ſucceſſors the Saxons found as warlike withſtanders, till God, for the Britains ſinnes had caſt downe their ſtrenght, whereof more ſhall follow (Chriſt aſſiſting) in the due place of their ſtories, that from the raigne of Vortigerne the ſcourge of his country to Cadwallader the laſt Prince of the Britaines, ſpent their liues in the quarrell of liberty, and hath left their memorials famous for their countries defence.

(17) But the ſtate of kingdomes (how largely ſo euer extended, or by what humane wiſedome ſtrengthned with defence) do find their periods not to exceed much the number of ſix hundred yeeres, as by common experience among moſt nations is ſeene. In theſe times therefore when the world was ſhaken with wars, firſt by the Romans that ſtroue to mount hie the ſpires of their intended glory, and were by Gods decree appointed to ouerrun and afflict the earth, when kings of people (I ſay) were inforced to lay the Crownes from their heads at their conquering feet; and free nations loaded with the yokes of their bondage: then was fulfiled the reſolution of this queſtion demanded, Alas who ſhall liue when God doth this? And then among the reſt, Britaine gaue place to neceſſity with as manlike reſiſtance as did ſtates more ſtronger, or kingdomes confined with far more larger compaſſe. And Cæſar himſelfe bought his enterance with ſuch loſſe to the Romans, that no Emperor after aſſaied the like, before aged Claudius, whoſe opinion was, that thence the remembrance of his ſucceeding glory ſhould wholly ariſe.

But when the props of that Empire began for to faile, as nothing can bee firme in this ſtill-wearing world, the Saxons, for their valour a ſecond triumphant nation, began as it were where the Romans left: for beſides the continuall poſſeſſion of their owne country, as in that caſe vnpartiall Tacitus doth tell vs; their legions were tranſported into all parts of the world, and without whom almoſt no victory was wonne: of whoſe power and proweſſe in the expeditions of warre both Dionyſius, Arrianus and Seneca, do ſpeake. To theſe then likewiſe if the Britaines gaue place, the lots came forth with the like price of the reſt, and in this Iland they bought their conqueſts as deere as they had done in any other part of the world. Neither was Britaine ſubdued by either of theſe nations, or their inverſion and exchange of policie altred, but with as vnwilling ſubiection & ſtreames of bloud as had been ſluſed out of the ſides of their mightier nations, or by them had bin tamed to follow their triumphal chariots. And more honour attributed to paſſe theſe Britiſh ſeas, with more admiration only to ſee the Iland it ſelfe, then was vſually conceiued of kingdomes more larger, or that lay iacent as farre from Rome. And the conqueſt of ſome ſmall parts of Britaine in no ſmall ſelfe-glory to bee inſcribed as trophies of their victories vpon their Coynes, and to giue ſirnames to the Emperors and their ſonnes: as ſhall be ſhewed, when the age of this hiſtory ſhall be increaſed with the times of the Romans affaires in this Iland. Free from ſubiection before the attempts of Caius Iulius Cæſar by the teſtimony of Diodorus Siculus, and neuer had yeelded to any forrein power, as not prouoked by Dionyſius or Hercules, nor inforced by any to maintaine their liberties by the feats of warre. But Cæſar in Gallia thirſting after noueltie, or his conceited humor to purchaſe renowne, made the ſeaſeeme ſafe from dangers in paſſage; and himſelfe reſolute to venture his perſon amongſt, thoſe bold and borbarous Britaines: wherein he left no meanes vnaſſaied for their conqueſt and ſubiection, nor his ſucceſſors omitted any prouident care to retaine and keepe the land in their poſſeſſions, which whileſt it ſtood a prouince in their obedience was held and accounted the faireſt plume in their trumphant Diadem, and the loſſe thereof (if no more but onely in name) as was publikely affirmed; wold proue a great detriment to the Empire. This made the Romans to deſire it as they did, who beſides the great glory they conceiued in the conqueſt, made it the granary for the weſterne gariſons; beſides the delicate prouiſions for their Emperors owne tables.

Tacit. in his deſcription of Germany.

And the German Saxons ſtraitned in their owne countries through increaſe of their people, or haply to ſupply their owne wants, infected with piracies theſe Weſt parts of the word, and among all others ſet the eie of their affections vpon this moſt beautifull Iland, and neuer left their attempts vnaſſaulted till they ſet the glorious diadem thereof vpon their owne heads. Changing the name Britannia into Anglia, a terme moſt fit to expreſſe that ſubiect, and pleaſing in ſound as Angelicall like, neither haue themſelues proued vnworthy of ſo rich a poſſeſſion, that in wars haue maintained, and by voiages made known her fame as far as the ſune hath his beames, or the endleſſe Ocean her ebbes & tides. But of theſe things wee ſhall haue occaſion hereafter.

And now addreſſe our ſelues to deſcribe our ancient Britaines, and to ſhew their true pictures as they are reported. At firſt rude and vnciuill (I taske them no further then all others then were in the world, ſome few excepted that were only taught by God) and with the firſt were reclaimed to a more ciuil reſpect, both in their apparell and apprehenſion of literature; whoſe pictures in the Chapter ſucceeding we wil demonſtrate as they are deſcribed by Cæſar, Pliny, Dio, Herodian and others; at firſt altogether naked, cut, and painted as thou ſeeſt; afterwards partly clad in imitation of others which frequented their country either for trafficke or conqueſt; in both which manner take them as they are reported to bee by theſe authors, and impute no liberty in the draught to the workmans beſt liking, nor thy ſelfe any whit diſparaged to be brought from ſuch parents, which here are ſet as the pillars ſpoken of by Ieſophus, that after the flood did preſerue the inuented ſcience of the celeſtial bodies, leſt time or elements ſhould conſume that knowledge, or deuoure thoſe rules before demonſtrated: So the true portraiture of our ancient progenitors may by theſe be preſerued from the ruines of time, & made our motiues to be thākfull vnto him that hath brought vs forth in this moſt ciuill times, and not only clad vs with the garments of humanity, but by his ſpirit hath guided vs vnto a celeſtiall knowledge.

CHAPTER VII.

THe vnderstanding and apprehensions of men clouded in ignorance, are by a Great Philosopher compared to the eye-sight of such men, as stand and behold things afarre-off; becausse both of these, though they apprehend some generall shapes and notices, yet can they not discerne of the true proportions and proprieties of their Obiects. The like happeneth in the search and suruey, as of all other Nations, so of our owne, of our first beginnings, our antique Customes, behauiours, habits, &c. the true Circumstances whereof are the more difficill to find, in that those things are not onely remote many degrees beyond the kenning of our Eye, (yea so manie Ages from the times wherein we liue,) but are also shadowed and enwrapped in manifold vncertainties and contrarieties, wherwith euen those writers haue perplexed our way, who vndertooke to bee both our Guides and our Lights. Notwithstanding, our purpose being to propose vnto the eye of our now glorious and gorgious Britaines, some generall draughts of our poore and rude Progenitours, (that as King Agathocles in his chiefe feasts vsed onely earthen dishes to put himselfe in minde that his Father was but a potter, so wee may remember that true British Nobilitie is more in Vertue then in Aunceſtors;) let vs first see what the principall notes and markes are, whereby the persons of those first Britaines were made so remarkeable among all other Nations.

Aristotle.

The reason why Nations Originals are so hardly found out.

The three chiefe notes of the Britaines.

(2) These Notes were chiefly three; first, their going naked: secondly, their staining and colouring of their whole Bodies; thirdly, their cutting, pinking and pouncing of their flesh with garnishments (for so they thought them) of sundry shapes and fashions, as the two first ensuing Icones or Portraitures doe represent. Touching all which, the reports of Authors are very discrepant: and therefore sith light is gotten out by collision of flintes, wee will essay, whether out of those writers contradictions (brought to the stroke, and confronted togeather,) we may strike some glimering light to direct vs how to paint them forth, who so delighted in painting themselues.

1. The first note of the Britains, their Nakednes.

(3) First touching their going naked, the authority of Caesar must ouersway (as being auncienteſt) the too generall reports of such others, as seeme to relate that the Britaines generally vsed no Couerture, as neglectiue either of weathers iniurie, or of ciuill modesty; for he saith, interiores plerique pellibus sunt vestiti: the In-land men for the most part were clad with skinnes. And yet these In-landers were the rudest of all the rest, the Kentish and Sea-borders being full of humanity, and little differing from the French ciuilitie:

Caesar.

So that when Herodian saith, Vestis vsum non cognoscunt, nec induuntur quidem, They neither know the vse of Garments, nor put any on: either he speaks on hearesay, or his large report must bee restrained to some certaine Persons; Times, and Places. And for certaine Persons and Times indeed Plynie somewhat limits it, saying; that their married women, both elder and yonger, (coniuges, nuruse,) in certaine festiuals vsed to goe starke naked: so doth Dio also for certaine Places: in their Tents (saith he) they liued naked and vnshod, where he seemeth to allow them some couerture abroad. The like may be supposed in time of Winter or War; were Herodian himselfe saith onely, plerae, corporis nudi, A great part of their body was bare.

(4) It may seeme hereby, that those Originals of Particular Nations were not much vnlike that first beginning of the vniuersall prosemination of Mankind, when our first Parents innocencie walked in naked simplicitie: the foundations of all things being, as fartheſt from our sight, so more simple and farre from those artificiall fraudes, which some call wit and cunning. And though an *ancient Father be mistaken, in conceauing that by the fower letters of the name of Adam, were signified the foure quarters of the World, (that being an Hebrue name of three letters, and not a Greeke of foure) yet all those Quarters of the World participate somewhat of Adams dispositions; and as all Naturall things retourne by course to that whereof first they were framed, so if Lawes, discipline, and Customes, did not restraine men, they would in time, of themselues reuolue to that first neglectiue condition, and careleſnesse of those outward respects whence men are now named Ciuill.

*Saint Cipria. interprets A anatole, East. D. dusis, West. A. arctos, North. M. mesembrios. South.

(5) But in our Britaines, three reasons there seeme of this their going vncloathed. First their hardinesse, which was partly naturall, and partly acquired by practise of their bodies to durance: of whom Dio records that all of them had an excellent habit in tolerating hunger, cold, and labours, insomuch as they could endure to abide many daies together in the water vp to the chinne without any food at all; that they would liue in the woods on roots and barkes of trees; though one kinde of foode he there mencioneth vnknowne in our times, whereof vsing to take as much as a beane onely, they were not subiect either to hunger or thirst. No marueile, if those, who would endure this, could endure the want of garments: especially in a soile whereof we finde this Euloge. Tu nimium nec strictа gelu, &c.

Causes of the British nakednes.
1. Hardinesse.

Dio Nic.

Nor freezing cold, nor scorching hot thou art,
Twixt both thou hold'st the meane and pleasing'st part.

See Chap. 1. sect. 10.

The like patience we find euen now not only in the wilder Irish, and Virgineans, but in rogues and Wanderers of our owne Country; who often pittilesse of themthemſelues voluntarily depriue their Bodies of this Protection againſt the Aires offence, to procure pity of others. And what ſpeake we of theſe? ſeeing euen children for Cuſtome, and Women for pride, wil ſuffer their Breaſts, and moſt tender parts of their Body, to be expoſed not only to offence of weather, but of modeſty alſo? yea generally, the handes, and faces, being of moſt ſubtileſt ſence, yet by cuſtome are enabled now to endure that, which by the like cuſtome the the olde Britaines endured in their whole Bodies; whereby Plutarch thinkes they vſually liued ſo long euen to the age of ſixeſcore, the externe cold keeping in and augmenting their internall heate.

Iutarch.

2. Ignorance:

(6) As ability to endure colde, ſo ignorance (in many) of meanes to preuent it, may ſeeme another occaſion of theſe Britaines nakednes. The Romans (it ſeemes) in their old Conſuls times, and after, had not the skill nor vſe of Hats, Breeches, &c. That Britaine abounded with Wooll and other materials for cloathing, is paſt all doubt, for which cauſe, by one in a Panegyrick it is named Riche in Paſturage, which by another is thus explicated, that therein was an infinite multitude of tame cattell both with Vdders full of milke, and loaded with fleeces to the ground. So then Wooll was not wanting, but Will or Skill; the latter in moſt likelihood: for, as Strabo ſaith, that though thoſe ſtrutting Vdders yeelded great ſtore of milk, yet ſome of them had not skill to make cheeſe, and hauing ſo rich grounds, yet had not the art of tillage, ſo their ſheepe might haue ſuch heauy fleeces, yet ſome of their Owners no cunning to keepe themſelues warme therewith. Some of them, I ſay; for otherwiſe, as Pliny, touching Tillage, giues light to Strabo, witneſſing, that others of them were ſo good Husbands as to manure their grounds with Marle, as likewiſe doth Dioſcorides, ſaying they had skill to make drinke of Barley: ſo probable is it, that thoſe other who were by Cæſar and Tacitus ſaid to be ſo like the French in conditions, had alſo ſome part of their Art in fitting the Burthen of their Sheepes backes to couer their owne.

(7) The laſt reaſon of ſuch their going naked ſometimes, was out of an opinion that no clothing ſo adorned them, as their painting and damasking of their Bodies, for which cauſe (ſaith Herodian) they would not couer themſelues, leſt then their gay painting ſhould not be ſeene: but Pomponius Mela makes doubt, whether their thus painting themſelues were for ornament or for ſome other vſe; which doubt Cæſar ſeems to reſolue, as if the men did it becauſe it made them looke more terrible in warre.

(8) And thus we are now orderly fallen on the ſecond of thoſe three notes appropriated by Authors to our Britaines. which is their painting and ſtaining of their Bodies, which appeares by Cæſar to haue beene more vniuerſally vſed then going naked, for all the Britaines (ſaith he) die their bodies with ſtaining. As Authours differ in the reaſon of this their painting, (as we ſhewed) ſo in the name, perchance alſo in the ſubſtance of that wherewith they ſtained themſelues, and ſomewhat alſo in the colour it ſelfe. The ſubſtance Cæſar calles luteum, which yet in vulgar acception is thought to be ſome yellow ſubſtance, as Pliny cals luteum oui, the yolke of the Egge; Pliny himſelfe ſaith the Frenchmen call it glaſtum, deſcribing it to be an herbe like Plantayne, which Oribaſius (as learned Cambden ſheweth) doth terme Vitrum, in which ſenſe Mela is vnderſtood to ſay that they were ſtained Vitro (and not Vltro) it being generally taken to be Woad, from thoſe ancient times hitherto vſed for the ſureſt ſtaine. But for the colour which is made, Cæſar and the reſt agree, it was Cæruleus, blewiſh or azure, which colour the Cambro-Britannes doe yet call glace, whence our glaſſe for windowes (called alſo vitrum) ſeemeth by reaſon of the colour, to haue taken name. this painting, hath beene already ſhewed out of Iſidore, who writes, that they had that name from a word of their owne language, wherein Breeth ſignifieth as much as painted or ſtained; but whether thoſe other Inhabitants of the more Northerne parts of this Iland, called alſo Picti or painted, had their name vpon the ſame ground, & whether they were ſome branch of the Britiſh ſtocke, or of ſome tranſmarine Colonie; it is a queſtion not yet decided. Pomponius Lætus, and ſome other, deriue them from Germany, ſome from the Pictones in France; but Beda, from Scythia, whence ſaith hee, they are reported to haue come into Ireland in a few long bottomes, and finding no ſeating there, to haue entered into Britaine. Though Beda his authoritie be venerable, yet the learned find reaſons to induce them rather to beleeue, that they were the remaines of thoſe ancient Britaines which either inhabited the North-part of this Iland, before the Romanes entrance, or which (vpon their Conqueſt) fled thither to auoid the Romiſh yoake, where the difficulties of the aire & ſoile protected them from the Romanes ambition and inuaſion. Whereto Tacitus well accordeth, ſaying, that Agricola droue the Romanes Enemies (he meanes the more vntractable Britaines) into thoſe parts, as it were into another Iland. And it is thought incredible, that thoſe Enemies of the Romans, who ſent forth againſt Agricola an Army of thirty thouſand ſtrong, & who ſo vexed Seuerus, that in one Expedition he loſt ſeuenty thouſand of his Romanes, & their Aiders were ſo vtterly extinct, as that none of them remained; but that rather they wonderfully multiplied, being thoſe who afterward much perplexed and ouerran the Romane Prouince, and to whom (not vnlikely) ſome other, ſuch as Beda mentioneth, did afterward ioyne themſelues.

(10) If we would adde reaſons vnto Authorities, to proue that theſe Picts were no other then that multiplied offspring of thoſe Britaines, we could produce their* Language, their manners, their kind of Gouernement (all bearing Britiſh Reſemblance) to confirme the ſame. But what needs? ſince the ſelfe-manner of painting is an vndoubted marke in the Children repreſenting of what Parents they were borne. That they were painted, Claudian ſhewes, calling them, The Picts, ſo truly named; which Iſidore well expounds, The Pictiſh Nation had their name from their Bodie, depainted with the iuice of an herbe growing amongſt them. When therefore the Romans excluded them from their other Prouinciall Britaines, this name (Pictes) for diſtinctions ſake was in vſe amongſt them; before which times, yea and long after, they were knowne to writers by no other name then Britaines, and the Romane Emperor, Commodus, Seuerus, Baſſianus, Geta, & vpon the Conqueſts of them, inſtiled themſelues Britanici, Britiſh (not Pictiſh) Conquerors. But after the Romane tongue had preuailed with the Romane ſword, the Britaines themſelues vſed to name any thing painted by the name of Picte; as may bee gathered out of Vegetius, who ſaith, that the Britaines called certaine Sallops, Picts, becauſe their ſailes, tackle, and Marriners apparell, were coloured blew, the very colour, wherewith theſe Britiſh Picts (as * ſomewhere they are truely called) vſed to ſtaine themſelues. When afterward the Iriſh-Scots had confederated themſelues with theſe againſt the Romans, they all began by degrees to be more ciuilized: the more Southerly of them being by Ninian the Britaine conuerted vnto Chriſt, about the yeere of Grace 430. thoſe other more Northward, by Columbanus Anno 565. by which time, it is likely, that Ciuilitie increaſing, their painting and other like ruder Cuſtomes were well nigh forgotten, both amongſt them, and alſo amongſt thoſe other Britaines vnder the Romanes Gouernment. In which regard we haue beſides thoſe præfixed Icones, and Patternes of their firſt and moſt ſauaged times, here added alſo their Habits, when they beganne to put on with conditions, a little better cloathing alſo.

colouring of their Bodies: for beſides it, ſome other belliſhments they had, which they eſteemed much more gracefull, then either their painting was, or any Cloathes could be. Which of the Britaines, Solinus thus deliuereth: The Country is in part (note that hee makes it not generall) inhabited by People barbarous, who by artificiall formes of inciſion haue from their Childhood ſundry ſhapes of Beaſts depourtraied in their bodies, and as their limmes increaſe in growth, ſo doth the pictured worke together therewith, neither doth theſe wild people boaſt of any greater kind of patience, then in bearing long-laſting ſcarres, where the paint had deeply ſuncke into their ſliced fleſh. The very paralell whereof is alſo by Iſidore ſet downe touching our Picts, whoſe, bodies ſliced and pinked by an artificiall punchion, did ſuck in the iuice of the ſtayning herb, carrying theſe raſures on their pictured limbes, as badges of their Noblenes, thus endamasked. Neither only the ſhapes of Beaſts, but of all other things, were ſo printed in their fleſh; which Herodian takes to bee the prime reaſon, why they delighted to goe naked, leſt they ſhould hide theſe their pleaſing garniſhments. Where alſo by the way may be obſerued, ſince Solinus ſaith that the barbarous onely vſed ſo to doe, and Herodian, that thoſe who did ſo, vſed therefore to goe naked; that therfore not the Britaines in generall, but the moſt barbarous of them vſed to goe naked. And very anſwerable to Solinus (who elegantly calleth ſuch their figuring of themſelues, inſcriptis viſceribus, a writing on their Bodies) is that of Claudian, Perlegit exanimes Picto moriente figuras, On dying Picts he reades the breathles ſpapes, as if the beaſts ſo liuely portraited on them, ſeemed to lie dead together with the murdered bodies of the Picts.

But for their Virgins, their whole Body was garniſhed ouer with the ſhapes of al the faireſt kinds of flowers and herbes; which (to ſpeake indifferently) could not but yeeld, though a ſtrange, yet no vnpleaſing aſpect. Whereas the Men were (as Cæſar ſpeakes) very horrible to bee looked on, hauing all their breaſt & bodie disfigured with vgly Beaſts, Serpents, rauenous Birdes, ſcales and finnes of fiſhes, &c. In which relation yet, this ſcruple will not eaſily be remoued (if it bee true, that from their childhood their prints increaſed with their bodies) how thoſe, who being Virgins had no prints but of herbes and flowers, becomming Wiues were ſo eaſily tranſformed either into Beaſts or heauenly Creatures.

The sixt Booke.

CHAPTER I.

The Romans the second possessors of this Iland.

THE next Nation to the Britaines that obtained possession, and soueraignty of this Iland, were the Romans, and of them Caius Iulius Cæsar the first, what time their State had vndergone all kinds of gouernments, and now aspired almost to their highest pitch of glory. This Cæsar bearing the office of Questorship in Spaine, and naturally disposed for great assaies, was thereto the more incited at the sight of Alexanders portraiture, standing in the temple of Hercules at * Gades, where beholding it with great admiration fell into a sudden dislike of himselfe, and (as Alexander in seeing Achilles tombe) with an ambitious, yet honorable emulation, sighed and said: Hast thou at my yeers atchieued the conquest of the whole world, my selfe hitherto hauing done no memorable act? Euer after which he disdained that his petty charge, and made suite to the Senate to be dismissed; holding that the cloude which ouershadowed his following and (soone after) flowing fortunes. And forthwith returning to Rome obserued euery occasion that might make him gratious in the peoples eies, hauing the aduantage of the time which then was swaied with most dislikes: and entring into many factions, yea and some of them not without suspition of conspiracy, did nothwithstanding so manage his proceedings, that their constructions were euer made honorable, and himselfe the man by all assents that did support the glory of their State; vnto whom offices of high dignities were assigned, which daily increased his credit and power. And in the time of his Consulship, tooke vpon him the gouernment of Gallia, where he remained ten yeeres together, and forbare no occasion for warre, were it neuer so vniust or dangerous: Insomuch that framing a bridge of wood ouer the broad and swift riuer Rhene, he entred the country of the Sweuians, being the first Romane that assailed the Germans: And thence with victory returning, found his charge the Gaules in quiet: both which fortunes were as spurres to his aspiring minde, and set his thoughts to worke vpon other attempts.

(2) For now intending a voiage into Britaine, he prepared thitherward, as well to inlarge the extent of his ambition and glory, as to satisfy himselfe with the sight and seate of the Iland, as for a further knowledge of those people the inhabitants, after whom he had most diligently inquired, yet by no relation could find content. But his pretence was reuenge against the Britaines, for that thence (as himselfe speaketh) the Gaules had receiued most of their supplies against him in all his warres, or as some haue written, for the desire of Pearles that therein plentifully grew, whose beauty and weight he had oft obserued.

But becaus the summer was almost spent, and that the voiage seemed dangerous through want of knowledge, either for place of entrance, or safety in harbour (for our learned countriman Roger Bacon was doubtlesse in an error, who thinketh that Cæsar set vp perspectiue glasses on the coast of France, and thence saw all the ports and creeks in England) he thought good to send one Caius Volusenus a military Tribune in an galley before him, giuing sufficient instructions for so great an enterprise in hand, himselfe drawing towards those parts of Gallia, that lay neereſt coasted vnto Britaine, thence expecting his successe.

(3) These things were not so secretly done, but that the Britaines receiued notice thereof, and therupon some of their priuate States sent Ambassadors with proffers of submission vnder the assurances of their hostages. Which Cæsar accepted and sent back again with liberall promises, ioining in commission with them Comius a king of the Atrebatij (for so he is stiled vpon his Coyne) a man well reputed, and respected among the Britaines, that he might perswade the rest of the States to imbrace Cæsars amitie. In effecting of which businesse, some fiue daies being spent, Volusenus returned, hauing waffed vpon the coasts of Britaine so far, as with safty he might, which was no further then to view it with the eie, his foot not daring to tread the shoare replenished with those barbarous people, as it pleased the Romans to terme the Britaines. His discouery and relation gaue small encourages to Cæsars hoped successe, and had not the Morines yeelded him their obedience, it may be thought his voiage at that season had been staied.

(4) But now composing his affaires in Gallia, and hauing ready an hundred ships (wanting but two) besides many Gallies also for transporting his army, he loosed from the shoare, hauing a good wind, about the third watch of the night, taking order for his horsemen to imbarke with all speed and follow after him; himselfe early in the morning attained the sight of Britaine, whose cliffes he found couered with armed men, and place for entrance so naturally beset, being strengthned with steepe hills and rocks, that he there cast anchor, and called to counsell the Legats and Tribunes, declaring vnto them the danger of the hauen that gaue such aduantage to their enemy, whose darts from the higher ground might much impeach their arriuage, and therefore determined their landing elsewhere.

(5) Their Counsell was no sooner dismissed, but Cæsar (both tide and wind fitting him) not foreslowing the occasion, gaue signe of remoue, and some eight miles distant came to * a plaine and open shoare, and made preparation to land his men. Thither also the Britaines had remooued part of their forces, and so valiantly withstood the enemies, that Cæsar himselfe, though wholly addicted to honor himselfe and his Romans, yet confesseth that his army was sore ouerlaid and terrified with that incounter: and had they not been assisted from the Gallies with an vnusuall kind of Engines, which did beat backe the Britaines (vnexpert of that strange manner of assault) the Romans had not set foot on British soile, neither durst they then aduenture it, vntill the standard-bearer for the tenth legion desperately leapt foorth of the ship with his Eagle, calling on the danted souldiers and asking whether they would dastardly forsake their ensigne and betray it through cowardize to the enemy? which opprobry prouoked them to follow his example, and so they got the shoare after an encounter fierce and terrible on both parts, as Cæsar acknowledgeth. But the first of all (euen before the Stander-bearer) who put courage into the Romans and taught them how to deale, was (as testifieth Eutropius) one Scæua a Britaine (who formerly had fled to Cæsar) and guiding foure other souldiers in a boat to a rock neer the shore, where the tide leauing them, his fellowes slunke backe in the boat, but hee most boldly defended himselfe from the rocke against the Britaines, like a Beare at a stake among a multitude of mastiues, till hauing all his armour broken in peeces, and himselfe all wounded with darts, he swamme to the fleet; and begging pardon for his foole-heady forwardnesse, Cæsar both forgaue him, and rewarded his valour with the honour of a Centurion: and hee did Cæsar afterwards noble seruice at Dyrrachium in the ciuill warres. Cæsar confessing, that hee alone saued the fortification against Pompey, at which time his target was shewed to Cæsar, hauing 230. holes pierced in it by the enemy, whereof Iosepus Iscanus that ancient Poet of Excester writeth thus:

Hinc & Scæua satus pars non obscura tumultûs
Ciuilis, Magnum solus qui mole soluta
Obsedit meliorq; stetit pro Cæsare murus.

The first attempt assaied, that is warranted by any true Record for the conquest of this Iland: which happened in the yeere of the worlds creation 3873. and before the birth of our Sauiour Christ, 54.

(6) This enterprise for landing thus atchieued, Cæsar charged so fiercely vpon the enemy, that hee put them to flight; but wanting his horsemen to follow the chase, (which as yet were not arriued) he proceeded no further, but encamped his host vpon a great plaine, not farre from the Sea, and not without likelihood thought to be Barham Downe: for so neere lay it vpon the shoare, that thence he beheld the dispersion and losse of his 18. ships (comming vnder saile with his horsemen to his assistance) through the violence of a storme, and rage of Sea.

(7) In the meane time the Britaines, that after flight had againe recouered head, and in their assemblies aduisedly considered their imminent dangers, concluded their submission for the safest remedy, and to that end sent their second Embassadours vnto Cæsar, with whom Comius before remembred was imploied, whom they had retained in strait prison for Cæsars cause, but now made him a meane to worke their peace; which was granted after some soft and gentle reproofes, with hostages receiued for performance of Couenants, and resort of their Nobles to Cæsars campe, to yeeld themselues and Cities to his will.

The Britaines second ambassage to Cæsar.

(8) These Britaines, although rude in regard of the Romanes, and vnmatchable to them in educated ciuility, yet were so skilfull in the affaires of warre, and so ready to discerne the least aduantage, that they easily perceiued the weakenes of Cæsars power, both in want of horsemen to equall their wagons, wherein chiefly stood the strength and order of their fight, as also of ships for seruice and safety, as occasions should be offered: whereby their mindes touching their promised submission began to wauer, and the matter with better aduice to be pleaded in their assemblies; for that not only these foresaid ships for Cæsars supply were dispersed and hindred, but euen his owne fleet, which lay then in harbour, by the rage of winde and sea, (beeing then spring-tide, and the moone in the full) was not onely filled with waues, but also their tacklings, sailes, and anchors spoiled or lost, the violent storme so dashing the bulkes one against another, that their bruised bottomes were thereby made vnfit for burden.

Cæsars ships distressed.

(9) This losse was so great, that it is accounted the first of the three aduerse fortunes which euer happened to Cæsar in all his proceedings: and it was so well obserued by the Britaines, that immediately they intended a reuolt, and in Counsell vrged this, as the materiall point that breathed hope and life to their former liberties, condemning themselues as impious, if they should refuse to ioine consent with the heauens, whose elements had thus farre fought for their freedome and full deliuerance, assuring themselues (if on this aduantage they might cut off these new guests) that neuer any afterward would aduenture to enter Britain in hostile manner.

Britaines reuolt.

And thereupon they began both to slacke the performance of couenants, and daily to withdraw themselues from Cæsars Campe, which gaue him iust occasion to suspect whereat they aimed. And to preuent their proceedings he as wisely wrought: for first repairing his Nauie with the huls timber, and tackling of the most bruised ships, with the losse of twelue ships only, the rest were made able to brooke the seas. And prouiding against the aduantage of the enemie, he sent foorth the seuenth Legion for forrage to supply any occasion.

(10) This Legion taking the coast cleere, and little surmising so sudden a reuolt, fell to the sickle and sithe like haruest labourers, and laid their weapons aside, mistrusting no Enemie. Now the Britaines as forward to put in practise what they had determined, closely had laid themselues in ambush, for thither they knew the enemie would come, a peece of corne there standing, whereas in all other parts haruest was past: and so hauing these workmen in their danger, suddenly fell vpon them, slaying some, and forcing the rest out of their array, who not knowing the order of their fight, cast themselues in a ring (the best defensiue forme of embatteling) and stood on their guard as they might: but had they not happily been rescued, Cæsar had lost one whole Legion at that time.

(13) They vſed (ſaith he) to ride in wagons againſt the approch of the enemie, and to circulate them about with a whirling compaſſe, and ratling noiſe, each waies caſting their darts as they did driue, and euer as they ſaw aduantage would winde themſelues in amongſt the horſe and foot, to breake the array; which done, they would forſake their wagons, and on foot moſt dangerouſly aſſaile the enemy. In the meane while the waggoners would with-draw themſelues ſomewhat out of the battle, and place their wagons in ſuch order, that if their maſters were ouer-charged, they might haue ſpeedy acceſſe, and opportunity of retrait, by which meanes they were euer as quicke to moue as were horſemen, and as ſtedfaſt to ſtand the battle as were the foot, whereby they did ſupply the duties of both at once, and by daily exerciſe grew ſo expert in managing their horſes, that running them forcibly downe a ſteepe hill, they would ſtop, and turne them in the mid-way, and they would run along the beame, and ſtand firme vpon the yoke; whence with like facility they would againe returne into their Chariots.

This order Cæſar ſo well obſerued, as that notwithſtanding his deſire of reuenge, yet wanting his horſemen (as he pretended) wherein conſiſted the chiefeſt reſiſtance, hee durſt attempt no further on them, but was content to keepe the field without profer of battle.

(14) The Britaines likewiſe hopeleſſe of further ſucceſſe at that preſent, departed without any impeachment, intending to proſecute their cauſe with a greater and more generall ſupply: and thereupon ſent meſſengers to their ſeuerall States, with notice of their hopes againſt ſo ſmall a power; whoſe Campe by them if any way might bee vanquiſhed, the purchaſe of ſpoile, beſides their freed liberties, would requite the paines.

The Britains gather a greater power.

(15) Theſe States, though maintaining ciuill factions amongſt themſelues, yet ſeeing the intended danger of this generall enemy, preſently aſſembled a great power, purpoſing yet once againe to try the hazard and fortune of warre. Cæſar, whoſe vigilancy did euer equall his valour, prepared his army, wherein now only 30. horſemen were preſent, and thoſe brought to him by Comius the King. The battle ioining continued not long, but that the Britaines gaue backe and fled, whom the Romanes purſued as farre as ſtrength indured, and returned with the ſlaughter of many, burning the Country where they came.

Comius ſupplieth Cæſar with 30 horſe.

(16) Thus the Britaines once againe vanquiſhed, foorthwith ſent their third Embaſſage vnto Cæſar, deſiring peace, with promiſe of quiet ſubiection; whom he with hard termes now reproued, and impoſed a double number of hoſtages to be brought him into Gallia, whither he made all poſſible preparation, for that the Æquinoctium drew neere, doubting his crazed ſhips would hardly brooke the winter ſtormes, that vſually rage vpon theſe Seas. And hauing gotten a faire wind, imbarked all his forces about midnight, and ſo brought moſt of his fleet ſafe to the continent. This enterpriſe ſo fortunately accompliſhed, Cæſar by his letters made knowen to the Senate, who decreed and proclaimed to his honour a generall ſupplication or thankſgiuing to their Gods, for the ſpace of twenty daies together, wherein all the Romans, clothed in white garments, and crowned with garlands, went to all the Temples of their Gods, and offred ſacrifices for ſo glorious a victory.

The Britaines ſubmit themſelues the third time.

CESARS SECOND EXPEDITION INTO BRITAINE.

Chapter II.

CÆSAR expecting the performance of Couenants agreed vpon in the treaty of peace with the Britaines, receiued hoſtages from two of their Cities only, and no more: the reſt drawing backe, refuſed his ſubiection: whereupon intending not to loſe ſo rich a prey, nor to ſuffer that Sunne to bee eclipſed, whoſe glory thus farre in his Horizon had aſcended, hee appealed ſome troubles in Gallia, and in the winter ſeaſon began his preparation to that enterpriſe. And hauing had experience of his former wants, he furniſhed himſelfe accordingly, and the next ſpring following drew his forces towards Calis, the ſhorteſt cut into Britaine. There committing the charge of Gallia to T. Labienus his Lieutenant, himſelfe with fiue Legions of ſouldiers, 2000. horſemen, and 800. ſhips, about the going downe of the Sunne looſed from the ſhoare, and with a ſoft Southerne gale were carried into into the ſtreame. But about midnight the winde failing, and their ſailes becalmed, the tide diuerted their courſe: ſo that in the dawning he well perceiued his intended place for landing to be paſſed.

Cæſar againe landeth at the place of his firſt arriual

(2) Therefore falling againe with the change of tide, and indeuours of their Oares, about noone the ſame day hee recouered the ſhoare, euen in the ſame place (and that without any ſhew of reſiſtance) where he had found beſt landing the Summer before. There in conuenient manner he encamped his hoſt, and by certaine Fugitiues got notice of the power and place of the enemy.

(3) And leſt delay ſhould afford them aduantage, he committed the gouernment of his ſhips at anchor to Qu. Atrius, and his campe on land to the gard of ten Cohorts, beſides the ſtrength of three hundred horſemen; and himſelfe with the reſt about the third watch of the night tooke their march towards the enemy, proceeding with ſuch celerity, that by the day dawning they were entred twelue miles higher into the Continent: where ſeeking to paſſe a riuer, which is ſuppoſed to be the water Stower, the Britaines with their darts and chariots began in moſt terrible manner to aſſault the Romanes. But being at length by them repulſed, tooke into a wood ſtrongly fortified both by nature and mans induſtrie. For in the time of their owne diſſenſions they had formerly made this place one of their ſtrongeſt fortreſſes, and had cut down many trees, which ouerthwart the waies of entrance they had beſtowed.

Cæſar reſiſted at the riuer Stower.

(4) In this they ſecretly kept, and where they ſaw aduantage, would by companies ſallie out vpon the enemie to their no little annoiance. Whereupon Cæſar commanded the ſeuenth Legion to raiſe a banke, and to build a Teſtudo of boards, couered with raw hides, by which meanes the place without much adoe was won, and the Britaines forced to forſake the woods. Whoſe chaſe Cæſar forbade both in regard the day was neere ſpent, as alſo that the countrey was altogether vnknowen to the Romans. But the next day the purſuit being begun, ſudden newes was brought from Q. Atrius, that moſt of his ſhips the night before by a violent tempeſt were caſt on Land, their bulks ſhaken, their cables broken, and anckours loſt. Cæſars experience in like miſhaps the Summer before, made him ſo much more ready to preuent the worſt. And therefore recalling his forces, in all haſte returned to his Campe, finding the relation too true in their wracke, wherein forty of his ſhips were quite loſt. Wherefore he wrote to Labienus his Lieutenant in Gallia for ſupply of ſhips, thence to bee ſent in all haſte. Then gathering his ſhipwrights out of the legions, with the ruines of the bruiſed bulkes, he repaired the whole; and now hauing twice felt the dangers of theſe ſeas, cauſed his whole fleet, (a ſtrange attempt) to be drawn on land, euen into the midſt of the fortifications of his campe, ſo to ſecure them from the like miſhap, and that one ſtrength might defend both.

The Britains driuen from their fortreſſe.

Cæſars Nauie greatly impaired by tempeſt.

Hee draweth his fleet on ſhoare;

(5) In which admirable toile ten daies and nights were altogether ſpent, before hee could returne to the place from whence he came; where now the Britaines through great confluence of people had increaſed their power, and entred againe their fortreſſe and wood. The chiefe command of theſe affaires was committed ro Caſſibelan, whoſe coine wee haue heere likewiſe ſet, a Prince of good repute for feats in warre, whoſe Seigniory was ſeuered from the Cities towards the Sea by the great and famous riuer Thamiſis, and extended into the land full foureſcore miles.

This Caſſibelan preſent Gouernour of the Trinobants, had attained to the poſſeſſion of their chiefeſt Citie by the ſlaughter of Imanuence their former Ruler (a man well reſpected, and much lamented after death) whoſe ſonne Mandubrace, a gentleman of great hope, fearing the like danger, by the new eſtabliſhed authority of Caſſibelan, had made ouer into Gallia, crauing Cæſars aſſiſtance to ſet him in his right.

Cæſar. Com. lib. 5.

(6) Caſſibelan (if among theſe authentike Authors the Britiſh writers may bee heard) was the brother of King * Lud, and in the nonage of his nephewes gouerned the Trinobants, whoſe bounds hee ſought to enlarge vpon the bordering Countries of his neighbours, and in his fortunes had ſo borne himſelfe, that he was much maligned, and more feared. But now all their dangers yoked alike in a common perill, they laid aſide priuate grudges, and held him the only man to ſupport the ſtrength of their troubled and declining eſtate, and by a common conſent made him Generall of their Warres. The expectation of whoſe proceedings he long delaied not, but with a fierce and hot encounter did aſſaile the Romans, and ſo manfully diſcharged the parts of his place, that in the ſight of the whole Campe Quintus Laberius a military Tribune was ſlain, (in memory wherof the place as yet, though ſomewhat corruptly, is called Iul-laber) and Cæſar himſelfe profeſſeth he learned many points of martiall policy by their braue and running kinde of encountering.

(7) But his next daies ſeruice prooued not ſo fortunate; for the Romans hauing learned their owne defects by the former daies experience, laid aſide their weighty armour, that with the more facility they might both aſſaile the enemies, and with like nimbleneſſe auoid their furie, they hauing now beſtowed their powers diſperſedly, and ſcattered their troupes into companies, whereby the Romans were ſtil matched with freſh ſupplies. A policy no doubt of no ſmall conſequence, had not deſtiny determined the fatall ſubiection of the Britaines, and Fortune now raiſed the Romans almoſt to the height of their Monarchy.

(8) For this failing, the Britaines neuer after ſhewed themſelues with any vnited reſiſtance, but hauing loſt the day departed, thinking it better to ſecure euerie priuate by his owne meanes, then by a generall power to hazard all, as hopeleſſe any more to vphold that which the heauens (they ſaw) would haue down. And Caſſibelan himſelfe deſpairing of happy ſucceſſe, drew into his owne territories, keeping with him not aboue 4. thouſand wagons. And fearing the Romans further approch, fortified the riuer Thamiſis (then paſſable onely in one place) with ſharpned ſtakes bound about with lead, and driuen ſo deepe into the bottome, that Beda and Aſſer report them ſo to remaine in their times. All which notwithſtanding, the Romans paſſed with the repulſe of their enemies, and Cæſar, who grew now to the height of his honour, marched further into the Continent, and comming forward, was met by Ambaſſadours from the chiefeſt Citie of the Trinobants, which firſt of all the States profered ſubmiſſion, and promiſed ſubiection, with this intreaty alſo, that Mandubrace (who being Cæſars follower, and doubtleſſe the contriuer of this ſubmiſſion) might be Gouernour of their City.

Thither Cæſar came, and with little loſſe or labour won the place, and many of the miſerable Britaines both taken and ſlaine. Caſſibelan now deſpairing of his owne power, farre vnable to match, and much leſſe to ouermatch his Enemies, inſtigated the Gouernours of Kent, being foure in number, Cingetorix, Caruilius, Taximangulus, and Segonax, (whom Cæſar termeth

Cassibelan sollicíteth for peace.

(10) Cassibelan beholding these vnfortunate proceedings, feared the end of vnhappie successe, for hee saw his Country wasted, his owne designes defeated, and himselfe forsaken by the traiterous reuolt of many Cities and States on euery side. Therefore as bootlesse to bandy against fortune, he sought to hold his owne with others, and sent Comius King of the Atrebatij to be his meane to Cæsar for peace, which was the willinglier heard and granted, for that Princes great valour, and that Cæsar determined to winter in Gallia, his affaires so requiring it.

A great Tribute:

So saith an old written Chronicle, the Author not named.

(11) The conditions were hard, but necessitie must be obeied: for Cæsar imposed a grieuous Tribute to be taxed of the Britains, of no lesse then three thousand pounds yeerely to be paid, and moreouer included the safety of Mandubrace, with his Trinobantes taken into friendship, and protection of the Romans; & lastly, that these Couenants should be faithfully obserued, he cõmanded hostages for assurance forthwith to be deliuered. These things thus compounded, he tooke the Seas, about the second watch of the night, which then began to equalize the day in length, and safely arriued in the Continent of Gallia; Hauing rather shewed the place to posterities, then deliuered to the Romans the possession thereof, as Tacitus saith, supposing it his glory sufficient to vndergoe a matter so rare and difficult, and at his comming to Rome, to haue presented his British Captiues; whose strangenesse for attire and behauiour, filled the peoples eies both with wonder and delight. He offered also in the Temple of Venus genitrix, a Surcoat made all of British pearles, as a Trophey and Spoile of the Ocean. And now his fortunes comming to the highest, the title of perpetuall Dictator (then which the state of Rome could affoord nothing greater) sufficed him not, but a King hee will be, and sole gouernour ouer all, though contrarie to the Law and liking of the Romans; whereof in short time grew such heart-burning and hatred, that seuenty principall men conspired his death, and after his many dangers of enemies in battels abroad, was in the Senate-house amongst his supposed friends, and in peace, cruelly murdered, receiuing in his body three and twenty wounds, whereof he died, after he had sate Emperour only fiue moneths.

British Writers vary from Cæsar.

That Cassibelan. repulsed Cæsar twice.

Nenion won Cæsars sword.

Beda hist. li. 1. c. 2.

(12) I am not ignorant that the British writers doe varie from Cæsar in relating these his proceedings, and speake more honorably of their owne resistance then him-selfe hath set downe, namely, that by the valour of Cassibelan their King, in his first attempts hee was twice driuen backe without his purpose, and forced to take the Seas, to the great hazard of his ships and men, yea and with the losse of his owne sword, which with great prowesse was wonne from him in a single encounter by Nenion, Cassibelans brother. And surely howsoeuer Polydore accounteth their Story new, and Cæsar carrieth himselfe gloriouslie in his owne affaires; yet by sundry other renowned writers it seemeth, that the currant of his Conquest went nothing so smooth and vntroubled, or with so little losse of the Romans, nor the Britaines liberties forgone by so easie resistãce: which may be collected euen out of some couert passages of Cæsars own words, where it appeareth, that hee durst not at sundry times giue the Britaines battell, though they were only harnessed in leather, and his Souldiers were all old Legionaries of long seruice, called for their huge armour, Milites grauis armaturæ, as hauing helmet, corslet and boots, all of massy brasse or iron, with a large target, a strong two edged sword, and a great staffe or clubbe headed with an iron pike; which oddes notwithstanding had not Casibelan been vndermined by Mandubrace, and traiterously forsaken (which Cæsar himselfe confesseth) by the Princes which promised him assistance, perhaps Cæsar might haue missed this parcell of his glory: for all these helps, Lucan saith expressly of him,

Territa quæsitis ostendit terga Britannis:
He Britains found, but left them soone by flight.

Lucan.

Eutropius saith, He was wearied out and quelled both with the fierce battels of the enemie, and crosses of tempests. Tacitus saith, Hee found out Britannie for the Romans, but could not winne it for them: which was the very cause why (as Dion witnesseth) for twenty yeeres after Cæsars entrance, Britannie kept their owne Kings and their owne lawes, & had no forraine Prefects to command them. Aud Beda sheweth, that Cæsar in this Land was both receiued with sharpe and sore fight, and weakened by the losse of his ships, and with the most part of his men at armes. Tacitus also, vsing the speech of Caractacus to his Souldiers, hath these words: He called (saith he) vpon the names of his Ancestors, which chased Cæsar the Dictator out of the Ile, by whom and by whose valour they were deliuered from Hatchets and Tributes, and enioyed freely their wiues and childrens bodies vndefiled. Againe, in the cosultations of the Britaines intending a reuolt, hee allegeth their arguments, whereof one was the sudden departure of Cæsar out of this Iland, little better then a flight. With whom Dion Cassius also agreeth, affirming that Cæsar got nothing in Britaine besides the honour and renowne of that voiage, & sight of that Country, vntill then vnknowne to the Romans. And againe (saith hee) Cæsar departed thence hauing done no memorable act, which caused the Britaines to be secure and careless to prouide themselues against his second arriuage. Whereby is apparant (euen by Romane writers) both the bold resistance that the Britaines made, and the deare subiection that the Romans bought. But in matters so farre past, it is hard for mee to auouch any thing resoluedly, vnlesse I could meete with that aged Britaine whom M. Aper conferred with heere in Britanny (as Quintilian writeth) who auowed that hee was in the British Campe when they did beat Cæsar from the shore.

(13) Neither will I vrge that for truth, which Authours haue left vs in their reports, concerning the many prodigies before going, and forewarning his death: things rather to be accounted the superfluities of their owne pens, & vaine imageries, euer working vpon accidentall euents, and ascribing issued successe to a supernaturall cause. Such conceit had Cæsar of himselfe, that for his fortunes hee would be stiled amongst the Gods: and his deitie to that credulous generation was further strengthned by the appearance of a blazing starre, which mooued (no doubt) an ouer-large opinion of his humane power, and caused his glory much to surmount it selfe. And therefore lest ignorance should any way blemish his immortality, they haue fained the manner of his dying best pleasing to himselfe, and many ominous signes to foreshew the same: all which he either lightly despised, or carelesly neglected, as they would haue their Readers beleeue.

After the death of Cæsar, thus slaine in the Senate, Octauian (the grand-childe of Iulia, Cæsars sister) whom hee had adopted, and declared his haire, returned vnto Rome from Apollonia*, where he studied Philosophy, intending to prosecute the reuenge of Cæsars death; where falling at oddes with Marcus Antonius, a man of great spirit and power, and setting himselfe against Brutus and Cassius, with their Complices, for the murder of his vncle, secretly wrought the friendship of the Citizens, before whose eies also Cæsars wounds seemed yet to bleed.

But yet the truth is (as Dion Cassius hath it) that Octauian desirous in all things to be like vnto Cæsar, seeing their tribute neglected, had intended a voiage towards Britaine; but hauing set forwards into Gallia, he had there tidings of the sudden reuolt of the Pannonians, against whom he diuerted his prepared power, and left his first designement for that time. (5) The Britaines seeing themselues thus still sought after, sent vnto Cæsar their excuses, with presents to be offered in the Capitoll to the Romane Gods, hauing now learned with the rest of the world to appease Princes by gifts and rewards, yeelding part of the Iland, and swearing him fealty in the Temple of Mars, and so were registred subiects to the Romane Empire. At which time also they agreed to pay tolles and customes for all wares which they transported into other parts, their merchandize chiefly consisting of Iuory boxes, and Iron Chaines, and other small trifles of Amber and Glasse. All which agreements and compositions were afterward so loyally obserued, and the Land so composed to quietnesse, that one band of souldiers, with a small troope of horse (as Strabo saith) or foure Legions (as Iosephus writeth) were sufficient to containe so great a multitude in a setled forme of obedience.

(6) Ouer the Trinobantes, the greatest and most potent State of the Britaines, then raigned the happie Prince Cunobeline (for so in his Coines yet remaining wee find it) corruptly written Kimbeline, the sonne of Theomantius nephew to Cassibelan before spoken of, whose abode and principall seat was Camalodunum, as by the reuerse of the said Coines may appeare. This Prince to make his estate more respectiue, caused his owne Image to be stamped thereon, after the manner of the Romans, (who now had newly taken vp that fashion) his paiments before consisting for the most part in rings of iron, & plates of brasse, seized at a certaine waight, which vsually passed for currant amongst the Britaines, as Cæsar reporteth, and as those rings are yet witnesses, whereof we haue seene some.

Cæsar. Com. lib. 5.

This man trained his people to a more ciuill life then formerly had been accustomed, and enioied peace with the rest of the world, which then stood vniuersally in quiet, as waiting the comming of that Prince of peace, whose going foorth had beene from euerlasting, and of whose kingdome there shall bee no end: euen Christ the anointed Emmanuel and sonne of the liuing God: so long before expected, and now in the fulnesse of time manifested: at whose birth warre went downe, as Virgil speaketh, or rather to vse the words of the Prophet, when swords were made into mattocks, and speares broken into sithes: And as in the building of Salomons Temple neither noise of axe, nor the sound of hammer was heard; so his body being the true Temple, he came and was incarnate at such time, when the sound of warre did not awake the world, but a calme and quiet peace incompassed it, as by the Angels was proclaimed amongst the Iewes, and now was more publikely made knowen amongst the Gentiles by the shutting of Ianus Temple in Rome. This vniuersall peace was so famous and so admirable, that it found matter for the finest wits amongst the Heathens to enlarge themselues: whereupon Virgil framing the perswasions of Iupiter to his daughter, foreshewth the happy successe of her seed, and in what tranquillity they should sit, when the hands of Mars were thus restrained from sight, as he thus expresseth:

And yet further in his Ecloge (from the Sibyls, who in all likelihood had it from the diuine Oracles) hee vseth the very words of the Prophets in speaking of a Maid, and a Child of a new progeny borne and sent down from heauen, by whom the brassy and iron-like world should cease, and a pure golden age succeed. Thus he sweetly singeth:

Hee was a Prince indued with great wiſdome, magnanimitie, and Iuſtice; yet faulty in this, that he tooke from Tiberius Nero his wife Liuia, both great with child, and hauing alſo formerly borne him a ſonne. Deuout he was in the worſhip of the Romane Gods; amongſt whom in the Capitoll he built an Altar vnto the Hebrew childe, with this inſcription: The Altar of the firſt begotten Sonne of God: being thereunto mooued by the Oracle of Apollo that had anſwered his owne deſtruction by the birth of this childe. Of Stature he was but low, and of a good complexion; gray-eied, his haire ſomewhat yellow, and his body freckled with ſpots, which as his flatterers would haue the world beleeue, were in forme like ſtarres. Predictions foreſhewing his gouernment and death are alleged, the which I willingly ouerpaſſe, holding moſt of them rather fantaſies then truth. At his death hee demanded of the ſtanders by, whether he had well acted the enterlude of his life vpon the ſtage of this world: and died fourteene yeeres after Chriſt his incarnation; leauing after him ſo honorable an eſtimation of his glory, that as the ſucceeding Emperours in remembrance of Iulius Cæſar gloried to be called Cæſars, ſo they euer held the name of Auguſti to be ſacred, and only befitting perſons deſtinated to imperiall Maieſty. AVguſtus Cæſar thus glorioufly raigning, and peaceably dying, had ordained for his ſucceſſour Tiberius Nero, the ſonne of Tiberius the Patritian, and of Liuia his wife, whom (as we ſaid before) he had taken for his Empreſſe, and by whoſe incitements and continuall inſtigations it was procured: though Suetonius attributeth it vnto Auguſtus his owne ambitions, to make himſelfe the ſooner miſſed, and the more lamented, in leauing his vnlike to ſucceed, whoſe conditions as they ſtood vpon their owne baſis, hee knew to bee reproueable, and contemptible.

(2) But before the death of Cæſar could be diuulged, to write his imperiall ſtile as it were in blood, he began with the murder of young Agrippa, the ſonne of Iulia, daughter to Octauian, and once his owne wife, and continued his raigne with ſuch tyranny and murther, that many he ſlaughtred, without reſpect of perſon or cauſe; & in his looſeſt laſciuiouſneſſe, thought of nothing but how to ſubuert the Nobility; for rare it was in his daies that any ſuch died a naturall death: and maintaining a race of men (Promoters, as Tacitus tearmes them, found out for a common ouerthrow and deſtruction of others) allured them by rewards to accuſe the rich, though guiltleſſe; only this fauour granted to the condemned, that if they ſlew themſelues before the day of execution, their bodies ſhould haue buriall, their goods at their owne diſpoſe, and their teſtament ſtand good in law.

And moſt certaine it is, the Britaines, if not in ſubiection, yet were well affected to the Romans, as appeareth by Tacitus in the kinde entertainments, and in releeuing their ſhipwracked ſouldiers, that in croſſing the Seas were by tempeſt driuen vpon their Coaſts, and courteouſly ſent thence by their petty Kings vnto Germanicus their Generall. Notwithſtanding, Ieffrey Monmouth ſeemeth to affirme the contrary, that bringeth the raign of one Guiderius, and the valour of Aruiragus, the ſonnes of Cunobeline (of whom more heereafter) to withſtand the Romiſh Command, and vtterly to refuſe the paiment of Tribute, banding both againſt Tiberius, as alſo againſt Caligula and Claudius the Emperours ſucceeding.

He was of perſonage tall, and of body ſtrong, broad cheſted, and vſed both his hands alike, faire of complexion; but great and goggle-eied, whereby he ſaw ſo cleerly, as is incredible to report.

NExt vnto Tiberius ſucceeded his nephew Caius Caligula, the ſonne of Germanicus the ſonne of Druſus. His mother was Agrippina, the daughter of Iulia, Cæſars wife; and his coines as thou ſeeſt aboue, being rather liked for his fathers vertues, (who was for learning, vertue, valor & courteſie, the moſt admired man of that age (then for any parts of his owne anſwerable to ſo high a place, as being neither naturally framed for good preſence in Throne, nor qualified in minde for an Imperiall Command. His owne mother he defamed to bee inceſtuouſly begotten; his grand-mother he poiſoned; his brother Tiberius he murdered; his three naturall ſiſters hee polluted inceſtuouſly, and vpon Druſilla the ſecond ſo incredibly doted, that he vſed to ſweare by her ſacred name, & deified her for a Goddeſſe by the name of Panthea, cõmanding diuine honors to be done vnto her. (2) How the other Prouinces stood affected, I leaue to themselues; but by Tacitus it should seeme the Britaines and Germans were not his best subiects: for these are his words, that Caius had a meaning to inuade Britaine, it is certainly knowen: but his rash running head, and hasty repentance in his attempts against Germany, turned all to nothing. And Suetonius ascribes the foolish erection of that admirable bridge ouer a creeke of the Sea in Campania (whereof Dion writeth at large) to his vaine-glorious conceit, that by a brute blazed abroad of so huge and monstrous a worke, he might terrifie Germanie and Britaine, vpon which Countries he meant to make warre. The issue whereof was as fruitlesse as his great cost was ridiculous. For hauing set forward for the conquest of Britaine with no small preparation, hee proceeded no further then to those parts of Holland that confront against Northfolke, where hee suddenly pitched his tents and staied.

(3) At which time, Adminius the sonne of Cunobelin King of Britaine being banished by his father, fled ouer Sea with a small power, and submitted himselfe vnto Cæsars protection: wherupon Caligula wrote vaunting letters to the Senate, as if the whole Iland had beene yeelded into his hands: commanding the messenger that his letters should be carried in a Chariot into the Curia, and not deliuered but in the Temple of Mars, and that in a frequent and full assembly of the Senate. And hauing no further matter to worke vpon, hee caused certaine German prisoners secretly to bee conueied into a wood, and word to bee brought him in great feare and amazement of the sudden approch of the enemie; against whom with shew of great manhood & noble resolution in all haste and warlike manner he marched, and in chaines openly shewed them as his captiues taken in warre, forbidding the Senators the wonted celebration of their Feasts, or enter their Theaters to take solace, seeing their Cæsar exposed himselfe to so many perils, and fought so great battels with hazard of his life. Last of all, as if he had meant to make a finall dispatch for euer of the warre, hee drew his forces downe to the Sea-coast of Belgia, and embattailed his army vpon the Ocean shoare, planting his balists and other Engines of artillery in their seuerall places, no man witting what hee meant: which done, himselfe in a Galley launched into the Sea, and immediately returning, caused the Trumpets to sound the battle, and commanded his Souldiers forthwith to fall a gathering of cockles and muscles into their helmets, terming them the Spoiles of the conquered Ocean: Against which hee also built a Tower, as a Trophey of his victory, the ruines whereof as yet remaine in Holland to this day, and is called The Britons house, in memory of that fantasticall seruice: vpon which exploit he made a glorious Oration to his souldiers, commending and requiting their valours with rewards, and auowing their shell-spoiles worthy offrings to be presented in the Capitoll, writing letters to Rome of this his great Conquest, and demanding Triumph, and diuine honours to be assigned him: which when the Senatours made some question of, hee threatned them with death. But this Sea-seruice (as it seemeth) so ran euer after in his minde, that one night hee dreampt that the Sea in dreadfull shape came and expostulated with him, which cast him into an incredible horrour and affright.

(5) And now both the Ambition and cruelty of Caius was growen so intolerably sauage, as that he often lamented that some rare and vnusuall disaster (as either some horrible slaughter of huge Armies, or some vniuersall plague, or famine, or fire, or opening of the earth, or ouer-flowing of the Sea) happened not in his time, whereby his raigne might be made memorable to posterity. And hee wished that all the people of Rome had but one necke, that he might haue the glory of giuing the braueste blow that euer was giuen, whereby so infinite multitudes of men might be killed by him at one stroke. But this his wish was preuented by a blow on himselfe, his death and downefall being complotted and executed by certain Tribunes, whereof Cherea was chiefe; who following him from the Theater with resolution of the fact, tooke the time when Caligula turning suddenly aside into a narrow Cloister to see certaine boies sent him out of Asia, lost the defense of his fore-warders, and the straitnesse of the place permitted not his gard to follow, on which aduantage Cherea demanded his watch-word, which he (according to his vsuall manner) gaue in great disdaine and scorne, wherunto Cherea replied, and with his sword wounded him in the necke, and iaw; and then the rest of the Conspirators comming in, with thirty wounds made an end of his life, after hee had most impiously raigned three yeeres and tenne moneths.

CLAVDIVS DRVSVS.

Chapter VI.

Claudius Druſus Emp.

Aulus Plautius Lieut.

Claudius Druſius choſen by the Pretorian Souldiers.

Ioſeph antiquit. l. 19. ca. 3.

VT Claudius Druſus a man of better ſpirit and temperature, immediately vpon the death of Caligula, and euē in the height of thoſe diſturbances, by the Pretorian Souldiers (who were encamped neer the walles of Rome) was nominated, and choſen Emperor; whereas the Senate had decreed and determined to reduce the Citie into her ancient libertie, without admiſſion of any Caſar, or ſubiection to ſuch abſolute and ſole authoritie; notwithſtanding, the power of this Army ſo preuailed, that the election was confirmed, and the Imperiall dignity by him aſſumed, as the next, and onely man to whom it muſt of right belong: whoſe father Druſus was the ſonne of Liuia, wife to Octauius, from whom the Emperours ſucceeding held it a glory to bē any waies allied.

Claudius his parentage.

(2) In his firſt proceedings with the Prouinces affaires, hee determined warre againſt the Britaines, whoſe Tribute had been a long time neglected, and whoſe ſubiection was now to bee feared: all of them being raiſed in a tumultuous vprore. The cauſe pretended was certaine fugitiues, (the betraiers of their State and liberties) lately departed, and by the Romans receiued with protection of the Emperour: a matter that moued them to great diſcontents, and ſerued as a ſhew for their iuſt reuolt.

The Britaines detaine their Tribute.

Dion. Caſſ. lib. 60. Anno Dom. 45.

(3) Claudius, as ready to preuent the worſt, being thereto further incited by Bericus one of thoſe Britiſh fugitiues as Dion reporteth, in the ſecond yeare of his Empire, and from Chriſts Natiuitie forty fiue, ſent Aulus Plautius a Romane Senator, well experienced in the affaires of warre, to take charge of the Armie remaining in Gallia, and with thoſe old trained Souldiers to make ouer into Britaine to retaine their obedience. Which ſeruice vpon them thus impoſed, was generally diſtaſted, as apparantly was ſhewed by their vnwillingneſſe thitherward, muttering and complaining, that they muſt now be inforced to make warre out of the world, and protracting time, could hardly bee drawne forward, though the Emperour ſent his ſecond command.

Aulus Plautius ſent againſt the Britaines.

His Souldiers vnwilling. Dio lib. 60.

(4) But being at laſt embarked and croſſing the Seas, their ſhippes were beaten with contrary winds, which ſtill added diſcouragements vnto their proceedings, and had not an accident the ſame time happened, the edge of their courage had beene more abated: for euen in this diſtraction ſuddenly a fiery leame ſhot it ſelfe from Eaſt to Weſt, the ſame way that their ſhippes made ſaile: which preſently gaue hopes to their deſpairing hearts, being heatheniſhly interpreted for a ſigne of good lucke, and ſo ſent from their Gods, whereupon without any reſiſtance, they came to ſhoare and tooke land.

(5) The Britaines that miſtruſted no ſuch ſudden inuaſion, and now thus ſurpriſed vnawares, diſperſedly ſecured themſelues in woods and mariſhes, thereby to detract time, and the more to weary the Enemy by delaies: which thing Plautius well perceiued, and with much labour, and hazard followed ſo extreamly, that many he ſlew, and tooke priſoner Cataratus their Captaine, the ſon of Cunobeline but lately deceaſed, which brought ſuch terrour amongſt the Britains, that thereupon the Bodvni, the inhabitants of Oxford and Gloceſterſhires, yeelded themſelues to Plautius deuotion: for which ſeruice thus effected, the Senate decreed his Triumphs; & it is probable that this defeat of the Britaine forces, and ſurpriſe of their King, fell out in the ſixt yeare of this Emperours raigne, by the reuerſe of his money then minted

(6) But he following ſtill the Enemy, being ſeconded by Flauius Veſpaſian (afterward Emperour) the leader of the ſecond legion (the foundation of whoſe ſucceeding fortunes was firſt laid here in Britaine) gaue them againe another ouerthrow. The chiefeſt meanes whereof was a politie they had gotten to gall the Chariot horſes, whereby their riders were maiſtered, and their whole powers diſordered: many Britaines in this battaile were ſlaine, and more in danger, had not the night ended the ſkirmiſh.

C. Sidius Geta his valour.

(7) The next day the battaile was againe begun and maintained on both parts with equall aduantage, till C. Sidius Geta enforced the Britaines to retire, whereby the victory reſted in the Romans: for which exploit Triumphall honours were aſſigned him, although he had not yet attained to the Conſular degree. In this Conflict Veſpaſian hardly eſcaped, being ſore oppreſſed by the Enemy, and in ſuch ſort, that had not Titus (his renowned ſonne) come to reſcue, he had beene ſlaine, whoſe valour afterwards was tried in one & thirtie battailes, & in the Conqueſt of the Ile of Wight.

The Britaines retire to places of aduantage.

(8) After this conflict, the Britaines withdrew themſelues into places of more aduantage, and in the mouth of Thamiſis neere her fall into the Sea, paſſed the ſhallowes and firme grounds in ſafetie, whereas the Romans ignorant of both, brought many into danger, and in their diſtreſſed paſſage, were ſharpely aſſailed by the Enemie, in which turmoile, a bloody battaile was begunne, wherein Togodumnus a Britiſh Prince, brother to Caractatus, and ſonne to Cunobeline, was ſlaine: Notwithſtanding, the courage of the Britaines was nothing abated, but rather exaſperated to a further reuenge: for effecting whereof, new forces were gathered, and confluence of people aſſembled from each part of the Ile. Plautius the Leiutenant ſeing daily the increaſe of their power, Veſpaſian imploied in other parts, and himſelfe ſtreitned in a place of danger, proceeded no further, but ſent word to the Emperour of the doubtfull eſtate of their affaires, Claudius the Emperor, commeth into Britaine with a great Army.

(9) At that time (ſaith Suetonius,) the Senate had by decree allowed Claudius his Triumphall ornaments. But he ſuppoſing that ſuch a bare title of honour was inferiour to the Maieſtie of an Emperour, and willing of himſelfe alſo to enterpriſe ſome exploit whereby he might winne the glory of a compleat Triumph, made choice before all other Prouinces, of Britaine, attempted by none ſince Iulius Caſar of famous Memory. And with great ſtrength entred into the iourney, hauing with him a mightie Armie both of horſe and foote, as alſo Elephants, a beaſt of great bigneſſe and burthen, whoſe ſtrangeneſſe then amazed the Britaines, and whoſe Carcaſes falling in this Land, their late found bones (no doubt) haue bred our [illegible], beeing ſuppoſed to be of men, and not of beaſtes.

Claudius entreth Britaine.

(10) With very great danger he paſſed the Seas, and ioining ſtrength with his Lieutenant and Veſpaſian, they all together croſſed the Riuer Thamiſis, where preſently they were encountred by the Britaines, who a while maintained the battaile very deſperately, but in the end gaue place & fled, whom the Romanes purſued euen to their ſtrong Camulodunum, then the ſeate of Adminius, Cunobelins ſonne, as may [illegible] be coniectured by the Medul of Britannicus the Emperours darling, figured in the front of this Chapter. This City they ſurpriſed and fortified with their owne Garriſons, & the Emperour afterwards in the eleuenth of his raigne (as appeareth by the other coine) turned to a Colony of Romane Citizens. Claudius now diſarming the Britaines, remitted further puniſhment either vpon their bodies or confiſcation of their goods: The which his fauorable clemencie moued thoſe diſtreſſed Britaines to ſuch liking and loue, as they erected a Temple and Alter in his name, and gaue him diuine honour, as a God: The reſt, as vnable to reſiſt, proffered their ſubmiſſions, and promiſed a peaceable ſubiection vnder the Romans gouernment.

He ſurpriſeth Camulodunum.

His clemencie maketh him to be honoured for a God.

(11) Theſe things thus atchieued, at the end of ſixe moneths Claudius in his ninth yeare returned and entred Rome in triumph with more then vſuall manner, ſtamping againe vpon his monies his arch of victory, as appeareth in the face of this Chapter, a perpetuall trophie of his victories and memory of our ſeruitude. After whoſe Triumphant Chariot rode Meſſalina his wife, the Monſter of her ſexe for impudencie & laſciuious life: and vpon the top of his Palace he placed a Nauall Coronet in memoriall of the Ocean by him ſailed ouer, & therefore by his flatterers ſaid to be ſubdued; withall aſſuming to himſelfe, & ſonne, the Sirname Britannicus: And honoured Plautius with his preſence in his Triumphs for Britaine, giuing him the right hand, aſcending the Capitoll, & beſides graced diuers Captaines that ſerued vnder him in that warre with Triumphall ornaments. So great an eſteeme was held of the Conqueſt of ſo ſmall a part of this Iland.

Claudius returneth to Rome, and entreth in Triumph.
Sueton. in vita Claud. Sect. 17.

(12) The Britiſh Hiſtorians relate theſe things farre otherwiſe, reporting that their King Aruiragus, the youngeſt ſonne of Kymbeline, withſtood Claudius in his enterpriſe, with whom (ſay they) he came to compoſition by giuing him his daughter Genuſſa in mariage, in memorie whereof, he built the Citie Glauceſter, according to his name; which now is called Gloceſter: But Suetonius writing the life of Claudius, his wiues and children, nameth his daughters onely to be Claudia, Antonia, and Octauia, without mention of Geniſſa at all, and therefore not likely to haue any ſuch. And Dion Caſſius reporteth, that Claudius himſelfe ſtaied not aboue ſixteene daies in Britaine, a time too ſhort for the ſending to Rome, and thence for the returne with his daughter, or for the building of ſo great a Citie as Gloceſter is. Neither indeede was Aruiragus knowne in the daies of Claudius: But rather liued in the time of Domitian the ſeuenth in ſucceſſion after him, as plainely appeareth by Iuuenal the Poet, in thoſe his verſes ſpoke to Domitian, which elſwhere we cited. Whereby appeareth that the ſtirres of this King could not accord with Claudius raigne, and that the trueth of this report is much weakned from more ſufficient authorities. But to proceede, Aulus Plautius (the firſt Lieutenant authoriſed ouer the Britaines, vpon ſome occaſion was thence reuoked, the warres not quieted, and with a ſmall Triumph (as Tacitus ſaith) entred Rome. Vnto him ſucceeded P. Oſtorius Scapula, for reputation in martiall affaires nothing his inferiour, who at his firſt landing found all in an vprore: Of whoſe proceedings let vs heare Tacitus ſpeake: The Britaines (ſaith he) that were yet vnconquered, ranged the countries of the confederates, preſuming both vpon the approach of the winter, and the Propretors vnacquaintance with his Army: But he knowing that the firſt ſucceſſe breedeth either feare or confidence, gathered the Cohorts, and made towards the Enemy, ſlaying all that made head againſt him, and diſarming thoſe whom hee moſt ſuſpected. And to retaine Cogidunus the King in ſtricter aſſurance and fidelity to the Emperour, granted diuers Cities and States to him by way of Donation.

The firſt that beganne to ſtirre were the Icenians, the Inhabitants of Norfolke, Suffolke, Cambridge, and Huntington-ſhires, a ſtrong people vnſhaken with warres: And with them (at their inſtigation) their neighbours adioining. Theſe together choſe a fit place for fight, compaſſed in with a rude, but defencible trench, which had only one narrow entrance whereby the Horſemen muſt be much impeached. This Rampire, notwithſtanding the Romane Captaine, with the onely aide of the * Allies, brake downe, and diſordered the Enemy euen in this their owne fortreſſe, who ſeeing all paſſages for eſcape to bee ſtopped vp, Oſtorius hauing hemmed them in with Garriſons betweene the Riuers * Antonia and Sabrina) ſhewed great valour in defending themſelues and and by their deaths gaue place to the Romanes. This ouerthrow and ſlaughter of the Iceni wrought a more ſtaied reſolution in thoſe that before were wauering betweene warre and peace. And the Army led againſt the Cangi, with waſte and ſpoile conſumed the Country, the inhabitants not daring to bee ſeene in field. Whereupon the Romanes pierced thorow the Land euen vnto the Sea-coaſt that lookes towards Ireland.

A ſmall reſiſtance was made by the Brigantes, but without much trouble ſoone quieted, by the execution of ſome few, and pardoning of the reſt.

(13) But the Silures (that is, thoſe of South-wales) could not be brought to beare the Romiſh yoke of ſubiection, who beſides their owne courage relied much vpon the ſtrength and valour of their Prince Caractacus (whoſe Coine we haue here expreſſed) a man which had waded thorow many dangers, and in many aduentures both proſperous and luckie, had gotten ſuch reputation, that hee was preferred before all the Britiſh Captaines. This Generall knowing his owne ſtrength vnable to match the enemie, by policy thought to ſupply that want, and hauing aduantage of the Countrey, remooued the warre vnto the Ordouices, which is now North-wales, where all ioined to him that either feared or diſdained to hold peace with the Romans. Heere he choſe a place to encampe his hoſt, euen on the top of a hill naturally defenſed from acceſſe: and where any doubt was, there he ſtopped vp all paſſage with heapes of ſtones in maner of a Rampire; neere the foot whereof ran a Riuer with a foord ſomewhat dangerous, and not eaſily found, where a troope of his beſt ſouldiers were ſet in order to receiue the Enemy.

His manner of encamping.

His animating of his ſouldiers.

Tacitus lib.12.c.8.

The more to animate their mindes, the Leaders went about exhorting and encouraging the Souldiers, taking all occaſions of feare from them, and putting them in hope, with all inducements of reſolution: eſpecially Caractacus, who courſing hither and thither, proteſted that day and that battle ſhould bee the beginning either of a recouered liberty, or elſe a perpetuall ſeruitude and bondage: and euer hee called vpon the names of his valiant Anceſtors, who formerly had chaſed Ceſar the Dictator out of the Ile, by whoſe valour they were deliuered from Hatchets and Tributes, and enioied freely their wiues and childrens bodies vndefiled. The Souldiers alſo themſelues ſhewed as great forwardneſſe, and as Echoes redoubled his words, vowing acccording to the Religion of their Country, neuer to yeeld for wounds or life, which they all were ready to ſacrifice in the cauſe of their liberties. This their apparant reſolution much appalled the Romans cheerfulneſſe, and moſt of all the Captaines and Leaders, who before their faces ſaw the Riuer on both ſides of them had the hanging hils, and the Port commodious for the enemie, but deadly vnto them: all which nothwithſtanding the common Souldiers deſpiſed, and demanded the battle. Oſtorius, whoſe ſtudy was chiefly to performe the parts of a Generall, paſſed the Riuer with ſome little difficulty, and leading his Army vp to the Rampire, was met with ſuch a ſhowre of darts, that many therewith were wounded and ſlaine. Yet at length breaking downe thoſe rude compacted ſtones, ioined battle with the enemy, and afront came cloſe to handy ſtrokes; wherein the Britaines hauing better courage then armour (for they had neither headpeece nor coat of defēce) were ſore galled with their Iauelings and two-handed ſwords, and ſo diſordered, that they betooke themſelues to flight.

Oſtorius his care.

The Britaines put to flight.

(14) This victory as it was almoſt vnexpected, ſo was it made famous by the taking of Caractacus wife, daughter, and brethren, and himſelfe flying for ſuccor and protection to the Brigantes, was (as we haue before ſhewed) by Cartiſmandua their Queene betraied and deliuered into the hands of the Conquerours after his nine yeeres moſt generous reſiſtance. Whereupon his fame being carried ouer the Ilands, and ſpread abroad thorow the Prouinces, was alſo renowned in Italie, and they deſired to ſee him that ſo many yeeres had contemned their forces. Neither was his name meanly eſteemed of at Rome; for whileſt Ceſars worth and power was there commended, a more glorious conceit was held of the conquered Caractacus: and againſt his comming to the City the people from all parts were aſſembled, as to behold ſome notable and moſt rare ſpectacle. The Emperours Guard in armes and good order were placed in the field before the Campe, thorow whom the Captiues and Trophies were carried, and preſented after this manner: firſt the vaſſals of Caractacus going formoſt bowed their bodies to the people as they paſſed, and ſeemed by their ruefull countenances to diſcouer the ſenſe of their calamity. The capariſons, his chaines, and other ſpoiles gotten in the warres, were carried after them. Then Caractacus his brethren, wife, and daughter followed, and laſt of all himſelfe, whoſe attire and ſtout behauiour filled the peoples eies with wonder and delight. His bodie, for the moſt part, was naked, and painted with figures of diuers beaſts. Hee ware a chaine of iron about his necke, and another about his middle: the haire of his head hanging downe in curled lockes, couered his backe and ſhoulders, and the haire of his vpper lip parted on both ſides, lay vpon his breaſt. Neither was his behauiour leſſe noted then the ſtrangeneſſe of his habit: for he neither hung downe his head as daunted with baſe feare, nor craued mercie, as the reſt; but with a confident ſpirit, and bold countenance, held on till he came before the Imperiall Seat, where making his ſtand, and a while beholding Ceſars Maieſty, at laſt with great courage ſpake to this purpoſe.

Tacit Annal. li. 12. cap. 8.

Oſtorius and his fortunes decline.

The Britaines take heart again.

(17) For immediatly they enuironed the Campmaſter, and the Legionary Cohorts, which were left to build fortreſſes in the Country of the Silures, whom with eight Centurions, and the forwardeſt Souldiers, they ſlew, and had put all the reſt to the ſword, if reſcue had not ſpeedily come from the villages and forts adioining. The Forragers alſo and troope of horſe that were ſent to aid them, they put to flight. Theſe affronts touched Oſtorius to the quick, and leſt their aids ſhould grow to a greater head, he ſent forth certaine light-harneſſed companions, which with the Legionary Souldiers vndertooke the battle, and with ſmall oddes was it continued till the night came, and parted them: diuers other skirmiſhes afterwards the Britaines made, though for the moſt part in woods and mariſhes, whence taking their aduantage in ſayling forth, they many times preuailed, ſometimes by ſtrength, ſometimes by meere courage, and ſometimes by chance; neither were they alwaies commanded by their Captaines, but many times fought voluntary & without preſſe.

Their victory.

(18) The principall motiue that induced the reſt to take Armes, was the example of the Silures, who were moſt reſolutely bent, as beeing exaſperated by certaine ſpeeches that the Romane Emperour himſelfe had vſed, which was, that as the name of the Sugambri was deſtroied, and the people tranſported into Gallia, ſo the memorie of Silures ſhould vtterly bee extinguiſhed: And in this heate, as men deſperate (whoſe diſtinies were read and lots caſt already) they intercepted the ſcattered troopes of the Romanes that vncircumſpectly waſted and ſpoiled the Country, taking of them many priſoners and recouering rich booties, which they ſent and diſtributed amongſt their neighbours; whereby many other were drawn to reuolt: Theſe proceedings ſate ſo neere Oſtorius his heart, who with long cares and trauels had wearied his ſpirits, ſpent the ſtrength of his bodie, and thereunto had now added the diſcontentment of his minde, that in theſe vexations hee gaue vp the Ghoſt, the Silures reioicing that ſo worthy and victorious a Captaine was fallen in their warres.

Caeſars threats make the Britains more reſolute.

Oſtorius dieth.

(19) But Claudius Caeſar, leſt the Prouince ſhould make head, preſently ſent Aulus Didius for his Lieutenent into Britaine; where notwithſtanding all his haſte he found all out of frame. For Manlius Valens with his Legion had encountred the Britaines with ill ſucceſſe, yet not ſo bad as the Ilanders gaue foorth, thinking thereby to terrifie their new eſtabliſhed Gouernour: which report himſelfe alſo in policie was contented to augment; Thereby to purchaſe more praiſe in appeaſing ſo dangerous ſtirres; or if hee could not, to retaine his own credit without his valours impeachment. Theſe reſiſters had made many inroads into the ſubdued Countries; againſt whom vpon his firſt arriuall, Didius entred the field, and for a while kept them in awe.

Aulus Didius ſent Lieutenant into Britaine.

Tacit Annal. 12. c. 8. Manlius Valens encountered the Britaines with ill ſucceſſe.

Didius for a while keepeth them in awe.

(20) But Venutus a very expert man in Militarie affaires (truſty to the Romanes, and defended by their power ſo long as the mariage betwixt him and Cartiſmandua continued) began a new rebellion: for Cartiſmandua (in ſpeciall fauour with the Romans for the deliuery of Caractacus) abounding in wealth, peace, & pleaſures (which commonly are the Nurſes of licentious liuing) fell in loue (as before was touched) with [illegible] her huſbands ſeruant, and harneſſe-bearer, and forgetting her owne honour, preferred him before Venutius, and laboured to make him King. The good-will of the Country notwithſtanding went generally vpon the lawfull husband: who being deepely touched with this open iniurie, raiſed a power againſt her and her Paramour. At the firſt this quarrell was onely betwixt them, vntill that Cartiſmandua by policie had taken her husbands brother, and ſome of his neereſt kindred, priſoners. Whereupon the next Inhabitants fearing her purpoſes, and diſdaining to be brought vnder the yoake of a woman ſo defamed, declared themſelues for Venutius, and with a choice bond of youthfull Soldiers inuaded her Territories: whereof Didius hauing intelligence, ſent certain Cohorts to ſecond her and encounter them. In which conflict, the Romans for Cartiſmandua did preuaile; yet the kingdome remained to Venutius, and the warres ſtill vnto them.

Tacit hiſt. li. 3 c. 9.

(21) For the Silures were not altogether quieted, & a Legion commanded by Caeſius Naſica, fought luckily againſt the Britaines. In all which ſtirres Didius in perſon was abſent, as being ſtricken in yeares, and hauing receiued many honours, held it ſufficient to execute his charge by the aſſiſtance of others. The State of Britain thus ſtanding, let vs ſo leaue it during this Emperours raigne, which now began to draw towards his laſt period, by the working of Agrippina his wife, and by her vpon this occaſion.

Tacit. Annal. 12.8

(22) It chanced, Claudius in his wine, to caſt forth a word of great ſuſpicion, in ſaying: *That it was fatall vnto him firſt to beare the leaudnes of his * wiues; & then to puniſh them.* She knowing her ſelfe guiltie in diſinheriting of Britannicus, who was Claudius his owne ſonne, for the adoption of Nero who was hers, beſides other inſolencies wherewith ſhee might bee taxed, ſought therefore to cleere her owne way by taking him out of the way: and with Locuſta a woman skilfull in poiſoning, and Xenophon a Phyſition, as large of conſcience, conferred for the manner of his death: who in fine, concluded that poiſon was the ſureſt and the leaſt in ſuſpect, or at leaſtwiſe the moſt difficult to be proued againſt her.

Claudius his own words the occaſion of his death. * Meſſalina was his firſt wife, a woman of vnſatiable lechery, who was put to death.

(23) This then reſolued, they temper poiſon in a Muſhrom, whereof he greedily did eate, and ſhortly after ended his life the thirteenth day of October, when he had raigned thirteen yeares, eight moneths, and twenty daies, the yeare of Chriſt his incarnation fiftie ſixe, and of his owne age ſixtie foure. He was of ſtature tall, and of a [illegible] Countenance, full of Maieſty and comely gray haires, his Head continually ſhaking, ſomewhat ſtammering in his ſpeech, very learned, but therewithall very forgetfull, and altogether ruled by his wiues, and domeſticall Seruants, the two ordinary banes of moſt men who are aduanced to any eminent place of gouernment & cõmand.

THis violent and vnexpected death of Claudius, gaue breath and life vnto Neroes further hopes: for whileſt the Conſuls were aſſembled to make ſupplications for their Prince, (not knowing him already dead) Nero ſuddenly ſet open the Palace gates, and accompanied with ſhouts and acclamations, entred the Cohorts that kept the watch, where of them and the reſt of the ſouldiers he was ſaluted Emperour, the Senate as men affrighted with amazement, not once contradicting the ſame.

Nero aſſumeth the Empire.

(2) He was the ſonne of Domitius Nero, and of Iulia Agrippina the daughter of Germanicus brother to Claudius the precedent Emperour, vitious by nature, as ſprung of thoſe parents from whom (as his owne father Domitius ſaid) no goodneſſe could proceede: and the ſame vile diſpoſition was perfected and augmented by his owne affected ſtudy, and purſuit of all poſſible leaudneſſe, as one who could well fit his wanton and laſciuious humours to the vnripeneſſe of his yeeres, being not paſſing ſeuenteene when he aſſumed the Empire. All religion he had in contempt, and all lawes violated, letting looſe the reine to all vnnaturall luſts, and licentiouſneſſe of life.

His parents.

Suetonius in vita Neronis.

(3) For blood and libidinouſneſſe hee was held a moſt vnſatiate fury, and amongſt men a very monſter of nature. His father he poiſoned: vpon his mother he committed both inceſt and murder; vpon males, pollutions againſt nature: deflowred the Veſtals (a matter ſacrilegious & impious) ſlew his brother Germanicus (Britannicus), and his ſiſter Antonia, his wiues, Poppæa and Octauia, his aunt Domitia, his ſonne in law Rufinus, and his renowned Tutor Seneca; With ſuch ſauage ſlaughter of the Romane Nobility, that Tacitus (their beſt Remembrancer) was wearied to record their names, whileſt with a ſeruile patience (as he termeth it) they died honourably.

(4) The City Rome hee ſet on fire, charging the Chriſtians with the fact, and inflicted ſuch torments and death vpon them, that they were pitied of their enemies, and his owne cruelties thereby made more notorious. Whoſe Religion, though Suetonius tearmed new, and a wicked ſuperſtition; and Tacitus (as it were in contempt) nameth the Author thereof to be Chriſt, who in Tiberius raigne (as he with the Euangeliſts agre) was put to death vnder Pontius Pilate Procurator of Iudea, where that religion firſt began; yet by the ſaid authour it is cõfeſſed, that theſe men were innocent of the fact, and their doctrine to burſt forth further into many other parts, inſomuch that Rome it ſelfe did affect the ſame. Yea and in Neroes Court alſo ſome embraced that faith, as by the words of the Apoſtle is manifeſt, who from the Saints in Cæſars houſe ſent ſalutations to the Brethren. Phil. 4. 22.

(5) And laſtly, to fill vp the meaſure of his bloudy cruelty, he crucified Peter vpon the Croſſe, and beheaded Paul with the ſword, two principall Apoſtles of Ieſus Chriſt, and worthy inſtruments of the worlds ſaluation; and forgetting the Maieſty of his eſtate, fell into the ſinke of contempt and all ſinnes, giuing his minde leaue to digeſt all vncleanneſſe, and his bodie ouer to worke any baſe exerciſes, attending nothing beſides is Harpes and Harlots, whereby a careleſſe (but yet a cruell) gouernment was intertained, and the Senate faſhioning themſelues to feed his looſe humors, ſtroue each to outſtrip other in their baſe flatteries.

(6) In this ſtate the Prouinces ſubiections began to ſtand doubtfull, and the greatneſſe of the Empire to ouercharge the foundation; for the Parthians vnder Vologeſes gaue Petus the Roman a great ouerthrow, and that in ſuch wiſe, that thoſe which eſcaped were tearmed the vnfortunate army. And in Britaine their affaires proceeded with no good ſucceſſe; for aged Didius could doe no more then keepe that which he had already gotten: and Verannius his ſucceſſor, only with ſmall inroades aſſailing the Silures, was in his firſt yeere cut off by death, inſomuch that Noro hauing neither wil, motion, nor hope to propagate & enlarge the Empire, minded once to haue with-drawen the Romane forces out of Britaine, had it not beene for very ſhame.

(7) But Paulinus Suetonius attaining the gouernment of that Prouince, in skill for ſeruice, and opinion of people comparable to any, ſought to match his concurrent Corbulo, who with daily victories proſpered in Armenia, himſelfe wanting neither courage nor diſcretion to atchieue the like, only matter and occaſion the Iland affoorded none. Therefore determining an expedition into further parts, he made preparation to inuade the Ile of Mona, now Angleſey, ſeparated from the Continent by the Riuer Menai, and fronted vpon the midſt of Ireland, both ſtrong with inhabitants, and a receptacle of Fugitiues.

(8) Againſt his approch the Ilanders had gathered their powers, which ſtood thicke vpon the ſhoare ready ready armed to make reſiſtance, their women-running among in mourning weedes, their haire looſe, and firebrands in their hands, like furies of hell, together with their Druides (men of religion) who with hands and eies lifted vp towards heauen, cried for vengeance, and powred out curſes as thicke as haile. With the ſtrangeneſſe of which ſight, the Romans ſtood amazed, not offering one ſtroke; ſeeming rather to preſent themſelues for a pray vpon their enemies weapons, then for the Conqueſt of their land or liues: which ſudden and vnexpected diſcouragement, their Captaine ſoone redreſſed, by putting them in remembrance of their wonted valours, which now was farre ouermatchable vnto a fearefull flocke of weake women, or a company of rude and franticke men: wherupon their Enſignes were diſplaid, and the Enemy preſently diſperſed and ſlaine, themſelues becomming maſters both of the field, and whole Ile: which no ſooner was thus obtained, but ſudden newes came to recall their powers, the Prouinces being raiſed to a preſent reuolt.

Romans amazed at ſight of the Britiſh.

(9) For the Britaines in abſence of the Generall, laid open their publique greeuances, growne now both common and intolerable by the oppreſſions of the Romanes, who from the diſeaſes of their Head, had ſucked and diſperſed their corruptions throughout the Prouinces of the Empire: and Catus Decianus the Procurator here in Britaine, renewed the confiſcation of their goods, which Claudius had formerly remitted. The Romane Colonie at Camulodunum, thruſt out the ancient Inhabitants, ſeating themſelues in their poſſeſſions without any other recompence, ſauing reproachfull termes, calling them their drudges, ſlaues and vaſſalls: beſides, the Temple there erected in honour of Claudius, was now become an eie-ſore vnto them, as an Altar of their perpetuall ſubiection, while the Auguſtall Prieſts there attending, waſted all their wealth vnder pretext of Religion. But the very ſpring or head, from whence the cauſe of this ſudden Rebellion iſſued, was the preſent abuſe offered to * Boduo, Queene of the Icenians, late wife to Praſutagus, deceaſed vpon the inſuing occaſion.

(11) Whereupon the Icenians began ſeriouſly to diſcourſe of their preſent miſeries and bondage, made ſubiect not onely to a Lieutenent that ſucked their blood, but likewiſe to a Procurator, that ſought their ſubſtance, while with a ſeruile feare they yeelded to pleaſe the meaneſt Souldier; As though the Heauens had framed them onely for ſeruitude, and the Earth appointed to beare their iniuries vnreuenged, whereas contrariwiſe, they ſaw both heauen & earth flexible to their deliuerance: For (whether by policie or chance) the Image of victory at Camulodunum fell downe reuerſed without any apparant cauſe knowne: the women diſtempered with furie, ranne in the ſtreets, ſinging, and prophecying deſtructions: ſtrange noiſes were heard in the Court, and howlings in the Theater, and ſtrange apparitions and Edifices ſeene in the Riuer Thamiſis: the Ocean it ſelfe betweene Gallia and them ſeemed all bloody, and the prints of dead bodies left in the ſands at the Ebbe. Againe, weighing the preſent eſtate, they ſaw Suetonius abſent, and buſied to enlarge the Confines, the midſt but ſlenderly guarded, and by thoſe who were readier for priuate gaine, then diligent to diſcharge the offices of warre. The examples of other Prouinces alſo whetted the edge of their encouragements: for Germany (they ſaw) had well ſhaken off the yoke of ſubiection: The Parthians had reuolted, and Armenia held play with Corbulo, as famous as Paulinus: Their cauſe was as iuſt, their land as well defenſed, their anceſtors as valiant in reſiſting the firſt Ring-leader Ceſar; and themſelues better experienced of their aduerſaries powers, and their owne abiliments. So now hauing attained the hardeſt point, which was their aſſembled Conſultations (a matter of as great danger to be taken with, as in acting their intendments) in fine this was reſolued, that libertie was to be preferred, though bought with their liues; and bondage to be auoided, if not otherwiſe, then by their deaths.

(12) Theſe their often and noted aſſemblies brought ſuſpitions of ſome deſignements, and the prodigies daily happening, as they were motiues of encouragements vnto the Britaines: So were they ominous ſignes to the Romanes, of either part, framed in their owne imaginations, and conſtrued according to their hoped or feared euents.

(13) The Confederates in this buſineſſe were not to ſeeke their Leader: their Queenes diſhonours ſo apparantly knowne, (and for matter of gouernment they made no difference of Sexe) her birth extracted from their Roiall blood, her hearts affection approued to her Countrie, her indignities receiued of the proud oppreſſors, and her haughtie ſpirit threatning reuenge, aſſured them of her vttermoſt endeuours: which accordingly ſhe effected to her dying day, and to her neuer dying fame.

Queene Boudica choſen Leader.

(14) The Romanes likewiſe prouided themſelues, and in the abſence of Suetonius, craued aide of Catus Dicianus the Procurator, who ſent them not aboue two hundred men, and thoſe but badly armed. Theſe ioining with the reſt made no great power, al of them relying more to the franchiſe of the place, then ſecuring themſelues with Trench or Bulwark. Being giuen ouer to pleaſure, and play, as in the time of a publike peace. Which aduantages by the Enemy were wiſely eſpied, and by Boduo comming on as nobly purſued, when with ſword and fire ſhe waſted all in her way, the Temple onely excepted, whereinto part of the Souldiers were fled, but after two daies ſiege it was battered and taken.

She ſurpriſeth the Romans.

(15) In this heate of furie, the Britaines proceede, and meeting Petilius Cerealis Lieutenant of the ninth Legion, on a haſty March to reſcue that which was already loſt, they encounter his forces, and ſlew all his footemen, himſelfe with his troope of Horſe hardly eſcaping to his Campe, where in great feare he entrenched, not daring to attempt any further matter: At notice of theſe miſhaps, Catus like a tall man, tooke to his heeles, and ſailed into Gallia: by whoſe cruelty and couetouſnes the Britaines were thus inraged to take Armes and reuolt, and their entrance thus fortunately proceeding, gaue heart and hope to further ſucceſſe.

She putteth Petilius Cerealis to flight.

She forceth Catus to flie into Gallia.

(16) For in this heat of blood and furie they ſet vpon, and ſacked the free-towne Verolanium, both ſtrong for garriſon, and rich in Inhabitants: which Citie (as alſo Camulodunum had) felt the rage of their mercileſſe hands, from whence great booties were carried, and no leſſe then ſeuentie thouſand Citizens and Confederates ſlaine. This commotion in Britaine by Suetonius Tranquillius is accounted one of the moſt infortunate loſſes to the Empire, happening vnder Nero, and the more ignominious to the Romanes (as Dion obſerueth) in that it was performed vnder the command of a woman, neither experienced in the feates of warre, nor vſing the victory according to the Law of Armes: for not any priſoner taken, in regard of ranſome was ſaued, nor intercourſe of exchange admitted, but kill, hang, burne, and crucifie, as though the meaſure of their reuenge could neuer be ſufficiently heaped, or the wrath of their Gods ſatisfied with the blood of their Enemies.

(18) The Britaines likewise, inferior neither in number nor courage, triumphed abroad by such troupes and multitudes, as the like had not beene seene, yea and so fierce of courage, and with such assurance of hope, that they brought their wiues to the place to be witnesses of their valours. Bodua in her Chariot doing the parts of a most noble Generall droue from troope to troope to see and commend their forwardnesse; and dismounting attended with her two daughters, and two hundred and thirty thousand resolute Britaines, gat her to a seat made of marish turfes, after the manner of the Romans, apparelled in a loose gowne of changeable colours, wearing a kirtle thereunder very thick pleited, the tresses of her yellow haire hanging downe to the skirts. About her necke shee had a chaine of gold, and in her hand held a light speare, being of personage tall, and of a comely, cheerefull, and modest countenance, and so a while she stood pawsing, in viewing her Armie, and being regarded with a reuerend silence, at length to this effect she spake vnto them.

(22) Suetonius animated with this victorie, gathered his Army, & encamped again; purpoſing to end the reſidue of the warre, if any reſiſters ſhould remaine. And at that preſent were ſent him out of Germanie two thouſand Legionary Souldiers, eight Cohorts of Auxiliaries, & a thouſand Horſe, whereby his ſtrength was augmented, & the ninth Legion which had beene much weakened by the raſhnes of Petilius, fully ſupplied: So that bootleſſe it was for the poore Britaines to make any further reſiſtance, and ſuch as did, or ſtood doubtfully affected, were daily put to the ſword But nothing diſtreſſed them ſo much, as did famine, and want of Corne, being a people in all ages more giuen to warre then Good huſbandry, and rather relying vpon the prouiſions of others, than by the plough to prouide for themſelues; fierce of nature, and ſlowlie lending eare to peace, or their mind to ſuch Arts as either nouriſh, or are nouriſhed by peace.

(23) In theſe ſtirres Iulius Claſſicianus, ſent from Nero to ſucceede Catus in his office of receipts, an enemie, and at variance with Suetonius, the more to cloud his renowne, gaue it forth for certaine, that a new Lieutenant was to be expected, who without either hoſtile rancour, or pride of a Conquerour, would intreat the yeelders with all Clemencie: And likewiſe by letters ſent to Rome, he ſignified that no end of warre was to be expected, ſo long as Suetonius remained Generall; attributing euery aduerſe luck to his intollerable pride, and euery proſperous ſucceſſe onely to the good fortunes of Cæſar and State of Rome. Theſe Great mens diſſenſions awaked Nero, fearing leſt the Britaines, thereby would be more forward to aduantage, with whom experience had ſhewed there was no dallying; and his former loſſes among them being againe recouered; he thought himſelfe diſcharged and quit from all fatall Calamities, as Tranquillus doth affirme. Therefore he ſent Polycletus, one of his freed ſeruitors, with Commiſſion to examine the differences, and to interpoſe his authoritie to worke a reconciliation; at whoſe greatnes it was alſo thought that the Britaines would haue quaked, and come in vnder feete. Which thing fell out otherwiſe: for howſoeuer the Captaine and Souldiers regarded him for his place, vnto whom he ſhewed himſelfe both arrogant & terrible, yet the Britaines made him but their laughing ſtocke, as being themſelues borne free, and knew not what the power of freed-men was; much admired that ſuch Commanders and Armies which had atchieued ſo great exploites, could be brought to obay, and yeeld account of their actions to ſo baſe a bond-ſlaue, as they termed him.

Liberti or Freemen, were ſuch, as being firſt bond ſlaues, by their ſeruice obtained freedome, and many of them about the Emperour came to be of great ſway.

Suetonius deliuereth vp his charge.

Petronius his diſpoſition.

(24) But Suetonius growne great by his fortunes in theſe warres, and as it ſhould ſeeme both ſuſpected and feared of Nero, was by him commanded (the warres yet continuing) to deliuer vp his Army to Petronius Turpilianus, who had lately giuen ouer his Conſulſhip in Rome, a man of a ſofter, and more intreatable condition; and as a ſtranger to the faults before committed was the readier to forgiue; and hauing compoſed the former troubles, dares not any further, neither egging nor prouoking the Enemie, but gaue himſelfe to a quiet, or rather idle life, which he thought might paſſe vnder the title of an honourable peace. In which eſtate hee gaue vp his charge to Trebellius Maximus, and was after ſlaine by Galba, nothing obiected againſt him, but his faithfulneſſe to Nero, in that he would not betray him, as the reſt had done. For Nero now growne odious to God and Man, Conſpiracies were continually attempted, though not in act effected, vntill that Iulius Vindex Lieutenant of Gallia oppoſed his proceeding, being the firſt ſtirrer, and rowling ſtone that (as Tacitus tearmes it) tumbled Nero out of his Seate.

Petronius Turpilianus giueth vp his charge to Trebell. Max.

Petronius Turpilianus ſlaine, becauſe true to Nero.

Iulius Vindex oppoſeth Nero. Tacit. hiſtor. in vit. Nero.

(25) For hauing proclaimed Galba Emperour, an old and weake man, at that time Gouernor of Arragon; neither priuie to the conſpiracie, nor aſſenting to the title, he ſet vp daily many bitter and biting Edicts againſt Nero, wherby he was rowſed from his laſciuious reſt, and began to feare the fatall end, whereunto his impious life and bloody reigne had now laſtly brought him; who deſtitute of all power of reſiſtance, did now ſet his whole hope and refuge, vpon that meanes, to which the cõpaſſe of his time had euer pointed; for relying onely vpon his skill in Muſique, he intended his flight into Ægypt, there to teach the inſtructions of that Art: into ſuch ſudden baſenes was his minde deiected, that formerly had laſhed out beyond all meaſure in luxurie, pride, and prodigalitie. Vnto this conſpiracie ioined Virginius Rufus Lieutenant of high Germanie, with Nymphidius, Sabinus, and Sophonius Tigellinus, Captaine of the Guard, who after Vindex his death, (which happened vpon an accident euen in his entrance to Armes) maintained the election of Galba: and the Senate as forward to Neroes deſtruction, proclaimed him Enemie to the State, and pronounced his puniſhment more maiorum, ſending out each way to apprehend him aliue.

Proclaimeth Galba Emperour.

Nero ſeeketh to fly into Egypt.

The Senate ſend to apprehend him.

(26) In this feare Nero attended with foure ſeruants onely, had hid himſelfe in a Country Cottage, not paſſing foure miles from Rome; whence hearing his decreed iudgement, and demanding what was meant by that ſentence, it was anſwered, that his necke ſhould be locked in the forke of a tree, and his bodie all naked, whipped to death; whereupon lamenting that ſo good a Miniſtrell ſhould be made away, he ran himſelfe through on his ſword, and ſo rid the world of a Monſter.

Nero hideth himſelfe.

He killeth himſelfe.

(27) Of ſtature he was indifferent, his body full of freckles, his haire ſomewhat yellow, his countenance rather faire then louely, his eies gray and dimme, his necke fatte, his bellie bearing out, and his legges ſlender and ſmall; A moſt skilfull Muſitian he was, and in that Art ſought to excell others, and to equalize Apollo himſelfe, as alſo in his Chariot-riding to imitate the ſwiftnes of the Sunne. So prodigall in apparell, that he neuer wore one Garment twice, & ſo ſumptuous in buildings, as is incredible. He raigned thirteen yeares and eight daies, and died the eight of Iune, in the one and thirtieth of his age, and after the birth of our Sauiour Chriſt the threeſcore and tenth: as Euſebius doth account.

CHAPTER VIII.

Nero the last of the Cæsars.

WIth the death of this Tyrant, ended the progeny of the Cæsars, and the Emperours succeeding were afterwards elected, either for the opinion of their owne worths, or els, (and that oftner) by the faction and voice of the Souldiers, whose violence the Senate euer feared to contradict, and whose Colonies in euery Prouince sought to raise their owne Generall to that high estate. In which time of Combustion, though litle be recorded of the British affaires, yet because the Monarchy of this Iland was then and long after inuested in the Imperiall dignitie, we may not omit to speake somewhat of the ensuing Emperours, as the chiefe Gouernours of this Kingdome. Vpon Neroes declining, diuers there were (as Vindex and Virginius, Nymphidius and Sophonius) set vp against him, but Galba for his reputed integritie got the Garland from them all: who little dreaming of the Imperiall Diademe, fortune set it vpon his head before his hand had toucht the same: for Vindex in Gallia hauing proclamed him Emperour, and himselfe in Arragon not free from Neroes hatred, hee sought rather to hazard his life with the glory of a Crowne, then depend vpon his mercy, who had sent secretly the sentence of his death. And therefore mounting the Tribunall, the more to impresse a fresh remembrance of former cruelties, he placed before his throne, the Images of certaine Nobles executed by Nero, with some personages sent for out of exile, whose presence might prouoke a deeper edge of hatred; and his Army about him ready for mutation, these, or the like words he spake.

Suet. in vit. Galb. Sect. 2.

The manner of chooſing the ſucceding Emperours.

Galba got the Empire ere hee looked for it.

Galba his policy to make Nero odious.

His Oration to his ſouldiers.

" (2) My fellow Souldiers and friends, wee at this " time are assembled, to bestow that vpon others, " which wee our selues haue smally enioied, I meane, " liberty from bondage, and freedome from feares of " a Tyrant. The life that I haue hitherto ledde, will " sufficiently discharge me from any aspiring con- " ceit, and my owne Conscience doth witnesse that " I speake not vpon malice or priuate respects: It " greeueth me to say, but it bootes not to hide, that, " which euery man seeth. Hath euer Bond-man vn- " der a cruell master passed a yeere of harder seruice, " then we haue done fourteene vnder Nero? what " kind of exaction hath he not proued, to supply with " extortion, that which with shame hee hath spent? " what kinde of crueltie hath he not practised? If we " would conceale or seeke to suppresse it, these dumb " stones would declare them: For behold, he poi- " soned his Father and brother, abused and slew his " owne mother, murdered his wife, his Tutor, and " what els so euer valiant or vertuous in Senate, in Ci- " tie, in Prouince, without any difference of Sexe or " Age. I neede not to speake of the sorrowfull sighes, " and bitter teares of so many yong gentlemen bereft " of their fathers, so many wiues robbed of their hus- " bands, so many great men depriued of their Coun- " try, all which cry vengeance vpon such a Prince: A " Prince? nay an Incendiary, a Singer, a Fidler, a " Stage-plaier, a Cart-driuer, a Cryer; no Prince, nay " no man; that hath a man to his husband, and a man " to his wife, but a monster of mankinde: And in trueth " a subiect, vpon whom, vice hath made her full ex- " perience, and raised her triumphs from the base of " Cæsars throne. Against whom, what Vindex in France " hath already intended, I am sure you doe know, " and I, for my part, am most sorry to heare. The " whole course of my former life hath been hitherto " remoued from Ambition in Court, or from aiming " too high abroad, and this little that remaines of " my daies, I could hartily wish were to be spent in " more ease: But sith I know not by what my mis- " fortune, some haue imposed vpon me a Part which " I neuer meant to sustaine, and least of all at this age, " I will not refuse, if you will also approue it, to sa- " crifice this old Carcase of mine for the wealth of " my Country, not as Emperour or Augustus (which " sacred names I adore afarre off, not daring to " approch them) but as ——— And no fur- ther heard, was with great acclamations saluted Emperour.

Nero described.

Nero solemnely maried one of his youths called Doriphorus, and kept him as his wife: so likewise did he with Sporus, whom he endeauoured to transforme into a woman.

(3) But such is the height of glory, which is raised by the blasts of the multitude, that it fals againe as the bubble burst in the swelling, which leaues neither circle nor signe of his former pride. And so is the state of Galba with one breath applauded, and placed vpon the Imperiall Throne; and that scarce cold, ere they dislike of their owne hasty election: for newes being brought that the State stood firme for Nero, and for certaine that Vindex was slaine, euen in his first enterprise of reuolt; that Virginius was sided by his Germane Legions, and his name inscribed in their banners; and that Nymphidius was the man whose deserts could not be sufficiently honoured with lesse recompence then the princely Diademe: These distractions so much ouer-swaied his aged and passionate heart, that he retired to Clunia in great deiection, repenting himselfe of that which hee had done, and wished againe his priuate estate.

Glory like a Bubble.

(4) But the death of Nero commonly diuulged, and Virginius his refusals of the Imperiall Title, gaue strength and life to his former election, now further ratified by the full resolutions of the Armie: who the more to seeme both strong and valorous, though in deed a weake, sickly, and silly old man, Souldier-like in his coat of Armes shewed himselfe, and in that array passed the vast mountaines for Rome. With whose entrance, entred the dislike of his person, as one vnfit to support the state of others, that by age and imbecillity was not able to sustaine his owne; aud the imperfections of his gouernment caried euery waye farre vnder expectation, dayly added their further dislikes; which assaying himselfe to redresse, he soone shooke the foundation of his owne fabricke: for in a blunt & ſhort oration by him made vnto the Senate and ſouldiers, he declared Piſo Licinianus his Caſar: ioining him in preſent power with himſelfe, and after his deceaſe, his ſucceſſor in the Empire.

Tacit hiſt. 1. * Siluius. Saluius Otho conſpireth Galbaes death.

(5) Whereat howſoeuer others ſtood affected, yet Marcus * Saluius Otho (one, who for cõmerce in leaudnes was very deare to Nero, & whoſe hope depended vpon the common diſturbance, for that his exceſſe in riot had now brought him to the brinke of beggery) much enuied the rat; the rather becauſe himſelfe had entertained a hope that Galba would haue adopted him; but therein deceiued, as his concurrent ſet his own aſpiring mind for the Crown. And euen now this time beſt fitted his attempts, being the wane of Galbaes authority, and before the full of Piſoes power; his Aſtrologers & ſtarre-gazers forwarding him with their vaine predictions; a kinde of people euer to Princes vnfaihtfull, to hopers deceithfull, and in a commonwealth alwaies forbidden, yet alwaies retained. And Otho preuailing with the Pretorian ſouldiers, by great gifts, and faire promiſes, practiſed, and wrought (within eight daies following) Galbaes death: which his treaſon he ſo cunningly carried, that ſtill he accompanied the Emperour with great obſeruances, as his priuate, and eſpeciall friend: But the conſpiracy ripened ready for the blanche, Otho ſtole ſecretly from the Palace, vnto the Pretorian Cohorts, purpoſely ſo appointed: where no ſooner come and ſeen, but they ſaluted him Emperour, and vpon their ſhoulders bare him towards their Campe.

Aſtrologers and Starre-gazers.

The rumor ariſing of this ſuddain reuolt, ſore affrighted Galba, then ready to do ſacrifice vnto his gods, & ſo diſtracted his followers, that there were as many aduices, as there were men, and meſſengers poſting from Campe vnto Court, brought as diuerſe relations, as their owne ſuſpitions conceiued: in which diſtraction, the weake and wauering old man was ſo wrapped, that beſides throngings from place to place, nothing was effected, till laſtly abandoned by his owne followers, a troupe of horſe men ſent from the Campe, tumultuouſly ſlew him, and preſented his head vpon the point of a lance, to Otho. With him died Piſo his elected Caſar, whom Sulpitius Florus one of the Britiſh Cohorts ſlew, and Titus Iunius a Conſull, with others that had bene deere vnto Galba whilſt he was Emperour.

His deſcription.

(6) He was of a good ſtature; his head bald, his eies gray, and his noſe hooked, his hands and feet crooked by reaſon of the gout, and a bunch of fleſh or wen vpon his right ſide. A great feeder and Sodomite hee was, ſeuere in iuſtice, and ouer-ruled by his ſeruants. Hee died aged ſeuenty three yeeres, hauing out-liued fiue Princes. In proſperity happier vnder the Empire of others, then in his owne; for hee ſate only ſeuen moneths, and them with ſmall content. In his flouriſhing age with great renowne he had ſerued in Germany: Africke he ruled as Proconſul, and the neerer Spaine vprightly and well; ſeeming more then a priuate man whileſt he was priuate, and held capable of the Empire, had he neuer beene Emperour.

THE FIRST PLANTING OF RELIGION IN BRITAINE.

Chapter IX.

Britaine in quiet repoſe. Tacit.hiſt.1. ca.3.

THis ſhort time of Galbaes gouernement, with the conſpiracies againſt his Predeceſſour, admitteth ſmall remembrances of our Britiſh affaires: which Prouince (ſaith Tacitus) among all other ſtirres againſt both Nero and Galba, held amity, and ſtood in quiet; whether it was the farre diſtance of place, ſeuered by Sea from the ſeditions of the Reuolters; or that by continuall ſeruice againſt the Enemie the malice of their humours were ſpent, it is vncertaine. Therefore a while to digreſſe from the Succeſſion of our Britiſh Monarkes, and to fill vp the emptineſſe of thoſe Times with matters incident to our ſelues, let it not ſeeme either tedious or ſuperfluous, to ſpeake of the planting of his Kingdome in this Iland, whoſe Rule in ſhort time extended to the Ends of the Earth; and whoſe Ambaſſadours (as ſome haue written) about the midſt of Neroes Reigne, and in the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation ſixty three, approched for the Inhabitants ſaluation, Aruiragus then ſwaying the Scepter of this Kingdome.

Chriſtianity ſuppoſed to bee brought into Britaine in Neroes time. Ex Antiq. Manuſcript. Freculphus Lexouienſis, Tom 2. lib.2.cap.4. William of Malmesbury. Bale Centur. lib.1. Harding ſaith fourteene, cap.47

(2) At which time (ſay they) were ſent certaine Diſciples out of France into Britaine by Philip the Apoſtle, whereof Ioſeph of Arimathea, that buried the body of Chriſt, was chiefe; who firſt laid the foundation of our faith in the Weſt parts of this Iland, at the place then called Aualon, (afterwards Inis Witrin, now Glaſtenburie) where he with twelue Diſciples his Aſſiſtants preached the Goſpell of life vnto the Ilanders, and there left their bodies to remaine for a ioifull Reſurrection. This doth Gildas affirme, and Malmesburie in his Booke of the Antiquity of Glaſtenburie written to Henry de Bloys, brother to King Stephen, and Abbat of the ſame place, reports, and is conſented vnto (for the matter, though all agree not touching the time) by the learned Antiquaries of later times, grounded on the Teſtimonies of the beſt approued ancient writers: who account the moſt happy influence of Chriſtianitie, to haue beene by thoſe glorious conduits conuaied into the remote parts of the world: that ſo (according to the promiſe of God by Eſaiah) The Iles afarre off which had not heard of his fame, ſhould be conuerted, and haue his glorie to them declared among the Gentiles.

Baronius in hiſtor Eccleſ. Mary Magdalen, Lazarus, and Martha in England.

(4) To theſe firſt Planters and Sowers of this heauenly Seed, Cæſar Baronius, that voluminous Hiſtorian, ioineth Mary Magdalen, Lazarus, and Martha, who (by his relation) being baniſhed Ieruſalem, in a maſterleſſe ſhip without tackling arriued in Gallia, and with them Ioſeph of Arimathea, who afterward landed in Britaine (vt tradunt, as he ſaith, out of an old Manuſcript which he ſaw in the Vatican Library:) yea and with them alſo Eurgain the ſiſter of Ioſeph, who afterwards married a Britaine named Siarklots, if the authoritie whereon George Owen-Harry doth ground that report, be of any credit.

Eurgain the ſiſter of Ioſeph maried Siarklots a Britain Georg. owen in his Pettigrees.

(5) But yet there are others, who vpon a very good ground, from the words of Gildas (the moſt ancient of our Britiſh Hiſtorians) will haue the Sunne of the Goſpell long before to haue riſen in this our Weſt; and this Iland of Britaine to haue enioied the very morning of his Aſcent, the brightneſſe thereof piercing thorow the miſtie clouds of errour, ſhined heere in Britaine euen in the daies of Tiberius, towards whoſe end Chriſt ſuffered his death. Which aſſertion the ſaid Gildas doth not deliuer coldly or doubtingly, but with great confidence, & relying vpon good grounds, as it appeareth when he ſaith, Scimus, &c. wee know for certainty, that this was in the latter time of Tiberius. Which was immediately after our bleſſed Sauiours Paſſion.

Gildas de Conqueſt. Brit.

To which vncontroleable teſtimonie ſome others haue added (though not perhaps on ſo vndoubted warrant) that S. Peter the Apoſtle preached the word of life in this Iland, as to other Gentiles he did, for whom God had choſen him, that from his mouth they might heare the Goſpell and beleeue, (as himſelfe alledgeth) and that hee heere founded Churches and ordained Prieſts and Deacons, which is reported by Simon Metaphraſtes out of the Greeke Antiquities, and Guilielmus Eiſingrenius in the firſt of his Centurie, who ſaith that Peter was here in Neroes time; whereas Baronius thinketh it was in the reigne of Claudius, when the Iewes were baniſhed Rome, and that therefore Paul in his Epiſtle to the Romans mentioneth him not. Indeed Baronius and ſome others plead very hotly for S. Peters preaching heere; but I ſee not well how it can ſtand either with Euſebius his account, which keeps him ſo long at Rome after he was Biſhop there, or with Onuphrius, who denieth that he went weſt-ward (being expulſed by Claudius) but to Ieruſalem, and thence to Antioch, where he liued till the death of Claudius: whence it muſt follow, that if Peter were heere at all, it was before euer he went to Rome, and that the Goſpell was preached heere before it was in Rome, if Peter were the firſt (as ſome hold) that preached there: both which may be the more probable, if we conſider the huge multitudes of Chriſtians (fifteene thouſand, ſaith Baronius) which diſperſed themſelues into all parts of the world vpon the martyring of S. Steuen at Ieruſalem, (which was preſently vpon the death of Chriſt) and that Ioſeph of Arimathea was one of that number, Baronius doth confeſſe. I am heere contented to ſtep ouer that Monkiſh tale reported by Aluredus Riuallenſis (the writer of King Edward the Confeſſors life) that a holy man (forſooth) ſtudious and carefull for a Gouernour to ſucceed, was in his ſleepe told by S. Peter, that the kingdome of England was his, wherein himſelfe had firſt preached, and would alſo prouide him Succeſſors. For ſeeing it was a dreame, for a dreame we leaue it; and Peter among the other Elders to attend his Throne, that now ſitteth in glorious Maieſtie, and who in this life minded no ſuch earthly preheminence, no not to diuide betwixt brethren, though the Kingdome and rule of all things was his alone.

(6) Certes Peter was principally the Apoſtle of the Circumciſion, and therefore more likely to haue ſpent his endeuours on them: but for Paule (the Doctor of the Gentiles) his arriuall heere may ſeeme more warrantable, who doubtleſſe (after his firſt releaſement from Rome) confirmed the doctrine of Chriſt to theſe weſterne parts of the world, and among them, as may appeare, to this Iland of Britaine, as both Sophronius Patriarke of Ieruſalem, and Theodoret an ancient Doctor of the Church, doe affirme and approue, ſaying that Fiſhers, Publicans, and the Tent-Maker (meaning S. Paul) which brought the Euangelicall light vnto all Nations, reuealed the ſame vnto the Britaines. That Paul came into Illyricum, Gallia, and Spaine, and filled all thoſe parts with his doctrine, both Euſebius, Dorotheus, and Epiphanius doe teſtifie: and of this generall Ambaſſage the Apoſtle himſelfe ſaith, that the ſound of the Goſpell went thorow the earth, and was heard vnto the ends of the world: which his ſayings cannot more fitly bee applied to any other Nation then vnto vs of Britaine, whoſe land by the Almightie is ſo placed in the terreſtriall globe, that thereby it is termed of the ancient, The Ends of the Earth, and deemed to be ſituated in another world; for ſo in an Oration that Agrippa made to the Iewes, and Agricola to his Romans, it is called: which made Solinus write that the coaſt of France had beene the End of the earth, had it not beene for Britaine, which was as another world. And in Dion we reade, that the old Souldiers of Gallia whom Claudius commanded for Britaine, complained that they muſt bee inforced to make warre out of the world. (7) Thus for Paul: well knowne in Rome by his long impriſonments, and (at that time) in reuerend regard for his doctrine with many there: among whom alſo there were ſome Britaines that embraced the faith, whereof Claudia Ruſina (remembred by Martial another Poet) was one, whom he thus extols:

Martial. lib. 2 Epig. 54.

Claudia cæruleis cùm ſit Ruſina Britannis
Edita, cur Latia pectora plebis habet?
Quale decus formæ? Romanam credere matres
Italides poſſunt, Atthides eſſe ſuam.

How hath dame Claudia, borne of Britains blew,
Won fame for wiſdome with our ſages graue?
Her comely forme and learning, as their due
Rome claimes for hers, and hers would Athens haue.

Matth. Park Archb in Antiq. Eccl. Britan. Bale, &c.

This Claudia is by the learned commended to haue beene moſt skilfull in the Greeke and Latine tongues; of whom heare them (not me) ſpeake. At the commandement of the Tyrant Nero (ſay they from Tacitus) many Noble Britains were brought to Rome, who there remaining their Confederates, they held it an honour to haue their children named after the Nobilitie of the Romans: and from Claudius Ceſar was this Ladie Claudia named, who according to her worth was matched in marriage to Rufus a gentleman of Rome, then a Coronell, after a Senator, a man of a milde diſpoſition, naturally modeſt, a great Philoſopher in the Sect of the Stoickes, for his ſweetneſſe of behauiour called Pudens, who by his graue perſwaſions cauſed Martial (the wittie but wanton Poet) to reforme many things in his writings; and by him is cõmended for his humanitie, pietie, learning, and eloquence: as alſo his wife Claudia the Britaine, for her beautie, faith, fruitfulneſſe, learning, and languages. In proofe whereof, Bale hath mentioned three ſeuerall Treatiſes, beſides others by her compiled both in the Greeke and Latine tongues. Dorotheus nameth Pudens to be one of the ſeuentie two, and Volaterranus affirmeth them both Paules diſciples, from whom he ſendeth greeting to Timotheus in theſe words: Eubulus and and Pudens, and Linus, and Claudia, and all the brethren ſalute thee. But ſome may obiect, that Martials Claudia could not be that Ladie, who liuing in Neroes time gaue hoſpitalitie vnto Peter and Paul at their being in Rome; for that ſhe could not retaine ſuch beauty and perfection as the Poet to her doth aſcribe in the reigne of Domitian, the ſeuenth in ſucceſſion from Nero, the time being too long (ſaith Ado, Biſhop of Treuers, Vſuardus and others) for beauty to be ſo freſhly preſerued. But howſoeuer theſe account her age then to be ſixty, yet if we reckon according to Euſebius, we ſhal ſee that he ſets the laſt of Claudius in the yeare of grace fiftie ſixe, and the firſt of Domitian in eightie three, betwixt which, are but twenty ſeauen yeares; and yet Paul came not to Rome till the tenth of Nero, and in his thirteenth yeare, from the priſon wrote his Epiſtle to Timothy, as the ſame Euſebius declareth: ſo that from hence vnto Domitian, is left but fourteene yeeres, a time no whit vnpoſſible to retaine Beautie, though twenty yeares and many moe of her age had beene formerly ſpent; ſeeing that in thoſe times Plutarch praiſeth Alcibiades to be paſſingly faire when he was threeſcore yeares of age.

The ſame Claudia that Paul and Martial ſpeaketh

Euſeb. Eccle. hiſt. lib. 2. cap. 22.

Alcibiades his beautie in old age.

This Claudia then with Pauls ſpirituall Manna, is ſaid to ſend likewiſe the choiſeſt and chaſteſt of the Poeſies of Martial for new-yeares gifts vnto her friends in Britaine, both for to feed their Soules with the bread of life, and to inſtruct their mindes with leſſons beſt fitting vnto ciuill behauiour; which thing moued the Poet himſelfe with no ſmall ſelfe-glory in his verſe thus to write:

Claudia ſedns both Paules and Martialls writings into Britaine.

Dicitur & noſtros cantare Britannia verſus.
And Britaine now (they ſay) our verſes learns to ſing.

Martial. lib. 7. Epig. 10.

(8) It hath alſo paſſed with allowance among the learned Senate of our Antiquaries, that when Claudius and Nero began to baniſh and perſecute the Chriſtians in Rome, (whoſe ſuperſtitions, as Tacitus pleaſeth to tearme them, from Iudea had infected the Citie it ſelfe) many Romans and Britaines being conuerted to the Faith, fled thence vnto theſe remote parts of the earth, where they might and did more freely enioy the liberty of their Profeſſions, vntill the ſearch of Tyrants by the flame-light of Perſecutions, had found out all ſecret places for the ſafeties and aſſemblies of Gods Saints: as after in the daies of Diocleſian we ſhall finde: And from this Sanctuarie of Saluation the ſad lamenting Lady * Pomponia Gracina, the wife of Aulus Plautius (the firſt Lord Lieutenant of Britaine) brought that Religion, whereof ſhe was accuſed and ſtood indited vpon life and death, which was none other, then the Chriſtian Profeſſion, ſeeing the ſame both by Tacitus and Sueitonius, is euerie where termed the ſtrange ſuperſtitions and new kinde of Sect that the Chriſtians imbraced, and for which they were accounted vnworthy to liue.

(9) And much about theſe time (as Beatus Rhenanus in his Hiſtory of Germanie, Pantaleon and others doe report) one Suetonius a Noble mans ſonne in Britaine conuerted to the Faith by the firſt Planters of the Goſpell in this Iland, and after his Baptiſme called Beatus, was ſent by the Brethren from hence vnto Rome, to be better inſtructed, and further directed by Saint Peter himſelfe; and returning thorow Switzerland, found ſuch willingneſſe and flocking of the people to heare and receiue the Doctrine of Chriſt, that he there ſtaied and built an Oratorie not farre from the lake Thun, and neare the Towne called Vnderſewen, where in preaching and praiers he imploied his time to the day of his death, which happened in the yeare of grace 110.

B. Rhenan. in his Hiſt. of Germany. Pantaleon.

And that there were Chriſtians in Britain at theſe times I make no queſtiō, thogh ſome exceptions may be taken againſt the Monk of Burton the reporter therof, who ſaith in the 141 yeare; and raigne of Hadrian, nine maſters of Grantceſter were baptized themſelues, & preached to others the Goſpell in Britain; howſoeuer he faileth in the Emperours name, which yeare was the ſecond of Antonimus Pius his ſucceſſor, and aſcribeth to theſe men Schoole-degrees, altogether vnknowne for nine hundred yeares after, yet theſe do not hinder the truth of the thing, though that Monke was none of the beſt Hiſtorians. It is reported alſo that Patrick the Iriſh Apoſtle, and Canonized Saint, long before the Raigne of King Ethelbert preached the Goſpell in many places of Wales: As alſo that Ninianus Bernicius of the race of the Britiſh Princes conuerted the Picts to the Religion of Chriſt. Vnto theſe aforeſaid authorities and teſtimonies howſoeuer we ſtand affected: yet it is certaine by Chemnitius citing Sabellicus, that the Britaines were with the firſt Conuerts: And Tertullian who liued within two hundred yeares of Chriſts Natiuitie, ſheweth no leſſe: Who the more to prouoke the Iewes againſt whom he wrote, calleth to witneſſe the fruitfull increaſe of the Goſpell of ſaluation, through many Countries and Nations, and among them nameth the Britaines to haue receiued the Word of life, the power whereof (ſaith he) hath pierced into thoſe parts whither the Romanes could not come. Whence Petrus Cluniacenſis ſuppoſeth the Scottiſh men the more ancient Chriſtians, as not being in the like ſubiection to the Romans, as other then were.

(10) Origen, who flouriſhed not much aboue two hundred yeares after Chriſt, in his Homilies vpon Ezechiel ſheweth, that the firſt fruits of Gods harueſt was gathered in the Iland of Britaine: who conſented to the Chriſtian faith by the doctrine of their Druides: that taught one onely God: with whom Hector Boetius agreeth, ſaying, that ſome of theſe Druides condemned the worſhip of God in Images, and allowed not the applicatiō of the Godhead vnto any viſible forme: which might be the cauſe why Claudius the Emperour forbad their Religion, as ſauouring in theſe things too much of Chriſtianitie; whom likewiſe he baniſhed Rome, as ſome from Suetonius coniecture. Of theſe Druides we ſhewed before, that their offices were moſt imploied about holy things, and that their doctrine chiefly conſiſted in teaching the immortalitie of the ſoule, the motions of the heauens, the nature of things, and the power of the Gods: yea and Poſtellus from others will inforce, that they prophecied likewiſe of a Virgins conception. Theſe were the helps, ſaith Tertullian, that cauſed the Britaines ſo ſoone to imbrace the Doctrine of Chriſt, and thereupon immediatly after his death doth Gyldas faſten our conuerſion, where he writeth,

(12) To which effect also the sayings of S. Iohn Chrysostome, Bishop of Constantinople do enforce, who shewing the increase of Christianity, and the successe of the Gospell preached, sheweth the power thereof to haue extended, not only to the Countries farre iacent in the continent, but also to the Ilands situated in the Ocean it selfe, amongst them expresly nameth this our Britaine; whose Inhabitants (saith hee) haue also consented to the word which is planted in euery heart, in honour whereof they haue erected their Temples and Altars. And againe: Those Britaines (saith hee which had formerly fed vpon humane flesh, making no difference betwixt the blood of man and beasts, now through the power of the word by them embraced, haue learned the law of true pietie, and giue themselues to a religious abstinence, and holy fasts. Of which Barbarisme S. Ierome also complained, that some of those Nations vsed to eat the buttocks of boies, and Paps of Virgins, which in their Feasts were serued for the daintiest dishes. But elsewhere speaking of the Britaines conuersion, he saith, that they had turned themselues from their westerne Paganisme, and now had directed their faces towards Ierusalem in the East, whose beautie shined in the word of God.

Psal. 2. 8.

(13) And thus wee see by the planting of the Gospell in this Iland, the saying of the Psalmist accomplished, that God would giue his sonne Christ the Heathen for his inheritance, and the Ends of the Earth (the proper attribute of this our Britaine) to be his possession. And the successe in Historie most apparently sheweth these parts (by an especiall prerogatiue) to bee Christs Kingdome. For albeit that Ierusalem and Antioch may rightly claime the precedencie of all other places, the one being as it were the chamber where Christians were first borne, and the other the font where they were first Christened with that most sacred name: yet Britaine in some other graces hath outstript them all, hauing the glory to be graced with the first Christian King that euer raigned in the world, which was our renowned Lucius, the first fruits of all the Kings that euer laid their Crownes at the foot of our Sauiours Crosse: as also for producing the first Christian Emperour that by publike authority established the Gospell thorow the world, which was Constantine the Great, borne and brought vp heere in Britaine by Queene Helena, a most vertuous and religious British Lady: vnto whose daies the succession of Christianity did heere continue, as by the martyrdomes of many Saints vnder Diocletian is apparant. Herein also raigned the King that first vncrowned the head of the vsurping Roman Beast, and freed the land from his deuouring Locusts: putting downe Idolatrie with Hezekiah that brake the brasen Serpent: and with Isaack new digged the Wels that those Philistines had stopped. And lastly hath this Iland produced that most royall and Christian Monarke, whose learned pen hath first depainted Antichrist, and pierced the heart of all Papall supremacie, as the sword of Gedeon did Zalmunna (* the Image of trouble) King of Madian. And as a Lion hath he met that crooked[a] Serpent in the way of his vsurped authority; whereby in short time vndoubtedly the [b] Kall of his heart will be broken, if other Potentates likewise by his most godly example, cast off the yoke of vassallage, and in their seuerall Dominions gouerne (as free Princes ought) the people that God hath committed to their charge. So that in those and many other the like Princes of this happy Iland, most properly is performed that prophetical promise made vnto the Church of Christ: that Kings should become her nursing Fathers, and Queenes should be her nursing Mothers: Of both which may be truly said to Britaine, in imitation of that of Salomon; Many kingdomes haue done gloriously, but thou hast surmounted them all.

Pro. 31, 29.

(14) And of such power hath Christ beene in these His Possessions, that euen the Hostile Kings and Conquerours thereof, were they neuer so sauage and Idolatrous at their first entrance, yet when they here had seated for a time, they became milde and religious, and gladly submitted their hearts to the Religion of those, whose necks themselues held vnder the yoke of subiection.

Britaine conuerted her Conquerors to the faith of Christ.

(15) Such were the Romans in this Iland, whose Deputies at the day-spring almost of Christianitie were conuerted; as Trebellius, Pertinax, and others, which submitted themselues to that profession, and were motiues to King Lucius more publikely to maintaine the same: as also Constantius the father of Great Constantine, that here in Britaine permitted the profession of the Gospell, with the erections of Churches for the true seruice of God, and prohibited the superstitious worships of the Gentiles.

Hollinsh. li. 4. c. 9.

(16) The Saxons after them (in time, but not in Idolatrie) had neuer tasted the liuing waters of Siloh, till they were here seated in Christs Possession, where the y changed their affections as farre from their wonted manners; as did the Messengers to Iehu, which turned after his Chariot to destroy the Altars of Baal: or as Saul and his seruants, who no sooner had entred Naioth in Ramah, but that their spirits were ioined to the Prophets, and the heat of their furie, with their garments, cast downe at Samuels feet.

2. King. 9. 18.

1. Sam. 19. 20.

(17) The Danes likewise, their Conquerours, and Successors in this Royall Throne, euer vntill then were both bloudy and barbarous, and therefore of all our Writers commonly called the Pagan Danes, whose many desolations and ruines remaine as records of their cruelties in many places euen vnto this day: yet being a while in this Land, King Guthurn, with thirtie of his chiefe Princes and people were drawn by the valour & vertue of King Alured to receiue the Christian Faith, by whose bounty thereupon they enioied the possession of a faire portion of this Kingdome. And afterward Canutus, their greatest King, no sooner almost had this Imperiall Diademe set vpon his head, but that he held it his chiefe Maiestie to be the vassall of Christ, confessing him only to be King of Kings: and with such religious deuotion as then was taught, crowned the Crucifix at Winchester with the Crowne he wore: and neuer after thorow all his raigne, by any meanes would weare the same: and the Danes his Souldiers remaining in England, began by litle and litle to embrace Christianity, and in short time were all conuerted to the Faith. Thus then we see the happy increase of these holy seeds springing from the furrowes of this blessed ground: and the Tents of Sem to be spread vpon the Mountaines of Britaine, wherein God (according to his promise) perswaded vs who are of Iapheth, to dwell.

(18) As hitherto we haue searched the first foundation of our Faith, so neither want we testimonies concerning the continuance of the same in this Land vnto following Posterities; although the iniurie of Time and Warre haue consumed many Records. For the Britaines that were daily strengthned in their receiued faith, by the Doctrine of many learned and godly men, left not their first loue with the Church of Ephesus, but rather tooke hold of their skirts, as the Prophet speaketh, vntill the tortures of Martyrdome cut them off by death. And those Fathers euen from the Disciples themselues, held a succession in Doctrine (notwithstanding some repugnancie was made by the Pagans,) and preached the Gospell with good successe, euen till the same at length went forth with a bolder countenance, by the fauourable Edicts of Adrian, Antoninus Pius, and Marcus Aurelius Emperors of Rome (as Eusebius hath noted:) and in Britaine was established by the authoritie of Lucius their King: whereby this was the first of all the Prouinces (saith Marcus Sabellicus) that receiued the Faith by publike ordinance: Of the teachers of those times Bale -from 19 For, all this time (saith the said Dicetus) Christian Religiō flourished quietly in Britanny, till in Diocletians time, their Churches were demolished, their holy Bibles cast into Bone-fires, & the Priests with their faithfull flocke bloodily murdered. In which number, about the yeare two hundred ninety three, as we reade (in Beda, Malmesbury, Randulphus, and others) Albane with his teacher Amphibalus were both of thē martyred for the profession of the Gospell at the old Towne Verolanium: as also in Leicester, those two Noble Citizens, Aaron, and Iulius, with multitudes both of men and women in sundrie places (saith Beda) as shortly after no lesse then a Thousād Saints suffered death at Liechfield, whereupon the place was called another Golgotha, or field of blood: In memory whereof, the City beareth for Armes to this day, in an Escheucheon of Landskip, sundry persons diuersly Martyred. And yet after these times also the Britaines continued constant in Christianity, and the censures of their Bishops (for the great estimation of their Constancie, piety, and learning) required, and approued in great points of Doctrine among the assemblies of some Generall Councels; as that of Sardis and Nice, in the time of great Constantine (the first Christian Emperour, and this our Country man, whose blessed daies gaue free way to that Profession, to the Councels Authority, and to the whole world Peace) had wee our Bishops present; whose forwardnesse against the Arrian Heresie, afterward Athanasius aduanceth in his Apology vnto Iouinian the Emperor, among three hundred Bishops assembled at the Councell of Sardice, in Anno three huudred and fiftie: whose words (as Nicephorus reports them) are these. Know most Christian Emperour (saith he) that this faith hath beene alwaies preached and professed, and that all Churches of Spaine, Britain, France and Germany at this day with one voyce doe approoue the same. As also at that of Ariminum, in the yeare three hundred fiftie nine, and in the raigne of Constantius, who caused foure hundred westerne Bishops to be there summoned in fauour of the Arrians, whereof three were out of Britaine, (as Sulpitius Seuerus the good Bishop of Burges hath reported) that gaue their suffrages against that Heresie. These doth Hilarie tearme the Bishops of the Prouinces of Britaine, by whom they were somwhat derided, because beeing farre from their owne Countrie they liued vpon the Emperours charge. And Beda testifieth, that from Diocletians time they both reedified their former Temples, and founded new also in memorie of their then fresh-bleeding Martyrs, and enioyed a generall and ioifull peace in their religious profession, till that Arrian Heresie hauing first filled the Continent, sought and found passage ouer the Seas into our Iland.

Gennadius in his Catalogues Illustrium Diuorum tels vs of an other learned Bishop of Britaine, Fastidius, who in the time of Cestius Bishop of Rome, wrote vnto one Fatalis a booke de vita Christiana, and another de viduitate seruanda; of much diuine learning and comfort. Chrysanthus likewise is recorded by Nicephorus, to be sonne of Bishop Martian, who hauing beene a Consular Deputie in Italie vnder Theodosius, and made Lieutenant of Britaine, where with great praise he managed the common wealth, was against his will afterward made Bishop at Constantinople of the Nouatians, that called themselues Cathari, that is pure; making a schisme in the Church, by their deniall of Salvation, to such as fell into relapse of sinne after Baptisme once receiued. This is that Bishop of whom we read, that of all his Ecclesiasticall reuenewes he reserued only for himselfe two loaues of bread vpon the Lords day. And in the first Tome of Councels is mention of Restitutus Bishop of London, whom (because that, as is most probable, Christian Religion had in those primitiue times taken more firme footing in Britaine then in France) the French Bishops called to their Nationall Councell, the second at Arles, in Anno 335, that he might with his Suffrage approoue their Decrees. About the yeer foure hundred seuenty, was a Prouinciall Councell held in Britaine for the reforming of Religion, and repairing of the ruined Churches, which the Pagan mariage of Vortiger had decaied, to the great griefe and discontent of the people, a pregnant signe of the continuing zeale, which vnto those dayes had left a glorious memorie.

(20) And the Ensigne of Arthur, wherein the Virgin Mary with her sonne in her armes (as is noted by Vincentius) was portraied, so often displaied for Christ, and his Countries libertie, against the Pagan Saxons, is as a seale to confirme vs of their Profession, and doth shew the badge of that ages Christianitie. But the famous Monasterie of Bangor, as a Colledge of diuine Philosophers, and by Clariuallensis truly acknowledged to be the Mother of all other in the world, and her Monkes distributed into seuen seuerall parts, euery part numbring three hundred soules, and earning their bread by their daily labours, doth notably witnesse to all succeeding ages, that Christian Religion was then both planted and preached in this Iland. And in the Synod held at Austins Oake were seuen old Britaine Bishops, besides other Doctours, who met with that Romane Legate; and not in points of doctrine, but rather in their seuerall rites and ceremonies did varie, by any thing that in that Assemblie appeared. For as it is most vndoubted, that (if we speake properly) Ierusalem is the Mother of vs all, and of all Churches; and our former allegations doe euince, that the first Plantation of the British Faith was altogether by Iewes and others of the Easterne Church: so the very rites of this Religious Colledge of Bangor doe euidently prooue, that their first institution in Religion came from the East, Beda shewing that in all of them they dissented from the Romane Church; yea, and that they neuer did, nor then would acknowledge any authoritie of the Bi-

The foundation of the ſaid Colledge is aſcribed to King Lucius, from whoſe time vnto the entrance of this Auſten the Monke, foure hundred thirty eight yeeres were expired: in which ſpace we haue ſeene that the Chriſtian Faith was both taught and embraced in this land, notwithſtanding the continuall perſecutions of the Romans, Huns, Picts, and Saxons: which laſt made ſuch deſolations in the outward face of the Church, that they droue the Chriſtian Biſhops into the deſerts of Cornwall and Wales. In which number were Theomis and Thadioceus Biſhops of London and Yorke. chuſing rather to ſuffer aduerſity with the people of God, then to enioy the pleaſures of ſinne for a ſeaſon.

By whoſe labours the Goſpell was plentifully propagated among thoſe vaſt mountaines, and thoſe parts eſpecially aboue all other made very glorious, by the multitudes of their holy Saints and learned Teachers.

(21) Laſtly, (for the cloſe of all) that theſe teſtimonies are ſincerely by vs produced, for the firſt preaching and planting of the Goſpell, and by ſuch meanes and men as we haue declared, and particularly by Ioſeph of Arimathea and his aſſociates, the conſent of all Writers, both forraine and home-bred, doth ſufficiently approue: and the reuerend regard had of the place, with the many Charters thereof to this day remaining, are ſtrong inducements for thoſe our firſt Apoſtles Reſidencie and Burials: whereof one, exemplified vnder the Seale of King Edward the third, is to bee ſeene at this day, reciting that the Abbey of Glaſtenbury being burned in the time of King Henry the ſecond while it was in his hands, at the requeſt of the Patriarke of Ieruſalem (then preſent in England) inſtigated further both by the Biſhops and Nobility, hee did reedifie the ſame, cauſing diligent ſearch to bee made for the ancient Charters of that foundation, and among many recited in that exemplification, in one of them it is called, Origo Religionis in Anglia: in another, Tumulum Sanctorum, ab ipſis diſcipulis Domini ædificatum, fuiſſe venerabilem. Alſo in the ſame Charter amongſt many other Kings, there is mention made of King Arthur, to be a great Benefactor vnto that Abbey; whoſe Armes vpon the ſtone walles, both in the Chappell (called S. Ioſeph) and in diuers other places of the Abbey, are cut: which is an Eſchucheon, wheron a Croſſe with the Virgin Mary in the firſt quarter is ſet, and is yet to this day remaining ouer the Gate of entrance, which is held to be alſo the Arms of that Abbey. This place is ſaid to haue beene giuen to Ioſeph and his brethren by Aruiragus then King of Britaine: and from hence were thoſe two diuine Doctors ſent to Eleutherius by King Lucius, as by their Epithets doth appeare: the one of them called Eluanus Aualonus, or of Glaſtenbury; and the other, Meduuinus of Belga, that is, Welles neere vnto this place. And to theſe perſons and place, Polydore Virgil, that dwelled among vs, and had peruſed moſt of our Antiquities, aſcribeth the originall and precedencie of our Chriſtian Faith, in theſe words: Hæc omnia Chriſtianæ pietatis in Britannia extitere primordia, quam deinde Lucius Rex accendit & adauxit, &c. And our other latter Writers likewiſe with him agree of this place, further affirming, that at firſt but poore, and without all pompe, it was their Oratory, built onely of wrethen wands, as both [a] Capgraue, [b] Bale, [c] Maior, [d] Scroope; [e] Harding, [f] Thorne, and others affirme: Afterwards by diuers Princes raiſed vnto greater glory, with many large priuiledges & Charters granted; to wit, of Edgar, Edmund, Elfred, Edward, Bringwalthius, Kentwin, Baldred, Ina, Kenwall, the Conquerour, Rufus, and others: all which were diligently peruſed by King Henry the ſecond, as we haue ſaid, & that Rectory in theſe Charters continually termed The Graue of Saints: The mother Church: The Diſciples foundation, and dedicated vnto Chriſt, as the firſt place in this Land, wherein his Goſpell was firſt preached and embraced.

(22) To conclude this digreſſion, grown much greater then was intended, we ſee it is moſt apparant, that the Britaines had a ſettled opinion in Chriſtianity before the ſound therof was heard from Rome; and that the Lord had heere ſet vp his ſtandard, whereunto theſe Ilanders reſorted as to the Tower of their ſtrength, and was the firſt Kingdome of the Gentiles, that are ſaid to bring their ſonnes thus in their armes, and their daughters thus vpon their ſhoulders, vnto the Lords Sanctuary: whoſe knowledge continually increaſing, hath hitherto, to Englands great ioy and fame, beene ſtill continued, though the ſpirituall ſparkes thereof for a ſeaſon haue ſometimes beene couered in the cinders of the Pagans deſolations, or with the ſuperſtitious worſhips of mans inuentions; both which now diſperſed as clouds before the Sunne, the light appeareth in his full ſtrength, and the moſt pure vvaters of the word run vntroubled. This Iland then, in this thing made happy before the moſt, the Inhabitants became Inſtructers of others, and in their earthly veſſels bare this heauenly liquor, which thorow their golden Conduits ran into many other Countries, and filled their Ceſternes with this water of life. For from hence was Netherland conuerted to Chriſtianity, as teſtifieth the ſtory of Swithbertus: Switzerland by Beatus, as witneſſeth Rhenanus: Burgundy by our Columbanus, as ſaith Sigebertus: Scotland by Brandadus, as Bernard the French Monke affirmeth: Swedia by Gallus, as ſaith Petrus de Natalibus: Friſia by Wilfred, as is recorded by Beda and Matthew of Weſtminſter: and the Franconians, Heſſians, and Thuringians, by Winifred our Deuonſhire man: the Norwegians by Nicolas Brekſpere of Middleſex: the Lithuanians by Thomas Waldē of Eſſex, the Iriſh by Patrik, the Picts by Nianus Bernicus; and by Chriſts aſſiſtance the naked Virginians by vs Engliſh ſhalbe. OTHO.

CHAPTER X.

An. Do. 70.

BVt leauing Chriſts proceedings to the diſpoſe of himſelfe, let vs returne to the ſubiect from whence wee haue wandered, and continue the ſucceſſions of Great Britaines Monarches, vnto them that haue held it, whether by chance of warre, or voice of Election: In which ſort (as is ſaid) Galba got it, and but a ſhort time kept it: And from him Otho tooke it, and a ſhorter time enioied it.

Otho his original. Tacit. Hiſt. 2. c. 17

(2) Whoſe Originall (ſaith Tacitus) was from Ferrentium, his Father a Conſull, his mothers blood ſomewhat diſparaged, but yet not baſe; his youth run ouer with voluptuous wantonneſſe and prodigall expences, more ready for diſturbances, then depending vpon preferment or dignity of State; and hauing gone thorough all his wealth, retained onely the hearty affections of the Souldiers, which Galba had vtterly alienated. Neither did Otho himſelfe bandy againſt Galba, but Vitellius in Germany was fauoured againſt both; Two perſons ſo vile and ambitious, as was much feared, would proue the ſcourge of the Empire, and the ruine of Rome.

Vitellius much fauoured.

(3) Vnto Vitellius ſided the Britaines, vnder the Conduct of Trebellius Maximus, (remembred before) a man vnfit for warre, and vnexperienced of ſeruice, compounded altogether of couetouſneſſe, and for his niggardly ſparings, and vnmercifull pollings, exceedingly hated of his Armie: which was further aggrauated by Roſcius Celius, Lieutenant of the twentieth Legion, his ancient Enemy, betwixt whom the ſparks of enuie ſhortly burſt forth into flames of reciprocall accuſations. Trebellius being charged of inſufficiency for command, with the beggering of the Prouince, and Legions; and he againe accuſing Celius of factious behauiours, & diſſoluing of diſcipline: through which diſſenſions a negligent regard was held of the Souldiers, who carried themſelues arrogantly, euen againſt both; and as men that had rather be doing ill, then doing nothing, grew daily into mutinies. In theſe ſtirres Maximus finding himſelf vnable to withſtand Roſcius, (the common affection ſwaying on his ſide,) with his friends and followers entred Germanie in the quarrell of Vitellius, and ioined thoſe Britiſh forces to maintaine his cauſe, who now preſuming vpon his owne ſtrength, and others his Confederates, ambitiouſly plaied the Prince, growne to that height euen of nothing.

In Chap. 7. ſect. 24.

Roſcius Celius & Trebellius accuſe each other.

The Souldiers thereby diſordered.

(4) Otho his Concurrent (in this thing only commendable) ſought by all meanes to ſtay the effuſion of more ciuill blood; and that already ſpent, ſo poſſeſt his thoughts, that his minde was ſtill diſtracted and nightly affrighted with the ſeeming appearance of Galbaes ghoſt: for which cauſes hee ſent conditions of peace to Vitellius, offering him an equall part in the Empire, and to giue him alſo his daughter in mariage. But Vitellius diſdaining any competition, refuſeth all Capitulations, and prepares himſelfe for the warre. Otho thus conſtrained, ſets forth his forces, and in three ſeuerall skirmiſhes had the victory, but in the fourth at Brixellum loſt the day; yet not ſo much weakened or vnrecouerable, (his Armie in number and courage ſurmounting the other) as himſelfe was vnwilling to try the chance of warre any more; for being importunated by his Captaines and Leaders, to reenforce the Battaile, with many reaſons, and probabilities of an aſſured victory, in a thankfull and ſhort Oration, anſwered thus their Petitions.

" Theſe ciuill warres Vitellius beganne; which I for " my part purpoſe not to continue; and hereby let " Poſterity eſteeme of Otho, that others haue kept the " Empire longer, but neuer any that left it more vali- " antly. Let this minde therefore accompany me to " the Graue, that you for your parts would haue died " for my ſake, and I to ſaue your liues, die voluntary " and vnuanquiſhed. I blame not the Gods, nor enuy " your Emperors riſing glory: it is ſufficient that my " houſe hath touched the higheſt ſtraine of Honour, " and my ſelfe to be left in records, The ſoueraign Mo- " narch of the world.

(6) And thereupon ſolemnely taking his leaue of the whole Army, went to his Tent, and with his dagger wounded himſelfe vnder the left pappe, whereof immediately he died, in the yeare of his age thirty ſeuen, and daies of his raigne ninety fiue. He was of ſtature but lowe, feeble in his feete, and vnto ſo great a minde, his bodie not any waies proportionable; his face without haire and woman-like, his attire nice and delicate, and his life and death nothing at all conſonant or agreeable.

He killeth himſelfe.

VITELLIVS.

CHAPTER XI.

Ann. Do. 70.

WHen certaine newes of Othoes death was brought Vitellius, he presently assumed the name of Caesar, and administred the affairs of the Empire, with no lesse authority then the absolute Commander of the World. And of such acceptance was the accident, that he dedicated the dagger wherewith it was done, vnto Mars in his Temple at Coleyn, as the lucky instrument of his aduanced Estate.

Vitellius glad of Othoes death.

(2) Naturally ambitious hee was, and now the same the more inhaunced by his strengths of the German Souldiers, and the flatteries of the Senate, which euer bare saile with the fairest winde. His entrance into Rome was aboue measure magnificall, hauing the naked sword of Iulius Caesar borne before him, with sound of Trumpettes, Ensignes, Standards, Banners, and Flags, accompanied with an Army worthy of a better Prince then Vitellius was.

Suetan. in vit. Vitell. cap. 10. Ioseph. bell. Iud. lib. 5. cap. 8.

Otho magnificall aboue measure.

(3) His originall is diuersly reported: either framed according to the affections of his flatterers, or blasted with the tongues of deprauing backe-biters; & both in extremes, extremly disagreeing. For Q. Eulogius, as Suetonius writeth, deduced his descent from Faunus King of Aborigines, and Lady Vitellia his wife, worshipped in many places for a goddesse. But Cassius Seuerus affirmeth him to bee sprung from no better roote then a Cobler, and a common naughty-packe the daughter of a Baker. Howsoeuer, true it is, that Lucius his father bare thrice the Consulship in Rome, was Prouost of Syria, and in such credit with the Emperour Claudius, that in his absence and expedition into Britaine, he had the whole charge of the Empire committed vnto him: himselfe in speciall fauour with Tiberius, and in vse for his strumpets: with Caius, for his Chariot-running: with Claudius, for his dice-plaiing: and with Nero, for his flatterie: vnto whose Ghost in publike shew hee sacrificed, and disposed the Emperiall affaires at the discretion of base Stage-Plaiers

Vitellius in fauor with diuers former Emperours.

(4) His vnmeasurable gluttony was such, that the whole imploiments of his Captaines were to prouide him Cates, and that in such excesse, that two thousand dishes of fish, and seuen thousand of fowle, were serued to his Table at one supper; and yet vvas he not ashamed to commend his owne Temperance, in a set Oration before the Senate and People, vvho vvell knew him to be guiltlesse of that vertue: insomuch that Tacitus reporteth, in those few moneths wherein hee raigned, he had vvasted nine hundred millions of sesterces, vvhich amounteth to seuen millions, thirty one thousand, two hundred fiftie pounds sterling. And Iosephus thinketh if he had liued longer, the whole reuenues of the Empire had not beene sufficient to maintaine his Gluttony. A Prince otherwise no way memorable, as being indeed without skill in profession of Armes, without counsell in matters of the greatest importance, commonly drowned in surfet, and farre vnmeet to weild weighty affaires.

(5) These defects found ready vent to his Opposites, and gaue liberty of speech in the Assemblies of their Estates: amongst whom Vespasian was held the only Morning-Starre worthy to ascend on the setting of this darkned Sunne; vnto whom Licinius Mutianus, Gouernour of Syria, was auerse, Marcus Clunius Rufus of Spaine stood very well affected, and Tiberius Alexander of Egypt for him the foremost. Also with him sided the Kings Sohemus, Antiochus, and Agrippa, with the beautifull Queene Berenice: vnto whom Vespasian and his sonne Titus were well knowne Gouernours together in the Prouinces of Syria and Iudaa.

(6) The first that did reuolt were the Illyrian Bands: to suppresse which Vitellius sent vnto Vectius Bolanus Lieutenant of Britaine, for aid of that Prouince, hauing had good experience of their seruice in his warres before: As when Hordeonius Flaccus brought eight thousand Britaines to his quarrell against Otho: As also when Trebellius Maximus (formerly mentioned) ioined them to the German forces. Which last man had now againe resumed his former place in Britannie, without either Maiestie or Authoritie, but rather ruled by way of intreatie, and at the discretion of the Souldiers.

(7) Vnto whom, this Vectius Bolanus succeeded for Deputie: a man of no great parts in warre, but more temperate, and not odious for any crime. His answer vnto Vitellius was, that the Country of Britaine stood not so quiet, that he might spare any numbers thence, the Souldiers and Confederates hauing their hands full, to hold all vpright. Neither (in truth) were they fast to his side, but rather affected Vespasian, whose reputation in warlike affaires was first gotten amongst them in Britaine, in the raigne of Claudius: though we find in Tacitus; that the Vexillaries of three British Legions followed Vitellius in his expedition against the Illyiran Army, wherein the flower and strength of all the Britaines are reported to haue been, and that their fourteenth Legion came to his aide, in whom notwithstanding he had no good confidence: but hearing the daily reuolts of the Prouinces, and the approach of Vespasian, was minded to resigne his dignitie vnto him, had not the out-cries of the people beene against it.

(8) Finally, when he had raigned onely eight moneths, and fiue daies, as Iosephus accounteth, he was slaine in most ignominious maner: for his hands were bound behinde his backe, a halter fast about his necke, his clothes rent and torne, a sword point set vnder his chinne, and head held backward by a Vespasian.

Petilius.

An. Do. 72.

SO acceptable was the fall of this Prince, and such hopes reuiued at the entrance of his Successour, as that all mens mindes were raised to an expectation, that the glorie of the Empire, so much Eclipsed through the ciuill broiles of Galba, Otho, and this last Vitellius, should now shine againe in the beautie of her former liberty by the desired gouernment of aged Vespasian; whose integritie, valour, and seruice, had beene sufficiently approued by his many Expeditions, in all the Prouinces wherein he had to doe.

His originall. Sueton. in vit. Vespas. sect. 1.

(2) His descent was from the Flauian family, and that but base and obscure: his Father called Titus Flauius; his Mother Polla Vespasia, his Wife Domilia, and his Sonnes Titus, and Domitian, both Emperours succeeding after him.

His imployments in former times. Tacit. in vita Agric. fo. 189.

(3) In his yong yeares, hee serued as a Militarie Tribune in the Country of Thracia, and as Questor in the Prouinces of Crete, and Cyrene: Vnder Claudius the Emperour, he went forth into Germanie, as Lieutenant of a Band, and from thence was sent into Britaine, to be Leader of the second Legion, where the foundation of that greatnes whereunto after hee attained, was first laid: for as Suetonius hath written, therein with victory he fought thirty set Battailes, and was also Conquerour of the Ile of wight: whereby two mighty Nations were subdued to the Romanes; and twentie Townes wonne from the Britaines: for which exploits he had Triumphall ornaments, worthily assigned him by Claudius, whose owne Triumph, (as Iosephus saith) was gotten without any paines of his, but by the only prowesse of Vespasian. After this, hee gouerned Africke with singular integritie and much honour, and was lastly sent by Nero for his Vice-roy into Syria vpon this occasion.

Ioseph. Bel. Iud. lib. 3. cap. 1.

Sueton. in vit. Vespas. sect. 4.

(4) There had beene spread thorow all the East-parts, an old Prophecie and setled opinion constantly beleeued, that it was appointed by the Destinies, there should come out of of Iurie him that should be Lord of the whole world: which how it serued for the Iewes to reuolt, or for the Romanes to apply onely vnto Vespasian, the euent sheweth, which cannot agree to any other, then to the person and power of Christ Iesus, there borne, and throughout the whole world still raigning: Yet vpon the confidence of such an accomplishment, the Iewes reuolted from the Romanes obedience, and slew their President Sabinus by name, putting to flight Gallus, Lieutenant Generall of Syria, that came to his aide, and got from him the maine Standard, or Ensigne of the Eagle. This Nation was so populous and strong, that none was thought fitter to stay their attempts, then was Vespasian, who with great honour and approbation, reduced that Prouince vnto their former subiection, and there remained the short time of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius their raignes; of whose proceedings there * Iosephus writeth at large, vnto whom I must referre the vnsatisfied Reader.

An ancient prophecie in all the East parts.

The cause of the Iewes reuolt.

Ioseph. de Bello Iud.

(5) All which times, the ciuill stirres amongst the Romanes, gaue the Prouinces occasion to attempt their former liberties; as did the Batauians, Germanes, and French, with whom the Britaines also tooke hart to reuolt: But the first that sided with Vespasian, were two thousand expert Souldiers, drawne out of the Mesian Legions, and sent to aide Otho against Vitellius; who marching as farre as Aquileia, they heard there of the certaine death of Otho, and thereupon taking the aduantage of the offered opportunity, with an vncontrolled liberty, committed many robberies and outragious villanies: In so much, that fearing condigne punishment, they held it their best policy, to combine some speciall man by their fauours vnto them, whereby their facts might bee either quite smoothered, or lightly reprehended; neither in their opinion was any so gracious for desert or power, as was Vespasian, and therfore with one assent they proclaimed him Emperour, and wrote his name in their Banners, thinking themselues as worthy to make an Emperour, as were the Legions either of Spaine, or Germany.

Tacit. Hist. 3. c. 9.

Vespasian chosen Emperour by the Mesian Souldiers.

(6) Of the like minde were his owne Legions in Syria and Iurie, growne now so famous by the prosecution of those warres, that they highly conceited his his valour, and their owne sufficiencie to bee inferiour to none: And therefore all on the sudden at Cæsarea, both Captaine and Souldier salute him Emperour; which title when he resolutely gainsaid and refused, with drawne swords they threatned his death. Thus then being brought into danger euery way, he sent his letters vnto Tiberius Alexander, Lieutenant of Aegypt, who likewise at Alexandria, presently proclaimed him Emperour.

By his owne. Ioseph. bell. Iud. lib. 5. cap. 10.

(7) At this time Vectius Bolanus sent by Vitellius was Lieutenant of Britaine, there ruling in a gentler and milder manner then was fit for so fierce a Nation: for the Souldiers hauing gotten head, by the remisse Gouernment of Trebellius Maximus, continued the same looseneſse in discipline still: and Bolanus in stead of awe and Obedience, retained onely their affections and good wils. But most especially the short Raignes of these last Emperours (whose beginnings were altogether imploied to satisfie their licentious pleasures, and latter times spent for the defence of their Liues from violent Deaths) gaue way to many imperfections of the Gouernours, and misdemeanours of the common Souldiers.

Tacit. in. vita Agric. fol. 187.

(8) But when Vespasian had assumed the Empire, great Captaines and good Souldiers were sent into the Prouinces, and into Britaine, Petilius Cerealis that had formerly there made proofe of his seruice vnder Nero, in the warres against Bodno, and afterwards in other parts, as against the Gaules and Batauians, with prosperous victories, The fame of this man strooke great terror into the hearts of the wauering Britaines, and amongst them of the * Brigantes, the most populous State of the whole Prouince: against whom at his first approach the warred, & in many battles, and some of them bloudy, the greatest part of these people were wasted, and their Country came into the Romish subiection.

Petilius Cerealis Deputy in Britaine.

(9) Whereby the glory of Cerealis might well haue dimmed the fame of his Successor, had not Iulius Frontinus a great Souldier also sustained the charge with reputation and credit, in subduing the strong and Warlike nation the* Silures: where he had, beside the force of the enemie to struggle with, the straits, and difficult places of rockes and mountaines, for accesse.

Yorkeshire, Lancashire, Westmerland, and the Bishopricke of Durham.

Iulius Frontinus subdueth the Britaines.

* South-wales.

(10) After whose gouernment (no further Acts being mentioned,) Iulius Agricola, who in Rome had beene Questor, Tribune, and Pretor, and Lieutenant in Aquitania, was sent Generall into Britaine by Vespasian the Emperour, the yeere before his death. This man formerly had there serued vnder the command of Petilius Cerealis, whereby he had gained experience both of the People and Prouince; and at his first approach gathered the Ensignes of the Legions, and other aids of the Auxiliaries (who for that yeere attended an end of their trauels, because the Summer was almost spent) lest by protracting time, the violence of the Ordouices should further burst forth, who a little before his entrance, had vtterly almost cut off a wing which lay on their Borders, the rest of the Country, as men desirous of warre, allowing their example.

Iulius Agricola Lieutenant in Britaine.

Against these Agricola addressed, who kept themselues in places of aduantage, and durst not descend into indifferent ground. He therefore being himselfe foremost, led vp his Armie to their encounter, and seconded with the courage of his trained Souldiers, put them all to sword and flight, whereby the whole nation was almost quite destroied.

He ouercōmeth the Ordouices.

(11) And now that his fame began to ascend, he knew well that with instance it must be followed, and as the first affaires had issue, the rest would succeede; he therefore deliberated to conquer the Iland Mona from the possession whereof Paulinus Snetonius was reuoked, by the generall Rebellion vnder Boduo. But in a purpose not purposed before, and ships wanting, the policie of the Captaine deuised a passage; for hee commanded the most choice of the Aids, to whom the shallowes were well known (and without whom the Romans did almost attempt nothing) to put ouer at once; and suddenly to inuade them. These Britaines, after the vse of their Country manner, were most Skilfull swimmers, and in swimming armed, able to gouerne themselues and horses. The Monaans thinking themselues secure, for that no Ships were seene in their Riuer, now thus suddenly surprized, as men amazed, firmly thought that nothing could be inuincible to them, who came with such resolutions to warre, and therefore they humbly desired Peace, and yeelded the Iland vnto Agricolaes deuotion.

He winneth the Iland of Mona.

(12) Who now in these prosperous proceedings of his fortunes, sought not with any glorious relations or letters of aduertisements, to improue and augment the greatnesse of his honour; but rather in seeking to suppresse his fame, made it shine more bright; and addressing himselfe for ciuill gouernment, reformed many abuses in his House, his Campe, and in the whole Prouince, and those especially that most touched the poorer sort, as by moderating the increase of Tribute and Corne, wherewith the Britains were daily burdened: by the suppressing of which enormities (and the like) an honourable opinion of him was euery where entertained, and a generall inclination vnto Peace, which partly by the negligence, partly by the auarice of former Gouernours, had beene no lesse feared then Warre it selfe.

Agricola good to the poore.

(13) And whereas the Britaines hitherto still harried with Oppressions and Warres, had little leisure or will to apply themselues to things which accompany Peace, and are the ornaments of Ciuil and settled Societies, and therefore were prone vpon euery occasion to reuolt and stirre: to induce them by pleasures to quietnesse and rest, he exhorted them in priuate, and helpt them in publike, to build Temples, Houses, and Places of Assemblies, and common resort; and likewise prouided that the sonnes of their Nobles should be instructed in the liberall Arts and Sciences, commending the industrie, and preferring the wits of the Britaines before the Students of France, as being now growne curious to attaine the Eloquence of the Romane Gentrie, (yea euen the Gowne the habit of peace and peaceable Arts) and to delight in gorgeous Buildings, Banquets, and Baths.

His good course in winning the people from wildnesse.

The Britaines, ciuilized.

(14) And thus farre had Agricola proceeded before the death of Vespasian, whose managing of the Imperiall dignitie was euery way answerable to so high a place, and whose death was as much lamented, as his Vertues did surmount his Predecessours. But as touching his miraculous cures of the Blind and the Lame, as they serue not either to be vrged or inserted in this our present Historie; so yet may they conuince the indurate Atheist, whose conscience is seared with the sinne of incredulitie of the Miracels wrought by our blessed Sauiour Iesus Christ. For if the wisest Historians of those times haue beleeued themselues, and left Records vpon their credit to following posteritie, that by his touch onely he cured a Lame-man, and with his spittle opened the eies of the Blind, being a mortall and sinfull man; shall it then be doubted, that hee which knew no sinne, neither receiued the gift by measure, either in power could not, or in act did not worke such Miracles as were the witnesses of his Godhead, and for such are recorded, to confirme our faith? But to our purpose.

Vespasian cureth the blinde and the lame, and that miraculously.

(15) When Vespasian had liued threescore and nine yeeres, seuen moneths, and seuen daies, and had raigned ten yeeres, as Eusebius saith, he died peaceably in his Bed; which no Emperour since Augustus euer did; hauing beene a great Scourge and Instrument of God against the miserable Iewes; whose kingly race from Dauids line he sought by all meanes to extirpate, that so all their hopes and expectations might for euer be cut off.

Titus Emp.

Agricola Lieut.

An. Do. 81.

PResently vpon the death of this Emperour, Titus his eldeſt ſonne, ſirnamed Flauius Veſpaſian, without any contradictiō was receiued and obeyed for his rightful ſucceſſor: aſwell for that his father in his life-time had made him his Partner in the Empire, and at his death by Teſtament declared him his Heire; as alſo for the generall opinion conceiued of him who for his inbred goodnes and noble conditions, was called & eſteemed the louely darling and delight of mankind. Indeed of a moſt comely preſence he was, & fitted therunto with all heroicall vertues, a great Souldier, learned in the Arts, a good Oratour, a skilfull Muſitian, and could by artificiall characters write both very faſt and very faire.

Titus made Emperour without all contradictiō,

(2) His youth he ſpent in Militarie qualities, and ſerued in Germanie and Britaine with exceeding commendations, and in Iury warred with the like glorie, which is nothing impaired by the learned ſtile of his Recorder Ioſephus, vnto whom againe for theſe affaires I muſt referre the curious Reader.

(4) Ieruſalem, with the ſlaughter of eleuen thouſand Iewes, cuen on the birth day of his daughter, with ſuch honour he wonne, that thereupon preſently he was ſaluted Emperour, euen in the life time of Veſpaſian his Father: and from that day carried himſelfe as his Aſſociate in the Empire; for with him hee Triumphed, and with him he iointly adminiſtred the Cenſorſhip, his Colleague he was in the Tribunes authoritie; and his companion alſo in ſeauen Conſullſhips: In all which, though the Edicts went forth in his fathers name: yet were they penned by himſelfe. Of this his victory ouer the Iewes, he left the remembrance to poſteritie by ſtamping vpon the reuerſe of his coines IVD. CAP. with pictures expreſſing his Triumph and the Iewes ouerthrow, vvhich in the front of this Chapter we haue alſo placed.

He wonne Ieruſalem in the life-time of his father.

His faults.

(4) Somewhat he was blemiſhed with the loue of Berenice, the beautifull Queene of Iewry, and much more with the murther of Aulus Cinna, only through iealouſie conceiued of her; and whether that was the ſinne whereof at his death he repented is vncertaine, when lifting vp his eies to Heauen, hee complained why his Life ſhould be taken from him, that excepting one offence deſerued not to die. As himſelfe in glorie vveilded the Emperiall Scepter, ſo did his Subſtitutes goueme the Prouinces; at which time in Britaine, Agricola was Preſident, and therein had ſpent almoſt two yeares vnder the raigne of Veſpaſian, in ſuch manner as we haue declared.

His repentance at his death.

(5) In his third yeare, he diſcouered new Countries and parts of this Iland, yet vntouched, or at leaſtwiſe not thoroughly ſubdued, as altogether vnſatiate of that which was gotten; & ſought to draw the confines of the Empire with a larger compaſſe: therefore marching Northward to the Frith of * Taus, waſted all as he went, and without any reſiſtance fortified the places with Caſtles and Bulwarkes, which hee ſtored with ſufficient prouiſion; where euery Garriſon wintring, garded it ſelfe, & with the Summers ſeruice, euer repaired the Winters euents, whereby euermore the Enemy went to the worſe, and his deſignes proſpered as himſelfe wiſhed.

(6) The fourth Summer was ſpent in peruſing and ordering that which he had ouer-runne. And if the glory of the Romane name could haue permitted, or ſo beene ſatisfied, it needed not to haue ſought other limits of Britaine: for [a] Glota and [b] Bodotria, two armes of two oppoſite Seas, ſhooting farre into the Land, and onely deuided aſunder by a narrow partition of ground, the ſame was both garded and fortified with Caſtles and Garriſons: ſo that the Romans were abſolute Lords of all the South-ſide, and had caſt the Enemie as it were into another Iland.

Mer cifull he vvas to the poore, and ſo ready to doe them good, that one day being ſpent by him vvithout any notable action, in ſorrovv he ſaid: I haue quite loſt a day. CHAPTER XIV.

Domitian. Emp.

Agricola. Lieut.

DOmitian attaining the Empire by the death of Titus, (wrought by himselfe,) as farre differed from him in vertuous conditions, as he was linked neere him in consanguinitie of blood: His youth not spent in Armes, with his Father and Brother, but inertiously consumed in lasciuiousnesse and penurie.

Ann. Dom. 83.

Sueton. in vit. Domit. sect. 1.

(2) At Rome hee was in the Vitellian troubles, where, with Sabinus his Vncle, he had beene murdered, had not the Sexton of the Capitoll hid him in his house, and in the habit of a Minister vnknowen, thence escaped: which place afterwards, when hee came to be Emperour, he gorgeously built for a Temple to Iupiter his supposed Preseruer, and consecrated himselfe in the lap of that heathenish Idoll. Hee very speedily apprehended the hope of an Empire, for no sooner was his Father made Emperour, but that he assumed the name of Cæsar, and in Rome carried himself with such prodigalitie, and so liberally made promises of the Imperiall Offices, that his father hearing thereof, said, he maruelled why his sonne sent not one to succeed him in his place. But to dissemble and cloake his idle conceits, he gaue himselfe to the study of Poesie, (although with little affection, as the end prooued) for which notwithstanding both Pliny and Martial doe highly commend him, as it is the manner of men to admire the very shadow of a good quality in Princes and great ones: and so doth Iuuenal and Suetonius praise his braue minde, for his shewes in the Amphitheater, wherein not onely men, but women also were brought, and forced to fight for their liues with wild beasts: a cruell spectacle neuertheless, and vnbeseeming to humanity.

(3) His first entrance into state and dignitie was neither greatly applauded nor gainsaid, hee seeming to carrie an equall mixture, and his vertues to hold leuell with his vices But ambition now supported with Soueraignty, did quickly set the scale onely for the worse side. The affaires of the Empire he altogether neglected; and impatient of labour, or affection to Armes, daily retired into a priuate chamber or Gallery, wherein he vsually applyed himselfe onely to catch Flies, and with the point of a bodkin to pricke them thorow: whereupon one being asked what company was with the Emperour, replied, Not so much as a flie In which princely exercise let vs a while leaue him, and returne to his better emploied Lieutenant Agricola.

His vaine misspending of the time.

Tacit. in vit. Agric.

(4) Who now in the fifth yeere of his gouernment tooke the seas, and with many prosperous conflicts subdued some adiacent places and people, before that time vnknowen; and furnished with forces those parts of Britaine, which lay coasted against Ireland: to which Countrey also he had a minde, and would often say, that if the Romans were therin planted, the Liberty of the Britaines would soone be banished quite out of sight, and out of hope.

Agricola his opinion of Ireland.

(5) Now in the sixth yeere of his Prefecture, because a general rising of al the farther Nations beyond Bodotria was feared, and passages were all beset with power of the Enemies, hee manned a Fleet to search the creekes and harboroughs of the ample Region beyond it, and with his Army marched further North. The Britaines heereat (especially at sight of their ships) much amazed and troubled, knowing now that the secrets of their Seas were al discouered, and no refuge left if they were ouercome; armed themselues with great preparation; and the Caledonians (a most puissant and strong Nation in those parts) the formost; who, as challengers, braued the Romans so boldly, and in such manner, that some counselled the Generall to retire his forces on this side Bodotria, and rather of his owne accord to depart, then to bee repelled with shame,

He searcheth the creekes and harboroughs.

Caledonians most puissant.

(6) Agricola, whose courage could not be clouded with any dastardly feare, held on his intents; and hearing by prisoners taken, the manner of his Enemies proceedings, ordered his host accordingly, diuiding his armie into three battles, and so lay entrenched; the weakest whereof, containing the Ninth Legion, the Britaines by Night assailed, and hauing slaine the Watch, brake into their Campe with a furious noyse: to whose rescue, Agricola sent his Light horsemen, and a Band of foot, whose Ensignes and Armour glittering in the appearance of day, so rebated the edge and further purposes of the Britaines, that they gaue backe to the gates of the Trench; where, in the straites the conflict was sharpe and cruell, till in the end they were forced to quit the field. Vpon this battle so manfully fought, and so famously won, the Romans presuming that to their prowesse all things were now easie & open, cryed to leade into Caledonia, and to finde out the limits of Britaine, with a course of continued conquests: and those which erewhile were so wary and wise, waxt forward and bold after the euent, and grew to speake bigly: such being the hard condition of Warres, that if ought fall out well, all challenge a part; misfortunes are onely imputed to one. Contrariwise, the Britaines presupposing that not valour, but skill in the Generall by vsing the occasion, had carried it away, abated no whit their wonted courage, but armed their youth, transported their Children and Wiues into places of safety, and sought by Assemblies & Religious rites to establish an Association of the Cities together. And so for that yeare both partyes did depart, incensed to further preparations.

Agricola searcheth out the limits of Britaine.

(7) In the beginning of the next, Agricola sending his Nauy before, which by vnexpected spoiling in in ſeuerall places, ſhould induce a greater and more vncertain terrour; followed himſelfe with his Army by Land: hauing drawne to his party ſome of the valianteſt Britaines, whom by long experience in Peace, he had found moſt faithfull for his Warres: and ſo arriued at the Mount * Grampius, where the Britaines had lodged themſelues before, and as men nothing deiected by the vnfortunate chance of the former battaile, had now prepared themſelues, attending only for Reuenge or Seruitude. And being taught, that common danger muſt be repelled with mutuall Concord, by Leagues and Embaſſages they aſſembled the power of all their Cities together, aboue thirtie thouſand armed men, as by view was taken, beſides an endles number of youth which thither daily flocked vnto them, and many luſty Old men renowned in the former warres, bearing the Badges due to their honour: at what time Galgacus, for vertue and birth, of all the Leaders the Principall man, ſeeing the multitude hotly demaund the Battell, is ſaid to haue vſed this, or the like ſpeech.

The Romanes wanton in peace

Their Army compoſed of diuers nations.

They are deſtitute of many encouragements.

Many Cities in factions.

(6) This ſpeech was ſo vehemently deliuered, & ſo cheerefully of them all receiued, that with Songs and confuſed acclamations (after their accuſtomed faſhion) they cluſtered together on heaps, and ſome of the bold'ſt aduanced forward, whileſt Agricola likewiſe was incouraging his men, who ſtraightwaies ranne to their weapons, and ruſhed on furiouſly toward the Enemy.

(10) The Britaines were marſhalled in the higher ground, fitly both to the ſhew, and to terrifie: the firſt Battalion ſtanding on the plaine, the reſt on the aſcent of the hill, knit and riſing as it were one ouer another; the middle of the field was filled with clattering and running of Chariots & horſemen. Agricola ſeeing their number to exceede his, drew his battaile in length, and leauing his horſe, aduanced himſelfe before the Enſignes on foote.

The number of Britaine exceded the Romanes.

the Britaines, employing both art and valour, with their great ſwords and little Targets, auoided the volue of the Romans, ſhowring downe withall great ſtore of theirs vpon them, wherewith they were both galled and ſore wounded. Agricola ſeeing his men thus ſtoutly reſiſted, tooke another courſe: for, ſpying the aduantage, he commanded three [a] Batauian Cohorts, and two of the [b] Tungrians, to preſſe forward, and bring the matter to handy ſtrokes and dint of ſword, a thing which (in reſpect of their long ſeruice) they were very expert in, but contrariwiſe to the Britains very preiudiciall, by reaſon of their litle Bucklers, and huge ſwords, being blunt pointed, and no waies fit for the cloſe in fight. This command aduantaged the Romans much; for theſe with the pikes of their Bucklers, when they came to deale blowes, ſo mangled the faces of the Britaines, that they were not able to ſtand before them; and the reſt, gathering courage vpon emulation of theſe, aſcended the hill, bearing downe all that was in their way, ſo that many halfe dead and ſome wholy vntouched, were ouer-paſſed and left for haſte of winning the field. In the meane while the Chariots mingled themſelues with the battle of footmen, and the troopes of horſemen began for to fly: who albeit they had lately terrified others, were now diſtreſſed themſelues, by the vneuenneſſe of the ground, and thicke rankes of the enemy, and were forced to fight ſtanding ſtill, and by the maine weight of horſes to beare downe one another. The wandring Wagons alſo, and maſterleſſe horſes, as chance or feare did guide them, ouer-bare many times their friends, and thwarted their way that met them.

(12) The other Britaines that kept the hill, and had leiſure to behold the manner of fight, beganne to come downe by little and little, and ſought to compaſſe the backe of the enemy, which intent Agricola ſoone preuented, by ſending foure wings of Horſemen retained purpoſely about him for ſudden diſpatches and chances of warre. Theſe ſo fiercly aſſailed them, that a moſt ſharpe and bloody battle enſued, wherein the Britaines on each ſide were beaten downe and ſlaine, notwithſtanding many of them ſhewed both valour and reuenge euen to the end: the reſt disbanded, turned their backes, and fled toward the deſert: whoſe purſuit was followed vntill Night, and fulneſſe of blood made an end of the chaſe.

(13) Of the Romans ſide were ſlaine (if we muſt credit their owne friends) onely three hundred and forty perſons, and of them, one of extraordinary note and account, Aulus [a] Articus, Captaine of a Cohort, who vpon a youthfull heate, and fierceneſſe of his horſe, was carried amidſt his enemies. Of the Britaines fell ten thouſand, and their deſignes ſo defeated and broken, that as deſperate men, they forſake their houſes, and in deſpight ſet fire on them themſelues: the hurt perſons they carry and draw with them, and call them that are vnhurt, hoping to be releeued by them. One while they chuſe out holes to lurke in, for their liues ſafety; eftſoones in great haſte forſake them, as doubting therein their owne ſecurity. Diſperſed aſunder, they lament and attend death: aſſembled together, they expoſtulate of their meanes and life: one while conceiuing a glimmering of ſome ſmall hope, another while deiected with vtter deſpaire: Sometimes at the ſight of their deareſt beloued, mooued to pity; but much oftner ſtirred to rage, for reuenge; and many of them, euen by way of compaſſion, ſlew their deareſt Wiues & Children, to rid them from their future miſeries.

(14) Agricola hauing made euery where a deſolation and ſilence, withdrew his Army towards the [a] Horreſtians, where taking hoſtages for their fidelity, ſent the Admirall of his Nauy to ſaile about the North Coaſts of Britaine, who with ſtrength and ſtore tooke the Seas; their terrour gone already before, himſelfe with eaſie and gentle iournies diſpoſed his foot and horſemen in their Wintring places, and planted Garriſons vpon the Borders betweene Glota and Bodotria. And his Nauy with proſperous winde and ſucceſſe arriued at the port [a] Trutulenſis.

(15) Thus, after many conflicts, about the ſpace of one hundred thirty ſix yeeres from Iulius Cæſars firſt entrance, the vtmoſt limits of Britanny, and the Iles of the Orcades lying on the North ſide of it, were by the valour and induſtry of Iulius Agricola firſt diſcouered, and made knowne vnto the Romans: and the South part of the Ile, in the fourth yeare of the raigne of Domitian, (being the year of our Sauiour eighty ſix) reduced into a ſubiected Prouince, the gouernment whereof was euer annexed and appropriate to the Romane Emperours themſelues, and not at the diſpoſition of the Senate, as other prouinces were

(16) This State affaires in Britanny, Agricola ſignified by letter, without any amplifying termes to Domitian the Emperour, who (after his manner) with a cheerefull countenance and grieued heart, receiued the Newes, being inwardly pricked with feare and diſdaine, that his late counterfet Triumph of Germany (wherein certaine ſlaues bought for money, were attired, and their haire dreſſed as Captiues of that Country) was had in deriſion, and iuſtly skorned abroad; whereas now a true and imperiall victory of ſo many thouſand enemies ſubdued and ſlaine, was currant and famous in euery mans mouth: as being indeed a thing dangerous, that a priuate mans name ſhould be exalted aboue his Prince. In vaine then had hee ſuppreſſed the ſtudy of Oratory, and other worthy politick Artes, thereby to keepe downe other mens reputation, if he ſhould in Military glory be diſſeiſed by another. And to be a good Commander of an Army, was to be aboue priuate eſtate, that being a Vertue peculiar for a Prince, and therefore not lightly to bee paſſed ouer. With theſe and the like incentiues his minde was tormented; yet thought he it beſt to diſſemble his malice, vntill the heat of his glory, and loue of his ſouldiers were ſomewhat abated. And forthwith he commanded for Agricola, Triumphall ornaments, ſtatue, honours, and what elſe vſually conferred in lieu of Triumph; hee yet remaining in charge, from whence, with the like policy alſo, hee was ſhortly diſplaced. For Syria, by the death of Atilius Rufus, lay deſtitute of a Lieutenant, and that place reſerued for men of great quality, Domitian gaue forth, was purpoſed for Agricola, and ſent him both his Patent, and Succeſſor into Britaine; who thereupon deliuered vp the Prouince in a peaceable eſtate vnto Saluſtius Lucullus, and returned to Rome.

(17) Where the life of Domitian was now grown vnmeaſurable vaine. The ſurname Germanicus he aſſumed to himſelfe, for ſome ſmall ſeruice therein done. The Moneths September and October he changed into the names of Germanicus and Domitianus, becauſe that in the one he entred his Empire, and in the other was borne. He cauſed his Statue to be made in gold, and commanded, himſelfe to be called GOD. His cruelty euery way matchable to his pride. The Senatours and Nobles vpon ſmall ſurmiſes he murdered: many new tortures hee inuented: Confiſcations and Baniſhments, were fauours, not puniſhments. Amongſt all which, the Chriſtians bare a part, whoſe Second Perſecution this Tyrant raiſed and began. The great Euangeliſt Iohn hee baniſhed into the Ile of Patmos, where hee receiued his Reuelations from Ieſus Chriſt, appearing vnto him in no leſſe Maieſty then Daniel before time had ſeene him in his viſions, and both (after a ſort) in one and the ſame manner: their Viſions alike, and almoſt to the like end: For as Daniel ſaw a Lion, Beare Leopard, and Monſter with Ten horns perſecute the Iewes Gods people, and to fall before the Stone cut without hands, which brake into powder the Image of their Tyrannicall Gouernment, to giue place to the peaceable Birth and Kingdome of Chriſt; ſo Iohn ſaw one Beaſt compacted of theſe foure, mouthed like a Lion, footed like a Beare, ſpotted as the Leopard, and horned for number and power with the Monſter, retaining their Tyranny in raiſing Perſecutions in the Church of Chriſt, and clouding with Idolatry Nerua Emp.

Ann. Do. 98.

HItherto haue we purſued the ſucceſsion in the Britiſh monarchy, together with the Inuaſions, attempts, and ſucceſſe of affaires for the Conqueſt of this Iland, vnder the firſt twelue Emperours of Rome: And that from ſuch writers, who though they were moſt fauourable Regiſters of things done by the Romans, yet had they beſt meanes to know, and publiſh their Hiſtories with warrantize of truth. But after the death of Domitian, died many Records, and the Prouinces proceedings (eſpecially thoſe that moſt concerne Britaine) left vncertaine; and therefore are neither with the like largeneſſe proſecuted, nor with the like authority auouched. And were it not that theſe Romane Emperours ſucceeding, did onely continue the ſucceſſion of our Britiſh Monarches, many of them might be quite omitted; as neither themſelues, nor deputies, allies, or enemies once ſpoken of concerning our affaires; and the Gouernment of this Prouince, during thoſe times, ſo maimed and defectiue (in reſpect of any warrantable relations) that hardly a method can bee obſerued to the fitting of a continuall Hiſtory. Yet as we finde it, let vs haue liberty to deliuer it, and rather to expoſe Truth in the meane attire that time hath left her, then by diſguiſing her in richer roabes to abuſe the World, and make her ſeeme nought elſe but a conterfeit, as Plutarch in the life of Pericles hath complained.

TRAIAN.

Chapter XVI.

Traian. Emp.

An. Do. 99.

NTo Nerua ſucceeded Vulpius Traian in the Romane Empire; borne neere vnto Siuill in the Territories of Spaine: of a noble family, but was much more ennobled in himſelfe for his princely endowments, which moued Nerua in his life time to adopt him into ſo high a calling, and the whole Senate after his death ioifully to confirme his Election; and ſo often to honour him with the title of the Moſt Excellent Prince in publike dedications, as on the Coine aboue.

Sextus Aurelius.

Traian raiſed the Romans to the higheſt glory.

(2) Hee raiſed the Romane Empire vnto the very higheſt pitch of glory, and ſpread the power of their Command into the largeſt circuit that euer before or ſince had or hath beene poſſeſſed. For the Kingdome of Dacia he ſubdued; Armenia, Parthia, & Meſopotamia made ſubiect; Aſſyria, Perſia, and Babylon conquered; paſſed Tigris, and ſtretched the confines of the Roman Empire, vnto the remoteſt dominions of the Indies which neuer before that time had heard of the Roman Name. And indeed, if we looke vpon his politicke managing of the gouernment, he may ſeeme (in compariſon of others) a right worthy, memorable and louely Prince, of much affability, and Familiarity euen with his inferiours, and of ſuch cariage towards his Subiects, as he himſelfe would wiſh his Prince (he ſaid) to vſe towards him, if he were a Subiect. A great obſeruer alſo of Iuſtice, inſomuch that when he inueſted any Pretor, in giuing him the Sword, he commanded him to vſe the ſame euen againſt his owne perſon, if he violated Law or Equity. But yet againſt the good Chriſtians he vſed neither of both: nay hee ſtirred vp their Third Perſecution, wherein Ignatius and many other worthy Saints of God, receiued the Crowne of Martyrdome, in ſuch cruell manner, as that his other vertues are much clouded by that taxation: for mollification whereof, he was compaſsionately intreated by Plinius Secundus his Tutor; whoſe Epiſtles to that purpoſe are yet extant.

Dion Caſſius. The third perſecution of the Chriſtians. Euſeb. Eccl. hiſt. lib. 3 cap. 30.

(3) The Iewes in his time roſe vp in armes againſt the Gentiles, and in Cyrene, Aegypt, and Cyprus, ſlew a great number: againſt whom Traian ſent his Captaines with forces ſufficient, and in diuers parts of the Empire put the Iewes to death, in ſuch infinite numbers, as that Maſſacre is accounted the greateſt Execution that euer had beene in the world, God ſuffering this their puniſhment to light vpon them for their infidelity and obſtinacie againſt his Chriſt.

Iewes made war againſt the Gentiles;

Traian his ſlaughter vpon the Iewes the greateſt that euer was.

(4) Finally, after his Conqueſts in the Eaſt, returning towards Rome, at Seleucia in Aſia the leſſe, himſelfe was conquered by the ſtroke of death, by a fluxe, the ſeuenth day of Auguſt, after he had raigned nineteene yeeres, ſix moneths, and fifteene daies, the yeare of our redemption one hundred and eighteene and, of his age ſixty foure: whoſe aſhes brought to Rome, were incloſed within the Crowne of a goodly Pillar wrought of one intire ſtone, containing one hundred forty foot in height.

Dion Caſſius. Polychr. lib. 4. cap. 13.

(5) Of ſtature he was bigge, of complexion ſwarthy; thinne of haire both head and beard, a hooked noſe, broade ſhoulders, long hands and a pleaſant eye, whoſe liuely Image was borne in Triumph after his death, and that in moſt glorious and pompous manner, in celebration of his great renowne and fame attained in his life.

(6) How ſilent ſoeuer writers haue beene for this Emperours affaires in this our Iland, yet it is to be thought that vnto this, as well as vnto other Prouinces both Propretors, Lieutenants, Preſidents, Pretors, and Proconſuls were ſent, and euery City to haue their municipall Magiſtrates. The Pretor that yearely proclaimed ſolemne Seſsions, wherin himſelf ſate aloft vpon a high tribunall ſeate, and guarded with his lictors about him in great eſtate, did execute his authority throughout his owne iuriſdiction, and determined all cauſes brought before him, where rods and axes were prepared for the common people, that were enforced to receiue a new Ruler euery yeere. And ſurely as this yoke of bondage was grieuouſly borne of euery Prouince, vpon whoſe necke, it was impoſed and laid: So the Britaines vnderwent the weight of that ſubiection with ſuch vnwillingnes, that in the time of this Traian, they reuolted and rebelled, though preſently ſurpriſed, as it is euident out of Spartianus.

Rowardus in Pro. tribunal.

(7) The care that this good Emperour had for the weale of his ſubiects is proiected by his prouidence in making wayes paſſageable from place to place, whereof remaine many teſtimonies by thoſe his Cauſeies drawne with wonderfull diligence, euen thorow the whole Iland; which now, though diſmembred and cut in peeces by the Country people, where-thorow they paſſed, yet doe many remnants thereof remaine, eſpecially in paſtures, or by-grounds out of the rode way, with bankes ſo high, that euidently they ſhew themſelues. Of theſe Cauſeis Galen writeth as followeth: The waies (ſaith hee) Traian repaired by pauing with ſtone, or raiſing with bankes caſt vp ſuch peeces of them as were moiſt and miry: by ſtocking vp and ridding ſuch as were rough and ouergrowne with buſhes and briers: by making bridges ouer Riuers that could not bee waded thorow: where the way ſeemed longer then needed, by cutting out another ſhorter: if any where by reaſon of ſome ſteepe hill, the paſſage were hard and vneaſie, by turning it aſide thorow eaſier places: now in caſe it was haunted with wilde beaſts, or lie waſte and deſert, by drawing it thence thorow places inhabited, and withall laying leuell all vneuen and rugged grounds.

Galen lib. 9. cap. 8. Metho.

Along theſe Cauſeies the Emperour cauſed to bee ſet little pillars or Columnes, with numerall Characters cut in thē, to ſignifie how many miles was from place to place. Of theſe Sidonius Apollinaris writeth thus:

Antiquus tibi nec teratur agger;
Cuius per ſpatium ſatis vetuſtis
Nomen Cæſareum viret columnis.

Breake not the ancient Cauſeies ſtrong,
Whereon the Columnes ſtand along,
Nor names of Cæſars doe not wrong.

Spartianus. Hadrianus of an admirable memory.

(3) His firſt buſineſſe for the Empire, was rather a care to hold ſecurely what was gotten, then by enlarging the bounds to endanger the beſt: and therefore leſſening the Compaſſe, and bettering the ſtrength, he planted his forces along the Riuer Euphrates, and aſſigned that for the Eaſterne limits, leauing out India, Armenia, Media, Aſſyria, Perſia, and Meſopotamia, as Countries too remote for the Romanes to hold to their profit. By which his doings other Prouinces tooke occaſion to reuolt, thirſting after Liberty, and among others the Britaines (as euer moſt impatient of Seruitude) attempted alterations, whoſe Lieutenant Cneus Trebellius (Succeſſor to Iulius Agricola) could not ſo gouerne his Souldiers which were growne out of diſcipline, and by long reſt farre out of Order, but that they fell at variance among themſelues, and diſquieted the moſt peaceable of the Britaines by their licentious maners.

(4) The Northerne Inhabitants, that were more at liberty, and imboldned by their Bogs and Rocks vnacceſſable, ſet themſelues to withſtand their wrōgs, to whom alſo many others ioined their affections and forces, whereupon ſome bickering inſued with loſſe and blood; to repreſſe which Iulius Seuerus was ſent by Hadrian: but ere hee could ſettle the Commotion, was againe recalled and imployed iu Syria, to ſuppreſſe the Iewiſh rebellion.

Iulius Seuerus ſent to ſuppreſſe the Commotions of the Britaines.

(5) Theſe ſtirres here ſtill continuing, the Emperour tooke it to be of ſuch importance, that he reſolued in Perſon to addreſſe for Britanie, which he performed in his third Conſulſhip; the yeare of Chriſt one Hadrian himſelfe came into Britain to ſuppreſſe rebellion.

One hundred twenty foure, attended on by three Legions: of which, his Army for this exploit was then compoſed, as appeareth by his money in the entrance of his life, fixed in memory of this vndertaking: With theſe hee encountred the Northerne Riders, recouered ſuch Holds as they had taken, and forced them into the Woods and Mountaines, whither the Romane Horſemen without danger could not purſue them. But perceiuing the Aire too ſharpe for the Romanes conſtitution, and the Soile rough and of leſſe profit then the reſt, hee made a Fortification or ſtrong Wall of Earth; which (as Lampridius ſaith) did continue on the weſt from Ituna, (that is, the Riuer Eden in Cumberland neere Carleil) vnto the Riuer Tina, or Tine at Newcaſtle in Northumberland, in the Eaſt; and was no leſſe then Eighty miles in lengh. This Wall (ſaith he) was made of ſtakes driuen deepe into the ground, and bound together in the manner of an hedge; and with Turfe and Earth intermured as a Rampire or Bulwarke, to defend the Incurſions of the wilder Britaines and ill Neighbours, that daily moleſted the peace of the Romanes. Hadrian his worke finiſhed, and the Prouince reduced to the obedience of the fatall Gouerneſſe Rome, at whoſe feet he laid againe the name of Britaine, (as appeareth in the firſt Reuerſe of his Coine, placed in the fronture of this Chapter) triumphantly returned to Rome, and for his honourable aduenture and Expedition had his name inſcribed vpon his Coine with this addition: THE RESTORER OF BRITANNIE.

(6) Neither after this ſeemed the Southerne Britaines greatly to contend, but patiently bore the yoke of ſubiection, which Time and Cuſtome had made leſſe painfull, the rather for that they ſay themſelues to ſtand in neede of the Romanes helpe againſt the inroades of their owne Countrimen, whoſe cruelty was now as much feared, as in former times the Inuaſion of Strangers: whereupon they conformed themſelues more willingly to the Romane Lawes, both in Martiall and Ciuill affaires: which were then principally directed by Licincius Priſcus, who had beene not long before imploied by Hadrian in the ſeruice of Iewry, and was at this preſent Lieutenant of Britaine.

Licinius Priſcus Lieutenant of Britaine. Hiſt. magn. Brit. lib. 3. cap. 1.

(7) This Iewiſh warre happned in the eighteenth yeere of the Raigne of Hadrian, who ſuddenly aſſailed and ſlew where they came, both Romaines & Chriſtians: for reuenge whereof, beſides an infinite number of them ſlaine and tortured, their City Ieruſalem was alſo raced euen to the ground, and another built, but not altogether in the ſame place, and the name therof changed to AELIA: the Iewes vtterly baniſhed thence, and as Ariſtion Pelleus writeth) not lawfull for them to looke towards that City nor Soile, no not through the Chink or Creuice of a dore: And vpon the Gate that leadeth towards Beth-lehem, hee cauſed a Swine to be ingrauen; a Beaſt by their Law accounted moſt vncleane, and by them abhominable.

(8) But as this Emperour was exaſperated againſt the Iewes, ſo was hee gracious and fauourable to the Chriſtians, and the rather at the requeſt of Quatratus, a Diſciple (as is ſuppoſed) of the Apoſtles, who wrote vnto him concerning them; and of Ariſtides a learned Philoſopher of Athens, who made an Apologie for their defence; ſo that the Perſecution then in practiſe was forbidden by Hadrian in a publicke Edict; who (as Lampridius writeth) was minded to haue built a Temple to the ſeruice of Chriſt, had not ſome diſſwaded him therefrom. In extremity of ſicknes hee deſigned Caſar, Lucius Ælius, whoſe Coyne wee haue hereunder expreſſed: A man deare to his Emperour, if we conſider at how great a rate hee bought for him the acceptation of the Commons and Military men: And how ſhort a time the blaze of that Honour continued: for hee died ſo ſoone, that Hadrian himſelfe had wont to ſay,

(9) When hee had raigned in great honour and loue the ſpace of one and twenty yeeres, fiue moneths, and fifteene daies, hee died, the eighth or tenth of Iulie, of a dropſie: which maladie ſo tormented him, that willingly he refuſed all ſuſtenance, and languiſhed away through faintneſſe. Hee was of perſonage tall, and very ſtrong, of a good complexion and amiable countenance, wearing the haire of his head and beard long, and died aged ſixty two, the yeere of our Lord God, One hundred thirty nine.

ANTONINVS PIVS.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Antonin. Pius Emp.

Lollius Vrbicus Lieut.

An. Do. 139.

NExt vnto whom succeeded Antoninus, (for his many vertues) surnamed the Pious: and by the Senate, Father of his Country. This man did not onely equall his Adopter and Predecessours, in wisdome and other princely qualities, but was also compared, for his peace and policie, vnto Numa Pompilius the second King of Rome, who for his renowned gouernment, is so famously in their Histories recorded. His birth was in Lombardy, the son of Aurelius Fuluius, and Nephew to Titus Aurelius Fuluius, that had beene Consul, and held other Offices of dignity and State. The whole time of whose Raigne was so spent in peace, that small remembrances remaine of any martiall affaires: yet such as we finde in Brstannie we will deliuer.

Antoninus raigned in peace.

(2) At his first entrance into the Empire, about the yeere of Christ, One hundred thirtie nine (as appeareth by the money minted in memorie of the reduction of Britaine) the Northerne Britaines in that part of this Ile began to stirre, and made inroads into the Prouince, notwithstanding the Rampire or Wall that Adrian had made. Against whom Lollius Vrbicus Lieutenant heere vnder Antoninus, brought his power, and with some skirmishes put them backe: taking from the Brigantes part of their Land, as a Mulct, for the waste they had done to the Genounians, a Prouince adioining vnto the Brigantes, whose people had put themselues vnder the Emperours protection. Which done, he repaired the Wall with stronger Fortifications; or (which is more probable) raised vp another not farre from the same, to double the defence: for (saith Iulius Capitolinus) Lollius the Legate to Antoninus, ouercomming the Britaines, built another turfe Wall to diuide the Prouince, and to impeach the incursions of the barbarous. Notwithstanding the honour of this seruice (as is testified by the ancient Panegyricke) was (by one Fronto) attributed wholly to Antoninus the Emperour himselfe: who, although absent and in his Palace at Rome, yet sitting as it were at the Helme of a Ship, did command and direct the enterprise, and therefore had right to the glory thereof. This wall also (as Clarenceaux coniectureth, hauing seene it so tracted in an ancient Chorographicall Chart) was drawen from the Riuer Tine vnto Carleil: but Time and warre haue worne it now away.

(3) In the meane while a new insurrection was kindled among the [a] Brigantes, that annoied some of the Romane Confederates. But by the discretion of the Generall, it was quenched before it came to flame: for vpon the first rumour of the Reuolt, Lollius marched thither with part of his Armie, commanding Seius Saturnius, Admirall of the British Fleet, to waffe vpon the North of the Iland, both to defend the Coast from danger, and also vpon occasions to further the Land-seruice, if need were: by which meanes, the Brigantes were easily reduced to obedience, euen by the presence onely of the Lieutenant, who for his good seruice done in Britaine, during the short time of his imploiment there, obtained the surname Britannicus. This may, by the first figure in the face of this Chapter (being in the third Consulship of this Emperour) be coniectured to haue hapned in the yeere of Christ one hundred forty one; and by inscription of the last Coine in that ranke, it is manifest that there was some other expedition against Britaine the yeere following.

(4) I cannot omit, though not directly pertinent to our purpose, the care that this good Emperour generally had for the distressed and persecuted Christians (who, no doubt by his bounty, enioied much tranquillity heere in Britaine also) in whose defence hee wrote to his Deputies in Asia, and published an Edict against their Accusers, the effect whereof (from Eusebius) is this:

Antoninus Pius a great defender of the Christians

Eusеb. Eccles. hist. lib. 4. cap. 13.

The Edict of Antoninus for protection of the Christians.

" (5) The Emperour Caesar Marcus Aurelius Antoninus Augustus, Armenicus, Pontifex Maximus, " fifteene times Tribune, thrice Consul, vnto the Commons of Asia sendeth greeting. I doubt not but the " Gods themselues haue a care that wicked persons " shall be brought to light: for it much more doth " appertaine vnto them, then it doth vnto you, to " punish such as refuse to yeeld them worship. But " this course which you take, doth confirme them " whom you persecute, in this their opinion of you, " that you are impious men, and meere Atheists; " whereby it commeth to passe, that they desire in " the quarrell of their God rather to die, then to yeeld " to the wils of such as you are, and to embrace your " forme of Religion. Let it not seeme vnseasonable to " call to your remembrance the Earth-quakes, which " lately happened, and which yet are to your great " terrour and griefe; because I vnderstand that in " such like accidents you cast the enuy of such com- " mon misfortunes vpon their shoulders, whereby " their confidence and trust in their God is much the " more increased: whereas you being still ignorant of " the true causes of such things, doe both neglect the " worship of the other Gods, and also banish and per- " secute the seruice of the Immortall God, whom the " Christians doe worship; and you persecute to the " death all the embracers of that Profession. In the " behalfe of these men many of the Prouinciall Presi- " dents haue written before vnto our Father of famous " memory: to whom he answered, that they should not " bee molested, vnlesse they were proued to haue " practised Treason against the Emperiall State: and " touching the same matter some haue giuen notice

" vnto

"vnto me; to whom I haue answered with like moderation as my Father did before: And by this our Edict doe we ordaine, that if any hereafter bee found thus busie in molesting these kinde of men without any their offence, we command that hee that is accused vpon this point, be absolued, albeit he be proued to be such a man as he is charged to be, that is, a Christian: and he that is his Accuser shall suffer the same punishment, which he sought to procure vpon the other.

Iulius Capirol. Antoninus person and vertues.

This Edict was promulged at Ephesus in the Generall Councell of all Asia: so fauourable was this good Emperour to the true Professours, and (indeed) to all sorts of men, hauing that Apothegme of Scipio Africanus rife in his mouth: That he had rather saue one Subiects life, then kill a thousand Enemies.

(6) He was of Stature tall, of a seemly presence, in countenance Maiesticall, in maners milde, of a singular wit, very learned and eloquent, a great louer of Husbandry, peaceable, mercifull and bounteous; in the last of which vertues, he so much exceeded, that therby he set going wholly his owne priuate estate & demaines. whereat when his Empresse much repined, he told her, that when hee vndertooke the Title and State of an Emperour, he then did forgoe the interest and proprieties of a priuate Person: meaning that a Prince is not much to respect his priuate wealth, so as the publike wealth and welfare of the State may bee aduanced. In fine, this large Eulogie and praise is fastened on him, that neither in his youth he did any thing rashly, nor in his age any thing negligently: In which honourable course, hauing raigned twenty and two yeares, (some say twenty three) seeen moneths, and twenty sixe daies, he died of a feuer at Lorium the seuenth of March, the yeare of his life seuenty fiue, and of Christ one hundred sixty two.

MARCVS AVRELIVS.

CHAPTER XIX.

Marcus Aurelius Emp.

Calphurnius Agric. Lieut.

An. Do. 162.

FRom the vertuous exampie of the good Emperour Pius, proceeded a branch of no lesse towardlinesse and fruitfulnesse, Marcus Aurelius, Antoninus, Verus, Philosophus, (for by so many honourable names is he remembred:) and although hee sprung not from Pius, as from his natiue roote, yet was hee his adopted Sonne, and graffed into his Stocke and alliance by the Marriage of his daughter Faustina: Hee was the Sonne of Elius Verus who died Prætor, and whose Pedegree is brought from Numa Pompilius, the second King of Rome; and his Mother was Domitia Camilla, daughter of Claudius Tullus.

Iulius Capitol. Lucius Verus chosen Cæsar.

(2) This man chose to him for his Associate in the Empire, Lucius Verus, the sonne of Lucius Ceionius Commodus, whom Pius had adopted (but died before him,) and therefore this Verus was respectiuely commended vnto Aurelius; betwixt whose natures and conditions was as much oddes, as betwixt Day and Night; The one very moderate, louing, and industrious; the other proud, careless and cruell: the fruits whereof, the poore Christians felt, whose chiefest pillars, Polycarpus, Bishop of Smyrna, and Iustinus Martyr, an excellent Philosopher, with infinite more, were put to most cruell deaths; and by him the fourth persecutiō of Gods Saints was begun: whose licentious and bloody life, lasting in Authority the space of nine yeares, was cut off by an Apoplexy in the presence of Aurelius being then in expedition towards Germany, whose Coine we haue here expressed as we finde it minted with his face and reuerse.

(3) Aurelius the Emperour following the warres against those, who there reuolted, was inclosed about with his enemies, called the Quadi, and suffered great mortality both by Pestilence, and much more by want of water, whereby himselfe and Host were almost consumed: At which time many Christian Souldiers being in his Campe, and commanded (as Ionas was) to call vpon their God; they fell prostrate on the ground in prayers, and obtained of him so plenteous a shower of raine; as therewith after fiue daies extreamest drouth and thirst, the whole Army was refreshed, and the Quadi contrariwise by Thunder & Lightning were quite dispersed and ouerthrowne.

Aurelius obtaineth raine by the Christians praier. Eutropius. Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 5. Acts and Monuments.

(4) This wonder (saith Eusebius) is reported euen by those Historians, who fauoured not Christianity: and the prudent Epistle of the Emperour himselfe, (which hee wrote to the Senate for confirmation of this miracle, yet extant) doth warrant the same: wher upon he both mitigated the rage against Christs Professours, and (by testimony of Apollinaris) named that Legion of the Christians, for an euerlasting remembrance, The Lightning Legion.

Capitolinus. P. Orosius. Tertullian.

(5) In his Raigne Calphurnius Agricola was sent Lieutenant into Britaine, where the inhabitants sought some alterations of the State, sore repining at the oppressions of the Romanes. But the Surname Agricola reuiuing the remembrances of their former ouerthrowes, so daunted their Courages, that at the presence of the Generall, who came amongst them to preuent all occasions, they gaue ouer their intended enterprise: for which, and for many other his policies there vsed, he worthily deserued great commendations, but for the most part) the glory of all such seruices seruices was attributed to the Emperours themselues; and the paines in attemping, and perils in obtaining, did commonly breed nothing but disgrace and enuy after victory, to those by whom it was atchieued. Yet besides the stories, the memory of his being heere Lieutenant, is deliuered to posterity, by this inscription, once erected in the Picts wall, an Altar to the Gaddesse Suria, and now preserued by Sr. Robert Cotton of Connington, Knight barronet, amongst other Monuments of like quality.

So also Lucius Verus, (whom this excellent Emperour had in the yeere 162. as appeareth by his Coine of Concord, set in the entrance of his life, elected his College in the Empire) who to supply the defect of merit in himselfe, tooke from the Conquest of Auidius Cassius, & other his Captaines in Armenia, Parthia and Media, the Trophies of their victories, with which he filled vp his Title, and adorned his Money, expressed in the beginning of this Chapter.

(6) About these times, albeit other things went not so happily with Britaine, as might haue beene wished, yet one felicity then befell her, which did both counteruaile her owne calamities; and ouerpoize the good fortunes of all other Nations: and that was the blessed rest of the Gospell of peace in this warring and vnpeaceable Kingdome, a great part thereof being gouerned at that time by King Lucius, surnamed Leuer-Maur. For that was the policie and ancient custome of the Romans (as Tacitus saith) to vse euen Kings themselues for their instruments, to bring the people into bondage. And Antoninus Pius ending warre, permitted Kingdomes to be gouerned by their owne Kings, and Prouinces by their owne Comites (as saith Capitolinus.) This King disliking the Paganisme and Idolatry of his people, (though, as wee haue shewed, among many of them the truth of Christs Doctrine was both taught and embraced, euen from the first planting thereof) and being incited both by the exemplary life and piety of the Christians, and also by the manifest miracles wrought amongst them, and encouraged moreouer by the fauourable Edicts of the Emperours in their behalfe, and by the good affections and forwardnesse of their Deputies heere, Trebellius and Pertinax; he gaue leaue to their Religion by publike warrant, and was the first Christian King in the world, and Britaine the first prouince that embraced the Gospell by publike authority, as Sabellicus saith.

(7) This Lucius (as before we haue touched) to be better furnished with Christian Laws for himselfe and subiects, Missa legatione ab Imperatore Romanorum & à Papa Romano Eleutherio, (as Nennius saith) for in this purer age the Church was so humble, to vaile (as farre as might be) her actions in the Imperiall licence, sent two learned Clerkes, whose names were Eluanus and Meduuinus, skilfull in the Scriptures, to Eleutherius Bishop of Rome: whose Reply to his most godly Demand (because the fauourers of the Papall Authoritie either doe doubt it, or altogether deny it) I haue thought good heere verbatim to insert, as my selfe haue found it, in a most ancient Manuscript, amongst the authenticke Records and Constitutions of the Citie of LONDON.

Nennius: Lucius & Leuer-Maur doe both signifie Great Brightnes.

Cambden. (9) The date of this Epiſtle (as by ſome other Copies it appeareth) being the yeare of the ſecond Conſulſhip of Commodus and Veſpronius, may giue great light and ſatisfaction to ſuch as are curious to know the truth, and to reconcile the differences of our Hiſtorians, touching the time: That Conſulſhip being about the yeare of Chriſt one hundred and eyghty: which was at the beginning (if not a litle before) of Commodus his raigne; and therefore whereas ſom refer it to the one hundred ſixty ninth yeer after Chriſts Paſſion, it is apparant to be the only error of tranſcribers, who ſo writ in ſtead of one hundred ſeuenty nine after his birth; which was anno currente, the very time of Commodus being Conſul the ſecond time: and on this yeere agree both forrain and domeſtick writers of this matter. And albeit the very texture of this Epiſtle carrieth with it the true Character of Antiquity, yet becauſe our worthy writers, mentioning this Epiſtle, are charged of flat forgery (by ſuch who challenge to be Maſters in all ancient knowledge) we will adde ſomewhat, to waſh off thoſe falſe aſperſions, both from the Record, and from the mentioners thereof.

Parſons 3. Conuerſions. Part. 1. c. 4. Their firſt exception is, that the Latine Copy would doubtleſſe haue beene produced by them, if it had not been counterfeit. Whereto what need we anſwer, ſith now we haue produced it, and can produce as many, as there are Copies of King William the Conquerours Lawes, wherein it is expreſly repeated? The next is, that the Engliſh tranſlation of it differ each from others. A reaſon more childiſh then the former, ſith euery man hath a ſeuerall conceit of that he tranſlateth, and ſome times the very Originals, (by tranſcribers ignorance or omiſſion) cauſe variety of tranſlatiō, as may appeare in the variæ lectiones of this Coppy prefixed. The laſt, but moſt ſaucy and ignorant exception is, that Ibidem. the places of Scriptures mentioned in the letter, are ſo ſottiſhly and ſenſeleſly applied, as is vnworthy to be fathered on the learned Eleutherius. Let vs therefore in a word; bring the diuinity of this Grand-cenſurer to the touchſtone: For Eleutherius proueth, firſt, that Kings are Gods Vicars in their kingdome, becauſe the whole Earth is properly Gods, & therefore Kings haue it not as their owne, but as his Lieutenants: next that as Dauid typically, and Chriſt impliedly, was by God annointed King, for the execution of Righteouſneſſe and Iuſtice, ſo euery godly King ought to make that the only end of his high honor, that being by God aduanced he might likewiſe aduance Righteouſneſſe, Iuſtice, and the ſeruice of God whoſe vaſſall he is: and that therefore Gods iudgements and Lawes are to be preferred by them, before all humane Lawes: with which they ſhould rule and cheriſh their godly ſubiects as their children: and protect them and gather them vnder one faith as Chriſt (their maſter) doth, who therefore compareth himſelfe, to a Hen gathering her Chickens vnder her wings.

The defects of which Princely duties Eleutherius moſt liuely expreſſeth afterward, in ſo proper applications, as if the learnedſt fathers on theſe places be duly examined, they wil be found no whit to exceed the apprehenſions of this Godly Biſhop. But if Robert Cowbucke, would haue caſt his eye on the moderne Popes, and their Cardinals applications of Scriptures, what would he then ſay? God made a greater light and a leſſe: therefore the Pope is as much greater then the Emperour, as the Sunne is bigger then the Moone. Chriſt ſaid to Peter, Kill and eat: therefore the Pope may excommunicate and depoſe Kings (yea and Kill them too for a need.) Peter ſaid, Behold two ſwords; therefore the Pope hath both temporall and Spirituall Iuriſdiction ouer the world. So God ſaid to Ieremy, he ſhould plant and tranſplant: therefore the Pope may diſpoſe and tranſpoſe all Kingdomes at his pleaſure. Chriſt to Peter, thou art Cephas, and Cephas is a head; therefore the Pope is head of the Church. Domini ſunt Cardines Terræ. The earth is the Lords: therefore the Cardinals are the Lords of the Earth. On ſuch pillers and applications of Scriptures, is the whole Papal greatneſſe founded, and yet thoſe late Scribes can ſcoffingly cauill at the godly applications of ancient Eleutherius. But to our purpoſe.

Cephas is a ſtone but all ſerues their turne.

(10) This Epiſtle with two other Preachers, Faganus and Damianus, ſent vnto King Lucius, did not a little encourage him in this godly purpoſe, in ſomuch that receiuing Baptiſme, the Temples of the Heatheniſh Flamins and Arch-Flamins euen thirty one in number, were conuerted into ſo many Chriſtian Biſhops Sees, whereof London, Yorke, and Carlein, now Saint Dauids, were made the Metropolitants of the prouince.

(11) A table remaining in the Pariſh Church of Saint Peter in Cornhill London, recordeth that the foundation thereof was by this King Lucius, and that Church to haue been the Cathedrall to that Archi-Biſhops ſee. There be that aſcribe the foundation of Saint Peters Chnrch at Weſtminſter vnto him; vnleſſe the places are miſtaken. Others affirme that this King Lucius likewiſe built a Church within Doner-Caſtle, to the ſeruice of Chriſt, endowing it with the Toll or cuſtomes of that Hauen. Differences there are about the time of his Raigne, but none at all for his conuerſion and eſtabliſhing of the Chriſtian Faith. As for thoſe who would haue this Lucius after his Baptiſme to ſaile into Gallia and other forren parts, where ſubduing many Pagans, he became the Apoſtle to the Bauarians, and that his ſiſter Emerita ſiftene yeeres after was martyred in the City Auguſta: I find thereof no warrant in any ſufficient writer; but in this all others agree, that he raigned twelue yeeres, and lieth buried in Glouceſter.

LIVIVS AELIVS AVRELIVS COMMODVS ANTONINVS.

Chapter XXI.

Ann. Dom. 181:

THe prudent life, and loue conceiued of ſo good a Father, gaue hopefull ſignes and ioyfull entrance vnto the Raigne of young Commodus, his ſoone degenerating Sonne; who had nothing from him but Nature, and that alſo much ſuſpected: The knowne Adulteries of Fauſtina, his Mother, ſtrongly confirming the opinion of Baſtardy.

Eutropius.

Commodus his qualities.

(2) At nineteen yeeres of age, he was inueſted Emperor, his raigne not long, but life as looſe & impious as the worſt: in ſottiſh pride equalling Caligula, for intemperance another Vitellius, and in cruelties a ſecond Domitian. Three hundred Concubins continually he kept, and vpon one of them, named Martia, ſo doted, that he wore her painted Picture vpon the outſide of his Garment; and inſtiling his money Herculi Commodiano or Romano, which was ſtamped about the yeere 193. Sometimes (Hercules-like) would he ſhew himſelfe roabed in a Lions skinne, bearing a Club in his hand in ſtead of a Scepter: other whiles wantonly clad in the habit of an Amazon woman; alwaies coſtly, but ſeldome ciuill.

Caſſiodor.

Commodus altered the Months.

(3) The Month Auguſt, he named Commodus, September, Herculeus, and December, Amazonius, according to his owne or his Concubins names. Commendable in nothing but for his skill in darting; and for ſome ſmall breathing of the perſecuted Chriſtians; which came not of himſelfe, but (as Xiphilinus writeth) by the mediation of Martia his beloued Concubine, who was found very fauourable to their doctrine: But the outragious wickedneſſe of his life made him ſo hatefull to all, as that his death was often plotted; and once by ſome of the Nobleſt, with whom Lucilla his owne Siſter conſpired; for which fact he put her, with the reſt of the conſpirators, to death. The Empire and all things els he weilded at the diſcretion of others; attending only his voluptuous pleaſures, howſoeuer the State or Prouinces fared vnder him.

Euſeb. lib. 5. cap. 19. Acts and Monuments.

(4) In Britanny the Northren Borderers brake thorow the Wall, and finding the Frontiers but weakly guarded, entred the Prouince, where ſuddenly they ſurprized the Roman Generall; and killing many of the Souldiers, ranged the Country, waſting (without reſiſtance) all where they went. Commodus at Rome, hearing theſe ſtirres in Britaine, rouzed vp his ſpirits, and ſent one Vlpius Marcellus to ſtay their fury; who with great difficulty forced them back beyond the Wall: and ſeeing the careleſſe ſeruice of the Souldiers, reuiued againe the ancient diſcipline of War; that by long eaſe had been left off by the Romans. The repreſſing of this incurſion (as it ſeemeth by ſome reuolt of the prouince) was about the yere of Chriſt one hundred eighty ſix, as appeareth by the monies of this Emperor ſet in the entrance of his life, at which time in memory of ſome worthy expedition and victory againſt the Britaines, he ſtamped them.

Vlpius Marcellus ſent Lieutenant into Britaine.

(5) This Lieutenant Marcellus is reported to be of a marueilous great temperance and ſtrange diet; for all the time of his aboade here he would eat no Bread, but ſuch as was baked in Rome, neither ſlept he more then would maintaine nature, whereby both his priuate buſineſſe and proiects for publike ſeruices were commonly diſpatched by night. Seuere he was in the execution of his place, not led by fauor of the perſon, nor ſtaid frō iuſtice by corrupted bribes, eſteeming Money only for neceſſity, & riches no further then made for publike good: But thoſe his vertues though now with vs they get him honour, yet then did purchaſe him Enuy with the Emperor. Who liued (ſaith Lampridius) for his ſubiects miſchiefe, and his owne ſhame: For Commodus hearing Marcellus daily commended, conſtrued his Praiſe to be his own Reproch; and doubting leſt he ſhould grow too high, thought good to crop him off betimes, and ſo ſent him Letters of diſcharge.

(6) The Army then feeling the raines looſe that ere-whiles had been borne with a ſtiffer hand, fell ſtraight to a diſordered mutiny, and therein proceeded with ſuch boldneſſe as they openly refuſed any longer to acknowledge Commodus for their Soueraigne: At which time Perennius was a chiefe Agent and ſo ruled all in Rome for the Emperor, as that he entertained a hope to be himſelfe (in time) an abſolute and ſole-ruling Emperor; and hauing now fit occaſion offered to ſpread his power further, he toke vpon him to redreſſe theſe diſorders (whilſt Commodus wallowed in his laſciuious idleneſſe) & diſplacing ſome worthy Captaines at his owne pleaſure, ſent other perſons of meane reſpect or parts, to command thoſe Legions in Britaine, that formerly had been led by Noble Senators and men of Conſular dignity; whereby greater miſchiefe began to accrew and ciuill diſſenſions daily to burſt forth; the Army ſcorning their vpſtart ypstart Commanders: and the Captaines insulting ouer the Souldiers, (of all sides) the Aides so disquieted, that had the Britaines followed the aduantage, the whole Prouince at that time had been in hazard to be lost: vpon which distractions no lesse then fifteene hundred Souldiers at once went out of the Land to Rome to complaine their wrongs vnto Commodus: where charging Perennius to bee the stirrer of these troubles, with an intent thereby to raise himselfe or his sonne to the Emperial Maiesty (a string that cannot be touched without sound in a Soueraigns eare) they were so farre heard and beleeued that Perennius was to them deliuered to be put to death, which accordingly they accomplished with all extremity.

Perennius deliuered to the British Souldiers to be put to death.

(7) Then was sent for Lieutenant into Britaine Heluius Pertinax, a man of low birth, but high Fortunes, being risen from the state of a common souldier, to the dignity of a Consull, and had been Commander before that time ouer many Prouinces. Him had Perennius discharged from Britaine, and with disgrace sent and confined into Liguria where hee was born, whose credit Commodus again with such fauors repaired, that he gaue him the Sirname Britannicus, which glorious title also himself had take about the yeere 184. At his first entrance and ariuage, he assaied by rough hand to suppresse the rebellions of the Army, & aduentured his person so farre in some tumults that he was stricken downe and left for dead, but afterwards proceeding with better aduice he composed those troubles with most seuere punishments of the principall offenders: wherby notwithstanding he presently grew odious to all, and thereupon so far feared his owne safety, that he made suit to the Emperor to be discharged of his Lieutenātship Lamprid. Heluius Pertinax sent Lieutenant into Britaine.

(8) Vnto him succeeded Clodius Albinus in the Gouernment of Britain, a man of great birth, forward enough, & fortunate: for which the Emperor Commodus either vpon fauour or feare, did honour him with the title of Cæsar, though Albinus semed vnwilling to accept of the same, & afterwards discouered his disposition more openly in approuing the Ancient and free state of the Romans. For vpon a false report of the death of Commodus, he made an Oration to the Legions in Brittany in fauour of the Senate, whose kind of Gouernment he much commended and preferred before the rule of the Emperors: Of which his affection when Commodus vnderstood; he sent Iulius Seuerus in all hast, to take charge of the Army: and Albinus retired himselfe from all publike affaires, vntill the death of Commodus, which not long after followed, & was wrought vpon this occasion: He hauing assigned many to die, and to that end had inrolled their names in a scrol, it chanced Martia his Concubine to light one the same, wherein she saw her selfe allotted for one: and reuealing this his purpose to others that stood in the same list, and in the like danger; they together thought best to secure their own liues by his death: and with poison, stabs and strangling made him away, when he had liued one and thirty yeeres, foure moneths, & viciously raigned thirteen yeeres, eight moneths, and fifteen daies, the yere of Christs natiuity one hundred ninety and three: the night before the Kalends of January.

(9) Of stature he was indifferently tall, of a fine constitution of body, very faire of complexiō, with cleere eyes & golden locks, neither in person nor in Princly parts resembling his Father. How ioifull the death of this Tyrant was both to People and Senate, their execrations pronounced against him, and their assemblies in the Temples to giue thanks for their deliuerance, do manifest, as is at large reported by Lampridius, who wrote his life, & is stiled by all, Hostis humani Generis, The enemy of Mankind: The very name of the Diuell.

PVBLIVS HELVIVS PERTINAX.

Chapter XXI.

VPON the person of this Heluius Pertinax (of whom we are now to speake) Fortune (as it seemeth) meant to make the full experience of her power, and from a very slender foundation to raise the building of her owne Pride: His birth was but poore, and parents as meane, whose Father from a seruile condition got to be free, and traded in Mercery wares for his liuing: himselfe educated according to his birth, rose by degrees to mount the Chaire of all worldly glory, and to be the Monarch of the whole world.

An. Dom. 194.

Dion. Cassi. lib. 37.

(2) At first a Schoole-Master, and taught the Grammar; next a Ciuill-Lawyer, and pleaded causes in Courts; and lastly, a Martiall-man, and serued in Campe: where Fortune attended him with such fauourable successe, that within fiue daies, out of the ranck of a common Souldier he was preferred to bee Captaine of a Cohort, in the Syrian warres against the Parthians; which ended, he was imploied into Britaine, Misia; and Germany, and also had charge in chiefe of a Fleet vpon the Flemish Seas: he serued likewise in Dacia with such honourable proofe of his valour; as that wise Emperour Marcus Aurelius held him in high esteeme, and afterward made him Senator of Rome. Then was he assigned Gouernour of all Syria and Asia, the greatest place of Credit and reputation that might bee; and from thence sent againe into Britaine, chosen out as the principall man of note for to stay the Commotions there raised against Cōmodus; where in the Field he was left for dead: but thence also returning after he had gouerned foure seuerall Consular Prouinces, was created Proconsull of Africa, and immediately after Prefect of Rome. Neither yet made he his ſtand there, (though the greateſt of any ſubiectiue degree,) till he had mounted the Throne of Maieſty, and obtained the command ouer All: which fell to his lot by the death of Commodus; and by the meanes of Martia, Ælius Latus, and other conſpirers of his end.

(3) For the Murther being done in the dead of the night, Latus in great haſte repaired to Pertinax his lodging; at whoſe ſight the Old man in bed, expected nothing but Death, as ſuppoſing him ſent from Commodus to no other end. But Latus ſalutes him by the vnexpected name of Emperour, carrying him with acclamations vnto the Army, and in the morning to the Senate, where, of them all with great ioy, he was confirmed Auguſtus.

Heluius Pertinax made Emperour.

(4) His firſt buſineſſe was to bridle the licencious liues of the Pretorian Cohorts & iniuries done by them vnto the Romane Citizens, which gained him ſuch hatred, that it was cauſe of his death: For theſe men growne diſordered and lawleſſe in the raigne of Commodus, held themſelus wronged, to be now locked vnder the conſtraint of Lawes ciuill Gouernment: and theſe only enuied the peace & proſperity of Pertinax, whereas all the Prouinces abroad at the very hearing of his Election, and fame of his Imperiall vertues, laid aſide their weapons, and deſired to imbrace peace with a Prince ſo nobly qualified.

Heluius Pertinax enuied by the Pretorian coborts.

Sabellicus.

(5) The firſt that conſpired againſt his life, was one Falco; whom notwithſtanding he freely forgaue, yet puniſhed certaine Souldiers thereto acceſſary: whereupon the reſt aſſembling themſelues in tumultuous and furious manner, with their drawn ſwords inuaded his Palace. Hee ſeeing their purpoſes ſought no eſcapes, but deſcending the Palace, met them in the baſe Court: At whoſe preſence and Maieſty they were much amazed, and a while made a ſtand: vnto whom with great grauity, and without ſhew of any feare, he thus ſpake vnto them.

Heluius Pertinax aſſaulted by his Souldiers.

Heluius Pertinax his ſpeech to his Souldiers.

" (6) Souldiers and Companions, if you come to " kill me, (as I thinke you doe) you ſhall therein per- " forme an act neither valorous nor otherwiſe very " commendable for you, no, nor any way grieuous " vnto my ſelfe; for euery mans life hath his limit, & " to mine, by Natures courſe, the laſt period cannot " be farre: Or thinke you that I feare death, who now " am ſo ripened for it, and haue already gotten the " very height of all renowne vpon my name? Surely " you are deceiued: but at this I grieue; that my life " and ſhort time of Gouernment; which I had deuo- " ted to the good of all; ſhould ſeem ſo diſguſtfull vn- " to any, as to deſerue a violent and haſtned death, e- " ſpecially by you, who are by office, the Guarders of " my Perſon: you (I ſay) whoſe charge and Oath is, " to ſecure your Soueraigne from perill, and now ſeeke " to ſheath your Swords in his breaſt, ſhall either " leaue a Teſtimony of my bad life deſeruing it, or " brand your places with ſuch ſtaines of Treaſon, as " Time ſhall neuer weare away. And what I pray is " mine offence? for maintaining your Lawes? Why, it " was the charge your ſelues impoſed vpon me. Are " Lawes too ſtrait? Surely, not to the vertuous, who " are euen a Law vnto themſelues: Are they need- " leſſe? why then were they made? and being made, " why ſhould they not be executed? If the death of " Commodus grieue you, was I the cauſe? If hee were " made away by Treaſon, your ſelues are conſcious of " my innocency. And this I aſſure you, in the word " of a Prince, that his death ſhall depriue you of no- " thing, which you require, if you require nothing " but that which is honeſt and iuſt. My life, whilſt I " was a Subiect, was ſpent with you in Warre, now (be- " ing your Soueraigne) is conſumed with cares for " your Peace: which if you free me of, by taking it a- " way, my troubles ſhall thereby end, but your con- " ſcience ſhal begin to grone vnder the guilt of blood, " and perchance bee touched with too late Repen- " tance.

(7) His words were ſpoken with ſuch a mouing grauity, and vnmoued reſolution, that the formoſt in the attempt gaue backe, and were aſhamed of their audacious enterpiſe; but the reſt furiouſly driuing forward, one Truſius with a Lance ran him into the Breaſt, whereupon Pertinax couering his Head with his robe, quietly yeelded his body to the traiterous ſtrokes of them all, and ſo died that poore, old, and innocent Emperour. The yeeres of his life, ſaith Iulius Capitolinus, were ſixty, ſeuen moneths, and twenty fiue daies: But Dio, Spartianus and Herodian accounteth them to extend to ſixty eight; Euſebius to aboue ſeuenty: The like diſagreement there is for the ſhort time of his Gouernment: for Euſebius ſaith that hee raigned not fully ſix Moneths: Eutropius ſaith but three; Iulius Capitolinus and Aurelius Victor, eighty fiue daies: Dio, Herodian and Spartianus, two Moneths and twenty eight daies: how long ſo euer, thus he liued, and thus he died, the fifth Calends of Aprill.

CHAPTER XXII.

An. Do. 194.

THE ſtate of man continually attended with vncertaine chance, apparantly doth ſhew, the weake condition that nature enioyeth, and with what vnſureneſſe the ſeat of maieſty is poſſeſt, as is ſeene by the precedent Emperour, who ſitting at peace in his Palace at Rome, renowned, beloued, and guarded with the ſtrengths of Europe, Aſia, Africa, Aegypt, and Greece, was notwithſtanding ſurpriſed and ſlaine at noone day, by a Band of Souldiers, not much exceeding the number of three hundred, and all eſcaping vnpuniſhed; the deed was ſo ſuddaine, and mens minds ſo diſtracted, that it could not be fully beleeued, though witneſſed by ſight.

(2) The Senators miſtruſting each others, abandoned the City, and the Citizens in ſecret ſecured themthemſelues, all in an vprore: but none for reuenge of the treaſon: The murtherers, in as great feare as any, fortified their Campe, and with weapons in hand ſtood vpon their guard: But ſeeing all in a maze, and nothing againſt them attempted, a further boldneſſe (the like before neuer heard of) enſued: for by a Common Crier they made Proclamation for the ſale of the Empire, to any man that would giue them moſt: which offer was readily accepted by Didius Iulianus (a man of much more wealth then honeſty of life, and a Lawyer, ſaith Euſebius) who with larger promiſes then euer were performed, obtained the Imperial Diadem.

Aelius Spartianus Proclamation for the ſale of the Empire.

Didius Iulianus buieth the Empire of the Romane Souldiers.

(3) His birth was in Millan, the ſonne of Petronius Didius Seuerus, his mother Clara Emilia, and himſelfe brought vp in ſeruice vnder Domitia Lucilla, the mother of Marcus Aurelius, by whoſe fauours, he was firſt made Queſtor, next Edile, and then Pretor in Rome. In Germanny as a Captaine he ſerued vnder Aurelius, then was he appointed Gouernour of Dalmatia, Bithynia, and of the Lower Germany, and was Conſul with Pertinax, and afterwards Proconſull in Africa. Theſe were his riſings and meanes to that Maieſty, which not long he kept: for hated in Rome, and not approoued abroad, Syria choſe for Emperor their owne Generall, Peſcenius Niger, Germanie, Septimius Seuerus: By whoſe conſent Clodius Albinus leader of the Britaine Army was firſt elected Ceſar, and then his fellow in the Empire; whereby the Ægle the faireſt of Birds became monſtrous, and in one Body bore three Heads.

(4) For Albinus at that time hauing gotten againe the gouernment of Britaine, where erecting his owne Statues and ſtamping his picture in his Coynes, as thou ſeeſt heere vnder inſerted, gaue great ſuſpition that he intended to be a Competitor, and with his Army afoot meant to haue gained the Emperiall ſeat it ſelfe, by aduantage of Septimius forces abſent in ſuppreſſing of Peſcenius; which to diuert, inforced Seuerus vntill better opportunity to declare Albinus his Companion, for he much more feared him then either of the former: becauſe Didius, in Rome, and Peſcenius in Antioch conſumed their times in banquetting, and vnmartiall diſports, whiles Albinus managed his office moſt ſouldierlike, and was highly eſteemed and honoured of them.

Albinus Gouernour of Britaine, a Competitor for the Empire.

(5) Seuerus haſting toward Rome, was met in Italy by Ambaſſadours from Didius with faire offers of peace, and poſſeſſion of halfe the Empire: but refuſing compoſition, & making ſtill forward, the Senate that ſo lately declared him a traytor, now proclaimed him an Emperour: And the Souldiers vnſatisfied of the couenanted promiſes, and in hope to purchaſe fauour with Seuerus, ſlew their Chapman Didius in his Palace, the Calends of Iuly, being but fiue daies after he had done himſelfe as much for Pertinax, when hee had raigned, as Eutropius ſaith, ſeuen months: Spartianus ſaith but two, and Dio ſixty ſix daies: the yeere of his age fifty ſeuen, and of our Sauiours appearing in our fleſh, one hundred ninety and foure.

Chapter XXIII.

Sept. Seuerus.

An. Do. 194.

Euerus hauing by this bloudy accident of the giddy multitude, gained with more facility then he expected, the fatal ſeat of gouernment, it was his next care to ſuppreſſe Peſcenius by force, and Albinus by falſhood; whoſe actions and liues ſince they happened with this Emperour, and ended with his ſword, I will record together, beginning with Caius Peſcenius firſt, ſince firſt he fell vnder the fortune of this man.

This olde man in the yeere of Chriſt one hundred ninety foure, was elected Emperor by Acclamation of the Syrian Army, of which (though begun but by a handful in reſpect of all the other imperiall forces) he had good hope, ſince to the honor of that Goddeſſe he dedicated the firſt marke of his Soueraignty; the minting of his money, as in the entrance of this Chapter is ſeen.

A perſons he was of ſeemely ſtature, louely feature and faire skinne, except his Neck, which differing ſo far from the reſt gaue him the ſirname of Niger: his complexion was ruddy, his Body fat, his voyce ſo piercing, that it would be heard a mile off: and his haire for more ornament long hee wore in reflected curles vpon his ſhoulders. A commendable ſouldier and well bearing himſelfe in the military offices he vnderwent. In his Lieutenancy abroad he was ſeuere, and at home he ſo well acted his part when he was Conſul, as in his Clemency and Iuſtice hee ſeemed emulous of Pertinax. Thus all his life he enioied the goodneſſe of his merit and fortune, and had not his ambition begun, where his yeeres were ending, had ſo parted: For no ſooner had he put on the Robe Emperiall, but Seuerus. defeated Peſcenius his Army at Cizicum, purſued him to Antioch, & tooke him at Euphrates, ſending to Bizantium his head a Trophy of the Conqueſt; and to his wife, children, and followers (vnto whom at firſt this Victor granted baniſhment) in the end denied life.

(1) Now as ſoon as Seuerus made his approach neer Rome, he gaue command that the Pretorian Cohorts ſhould attend him diſarmed; which done, he vehemently checkt them for their proditorious trechery againſt Pertinax, and pronouncing ſentence, depriued them both of name, honour, and armes of Souldiers, and baniſhed them from Rome, and the circuit thereof for one hundred miles diſtance: which act of his wonne him ſuch reputation, that in Rome the whole Story of Pertinax his ruine, and Seuerus his aſpiring to his Throne, was at large portraited in an excellent peece of worke, of ſolide molten braſſe, as Herodian relateth, though he aſcribeth the occaſion of it, to a dreame of Seuerus.

(2) Thoſe two obiects Didius and Niger, who gaue ſome hinderance to Seuerus his beginning, being thus defeated of their high hopes; the third, which was Albinus, ſeemed now a more dangerous cloud, which would altogether ouer-caſt his brightneſſe & glory, if it were not diſperſed or blown back in time: and therefore to make faire weather with him, hee created him Cæſar and his Succeſſor in the Empire, but afterwards his good fortunes thus ſwelling in the Eaſt, and himſelfe ſtill courted by Ambaſſadors from all parts, with their tender of ſubiection, hee began to grow proud, and to diſdaine any Copartner in State: and thereupon firſt ſecretly ſought the deſtruction of his Cæſar; which failing, he then proclaimed him Traitor and Enemy to Rome.

Albinus made Succeſſor in the Empire.

His death practiſed.

Proclaimed Traitor. He wageth warre againſt Seuerus.

(3) Clodius Albinus brought into theſe vnexſpected dangers, prepared his ſtrengths, and with the choice of all Britaine entred France, and neere vnto Lions tooke the field againſt the Emperour; but with no better ſucceſſe, then Peſcenius hand done in Aſia the leſſe, in the ſame place (as Herodian, Eutropius and Spartianus affirme) where Darius was firſt ouerthrowne by Alexander. The Armies ioining, a bloody Battaile was fought, which through the great proweſſe of the Britains went at firſt ſo ſore againſt Seuerus, that being beaten off his Horſe, deſpairing of Victorie, and almoſt of Life, caſt off his Imperiall Robe, and flying, ignobly hid himſelfe. Latus one of Seuerus his Captaines, kept alooſe all this while, of purpoſe as was thought, to bring the Emperour to ruine; and now vpon report that hee was ſlaine, came on moſt furiouſly with his forces, in hope of winning both the day, and the Empire to himſelfe: whereupon the Emperour drawne againe into the field, the day was his by the meanes, but not the meaning, of Latus: whom on attainder of his Treaſon he afterward put to the ſword. That day a great part of the flower of Britaine was ſlaine, together with their valiant Leader Albinus, a Captaine of exemplary Seuerity and Martiall diſcipline, a great admirer of Hannibal and Marius; for the Scipio's he thought them rather fortunate then valiant: and in the time of his ſeruice in this Iland, there was no toile which hee commanded his ſouldiers, but himſelfe would beare therein a part, euen in carrying of burdens on his Backe: and yet ſo farre from vaunting of his valour, as that when an Hiſtorian would haue recorded his noble Acts, he willed him to write of theirs who were already dead, whom he need not to flatter; holding it a foppery to write of thoſe, of whoſe fauour or wrath the Inditers ſtood in hope or feare. Being ſuch a one, no maruaile if Seuerus ſo feared him, as he did, which he ſhewed euen after hee was ſlaine, by putting incredible numbers of great Perſonages both in the City and Prouinces to death, with this one Pretence, for all, that they wiſhed well to Albinus.

Albinus vanquiſhed by Seuerus.

After this ouerthrow Seuerus forthwith ſent Heraclianus hither, to keepe the reſt of the Britaines in quiet, and to be Lieutenant in Albinus his roome, as Spartianus writeth: Of whoſe affaires therein little remembrance is left, onely it ſeemeth by a Coine of Seuerus minted in his ſecond Conſulſhip, which fell in the yeere of our Sauiour one hundred ninety eight, and about the period of this his laſt Competitor, that the Britaines gaue not at firſt their ſeruice and ſeruitude to this man, vntill he had made the purchaſe of it by his ſword; the brand of which he hath left to poſterity in figuring the goddeſſe Victory ſeated vpon ſpoiles, and writing in a ſhield, Victoria Britan.

Spartianus.

Vnto this Lieutenant, Virius Lupus ſucceeded Preſident of Britaine, as Vlpian the Lawyer termes him, and was about the yeere of Chriſt one hundred ninety ſeuen, as appeareth by this Inſcription erected at Olinaca amongſt the Brigantes, in memory of the reedifying of that place by this Emperor and his eldeſt Son, then firſt deſigned Cæſar, by which the time is diſcouered, and in this ſtone inſerted.

Virius Lupus made Preſident of Britaine.

(4) This man ſtrengthned the Prouince eſpecially in the North, with many ſtrong Caſtles, repairing many places ruined either by fire or fury of the bordering ſwords: Of which Lauat Ræ*, where the firſt Cohort of the Thracians lay, was one, as appeareth by this altar there erected to the goddeſſe Fortune, and ſince remoued to Coningtun the houſe of Sir Robert Cotton Kinght Baronet in Huntingdonſhire.

* Bowes vnder Stanmore in Richmondſhire.

He warred againſt the Meats and North Britaines with ſuch bad ſucceſſe, that he was forced to redeeme his peace with mony, and was ſo much weakened by loſſe of his men, that he ſent to Rome for preſent ſupply, with relation of his great danger, and the Enemies ſtrength: which newes touched Seuerus to the quick; and notwithſtanding his yeeres (ſixty at the leaſt) and gout wherewith hee was continually grieued, yet would he vndergoe that iourney in perſon him-himselfe, aswell to satisfie his owne vaine glorious humours, as to traine his Sonne Bassianus from his licentious life, wherein he wallowed idly in Rome; who together with his brother Geta, accompanied their Father into Britaine.

Bassianus why brought into Britaine.

(5) The Britaines then hearing of the Emperors approach, sent him their Embassage for intreaty of peace, wherby the Iland might haue been setled and secured without blood; but the old man (saith Sabellicus) had so vnsatiable a desire to beare the glorious Sirname of Britannicus, that he preferred warre, and accepted not their proffered subiection.

(6) Seuerus thus entred Britaine, Geta was appointed to remaine in the South of that Prouince, & to gouerne those parts that stood in quiet, assisted by Aemilius Papinianus the famous Lawyer, whose Tribunall seat was held in Yorke; himselfe & Bassianus marching further into the North against the Meatæ and Caledonians their neighbours, both which bare themselues boldly vpon the aduantage of their Countries, their waters brackish, & vnholsome drinke for their Enemies, the aire sharpe & contagious to their constitutions, and the soile it selfe so pestred with Loughs, Bogs, Meares, and Mountaines, that the Romans were forced to make way by continuall labour, in cutting downe Woods, in building of bridges, and in draining of Meares, so that by distemperature of diet, cõtinuall labour, contagiousnesse of Aire, and afflictions by sickenesse, fifty thousand of them perished, & that without Battaile, saith Dio: many Souldiers also, whose spirits were spent, and through feebleneſse could not keepe ranke in their march, were for meere pitty slaine by their fellowes, lest they should fall into the hands of their Enemies.

Aemilius Papinianus a famous Lawyer.

Fifty thousand of Seuerus army dead through toylesome labor and sickneſse.

(7) These miseries, notwithstanding old Seuerus indured and fought many Battailes, but (as Sabellicus confesseth) euer with more difficulties to the Romans then to the Britaines, and yet in some small skirmishes he went away Victor, and continued his courses with such resolution, that lastly the Caledonians thought good to intreate their peace; which vpon these cõditions was granted: first, that they should forthwith lay aside all hostile Armes, without any further resistãce: next, that they should deliuer into the Romans Possession, those Countries that were next abutting on their Prouince: and lastly, that thence-forth they should liue in quiet, attempting nothing against the publike Peace.

(8) The State thus setled, Seuerus bethought himselfe of some further meanes to secure the Prouince, by building many In-land strengths anew, and repairing those with Stone and Cement which formerly were but of Turfe and earth, as appeareth by this Inscription found in the Ruines of one of his workes neere vnto the Riuer VRE, in the County of Richmond erected.

And neglecting the vttermost and vast Northerne parts of this Iland, drew a Wall or Fortification, which might serue as a Rampire and diuision betwixt the sauage & more ciuil people, stretching it selfe thorow the whole Iland, euen from Sea to Sea; that is, from the Bay of Itun (otherwise Solweyfrith) in Scotland, to the doore of Tine or Tinmouth, containing in length One hundred thirty and two Miles, as Sextus Aurelius Victor, Eutropius, and others account them, & by * some more. This Wall he built of Turfes and Timber, strongly fenced with Bulwarkes and Turrets, neere vnto (if not vpon) the foundation of Adrians wall, the tract whereof thorow the Countries of Westmoreland and Northumberland, is more pleasing to be seene, then easy in word to be expressed. For which his Acts thus heere atchieued about the yeere of grace two hundred and eleuen, he assumed to himselfe his much desired Sirname Britannicus Maximus, causing in his owne and his sonnes Coines that inscription to bee stamped.

And now retired to Yorke, he left his eldest sone to finish this worke of warre by him begun, as being rather allaied then altogether ended.

(10) Bassianus thus set in the one part of the Iland as Geta was in the other, sought rather to gaine the affections of his Army, by a loose liberty to doe what they list, then to manage the trust reposed on him, by the restraint of Martiall Discipline, and action of Military duties: hoping by such his plausibility and indulgences to purchase to himselfe their best concurrence for the obtaining of the Empire; which he so thirsted after, as that hee often tampered with them to raise him, by the fall of his father.

Bassianus disloyalty.

(11) The Caledonians vnderstanding the dissoluteneſse of his Campe, and the want of a better Captaine, suddenly assailed the Romans, putting many to the sword, and taking great booties, (which they dispersed among their neighbours) without any regard of the obligation of their former Couenants: whereat the testy old man was so much disquieted, and so farre enraged to reuenge, that he gaue an expresse charge to make a generall Massacre, without exception of any; vsing in his speech to his Souldiers, these verses bowrowed out of Homer:

increasing by the disturbances of the Enemie, and the daily disloialty of Bassianus his sonne, insomuch that despairing of life, hee called his Councell and Captaines before him, and vnderlaid with pillowes, he thus addressed his speech.

Seuerus his speech to his Counsell and Captaines.

That therefore my care for the welfare of " this State may suruiue my selfe, and bring forth " the happy fruits thereof when I am withered, this " shall be my last and onely requeſt, that you will e- " uer assist my sonnes, both with your counsell and " aide, whereby they may rule according to Lawe, " and you obay according to Right, that so in you " both, the good of the Empire be aboue all things re- " spected. With which words hee ended both his " speech and his life.

(15) This Emperor by Historians is rancked with the best, both for his warres, wherein hee was very fortunate, & for his wisdome in gouerning the Empire: and yet is he taxed very sharply both by Sabellicus for sundry vices, & by Eusebius for stirring vp the fift Persecution of the Christians in the tenth yeere of his Raigne. In which Ireneus the learned writer, among many others, suffred Martyrdome: howbeit, towards his end, he became more milde to them, as saith Saint Ierome; as also that he was a diligēt reader of the excellent workes of Tertullian, whom vsually he termed his Master.

(16) This Emperour was by birth an African, to which Country his affection & graces were so much, that the illustrious City of those parts, recorded vpō their coyne his many fauours by this Inscription, INDVLGENTIA AVG. IN CARTH. and inshrined him amongst the Gods of that Nation. Hee was the sonne of Geta, his mother Pia Fuluia: himselfe rough, cruell, couetous, and ambitious, and his nature relishing too much of the Punick craft and simulation: otherwise a most expert Souldier, and a worthy Prince, more battels hee fought, and more victories obtained, then any other that euer had ruled before him the Romane Empire. In a word, of vertues and vices so equally composed, that lastly this grew into a customed speech: It had been good that this Emperour had neuer beene borne, or being Emperour, that hee had neuer died. Beda.

Seuerus his description.

(17) Of stature he was tall, and of a comely personage, his countenance seuere & representing Maiesty, his beard white and long, and the haire of his head he wore vsually curled. He was very learned in the Mathematicks, a good Philosopher, an eloquent Orator, and of a deep sounding voice. Hee raigned eighteene yeeres (saith Eusebius) by Dion Cassius, Herodian, and Eutropius, seuenteen yeeres, eight months, and odde daies. He died in Yorke, the fourth day of April, in the yeere of Christ two hundred and twelue, not so much of sicknes, as of discontent and greefe, or (if our British writers may bee credited) of a deadly wound giuen by Fulgence, Captaine of the Picts, who as the Monke of Chester saith, was brother to Martia, the first wife of Seuerus and mother of Bassianus. His second wife was Iulia Domna the mother of Geta, (though some thinke that she was mother to both) a woman of a surpassing beauty, and an earnest instigator of the two Bretherens reconciliation, had she not bin blemished with other vices, as after we shal heare.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Bassianus Caracalla.

Septimius Geta.

An. Do. 212.

Asianus Caracalla, and his Brother Septimius Geta, together were declared Emperours by old Seuerus in his life time, and both of them by their father surnamed Antoninus, a name verie gracious in the esteeme of the Romans; the elder so stiled about the yeere of Saluation two hundred and fiue, and the yonger foure years after, (as it appeareth by the mintage of their moneys;) were approued and applauded by people and Senate, and of all men saluted and acknowledged for Emperours. Bassianus the Elder, stiling himselfe Britannicus Maximus, as it should seeme, was admitted his Fathers fellow Emperour at Yorke, at his residing there, to quiet Northern Britains; wherein also hee gaue him the name Antoninus; for so implieth that famous Law, bearing iointlie the names of Seuerus and Antoninus, enacted by them at Yorke, touching the interest and right that masters haue to the goods and possessions of their seruants. His mother, the first wife of Seuerus, was Martia a British Lady (say our British Historians, through Sabellicus doth iudg her to be an African) and himselfe better beloued of the Britaines for her sake, then for his owne.

Cod. l. 3. Tit. de rei vindicatione leget.

Geff. Monmouth. Sabellicus.

Geta was the sonne of the Empresse Iulia, a second wife, a woman of passing beautie and surpassing lust, who beeing perswaded (by some Oracle or dreame) that her husbands successour should be an Antoninus, lest her Sonne should lose his hope of the Empire, she importuned Seuerus to bestow the name of Antoninus also on Geta; who with it gaue him likewise the title of Cæsar, about the yeere two hundred and two.

Some say it was Seuerus his dreame. Sabellicus.

And to vnite the affections of his two sons, aswel as to eternise their memories, he minted their features vpon one Medall inscribing the one side ANTONINVS PIVS AVG. PON. TR. P. IIII. the other, P. SEPT. GETA, CAES. PONT. hauing the yeere before matched thē together vpon the reuerse of his owne mony, and incirculing their heads with this word, AETERNITAS IMPERI. as if the separation of their affections were the dissolution of his and the worlds Empire.

Herodian. Sabellicus.

(2 Vpon Seuerus his death, Antoninus Caracalla, hastning for Rome, proffered good conditions of peace to the Britaines, who long tired with warres accepted thereof, and hostages were giuen for conseruing the same. Whereupon the Empresse Iulia accompanied with both the Cæsars, departed hence, carying with them the funerall ashes of the deceased Emperor in a goldē Vrna to Rome, where they solemnly consecrated him a God: the ceremony whereof (because it concerneth so great an Emperour and Monarch of this kingdome) is not vnworthy the inserting.

In the Porch of his Palace was a bedsteed all of Iuory, dressed with richest bedding & furniture of gold, wherein was laid his image portratied to the life, but yet in manner of a sick man. On the left side sate all the Senators and Princes in blacke mourning weeds; on the right, all the great Ladies, cladde in white (which then was the mourning color of that Sexe.) The Physitians diligently comming to visit him, and feeling his pulse, as if he were aliue, doe signifie that his disease did still increase vpon him. This they all did seuen daies togetherr: at last, as if then hee were dead, all the prime of the Nobility carrie him in his Iuorie Bed to the * Forum, where all the Patrician youth, & Noble Virgins, incompassed him with most dolefull Hymnes and ruefull ditties. Thence againe he was remoued to Mars his field, where was erected a foure-ſquare frame of Timber, of a huge height and compaſſe, the ſtories ſtill mounting to the top with ſundry aſcents, richly beutified with ſtrange varieties of golde and purple ornaments, and images of great Art and price: On the ſecond of which aſcents, was placed the Emperours ſaid Bed and Statue, with infinite ſtore of ſweeteſt odours, brought thither from al parts of the City: which done, the yong Nobles brauely mounted on Horſebacke, rid round about in a kind of dance or meaſure, and another ſort likewiſe (who repreſented great Princes) in their coaches, wherupon his ſucceſſor in the Empire, firſt ſet fire to the frame, then forthwith al the people did the like on all ſides: and when the whole began to be on flame, an Eagle ſecretly encloſed within, was let flie out of the toppe; which ſoaring a great height, and out of ſight, the people followed it with ſhouts and praiers, ſuppoſing that therewith the Emperours ſoule was carried vp to heauen. And thus Seuerus, which before was a man of Gods making, was now become a God of mans making: and the more to preſerue the memory of his fathers glory, Caracalla erected a magnificent Edifice, which he inſtiled Seuerus his Porch, wherein with moſt exquiſite Art, and admired workmanſhip, were portraited all his Fathers warres and triumphs, atchieued here in Britaine or elſewhere.

Sabellicus.

(3) But preſently after, theſe two vngodly ſonnes of this new ſuppoſed God, ſo much emulated each others glory, that the deadly ſparkes of enuie, blowne a long time with the bellowes of their ambitious deſires, brake out into the flames of murther and blood, being brethren by one Father, but not by the ſame mother (as it is ſayd,) and in this only like, that they were both ſtarke naught, though both in contrarie kindes of Vices. And albeit the Empreſſe Iulia had ſought by all meanes to make peace betwixt them, both formerly, here in Britaine, and now, after their returne to Rome: yet the deſire of a ſole Soueraignty, had beene a long time ſo rooted in Baſſianus his heart (for which he had twice attempted his Fathers life, and ſo much haſted his death, that he ſlew his Phyſicians, becauſe they had diſpatched him no ſooner) could not indure an equall (much leſſe a confronter) in authority, and therfore in the Court & in the arms of the Empreſſe, he ſlew her ſonne Geta, in a time leaſt ſuſpected, when he had ſate with him in ſtate and diſdaine, the terme of one yeere and twenty two dayes.

Geta ſlaine in his mothers armes.

Herodian.

(4) And to cloak this fratricide with ſhew of conſtraint, firſt to the Souldiers, and then in the Senate, he accuſeth his brother to haue ſought his death, and that in defence of himſelfe he was forced to ſlay the other, and thereupon fled to the Pretorian Cohorts for ſafety of his life, as though further conſpiracies had been intended againſt him in the City; where at his return he commanded Papinianus the famous Ciuilian, to excuſe the murther in his Pleas at the Barre: which when he refuſed, he cauſed him to be ſlaine, as alſo al thoſe that had bin acquainted with Geta; wherby ſo many of the Nobility periſhed, that hee was thereby accounted another Nero in Rome: and by his fauorites, the name of Geta was raced out of all Monuments and Imperiall inſcriptions, as we haue ſeene ſome of them defaced vpon ſome Altar ſtones found here in Britaine.

Dio Spartianus.

Papinianus ſlaine for refuſing to defend a murther.

(5) Of nature he was ſubtile, and could well diſſemble with them whom hee feared, and make ſhew of loue where he deadly hated; alwaies fitting himſelfe to the humours of flatteries: Among the Germans, he would counterfait their gate and garments; In Greece, be like Alexander; bearing his necke ſomewhat awry; In Troy, would reſemble Achilles; alwaies ſo Camelion like, as the Romans (his followers) were therewith aſhamed. In a word, Caracalla (ſaith Dio) neuer thought of doing good, becauſe (as himſelf confeſſed) he neuer knew any goodnes.

Dio.

(6) And to fill vp the meaſure of all iniquitie, as one regardleſſe of humanity or ſhame, he married Iulia his mother in law, late wife to his owne Father (a ſinne (ſaith S. Paul) not to be named among the Gentiles) and by Sext. Aur. Eutrop. and Spar. reported vpon this occaſion. It fortuned that Iulia in preſence of Caracalla, either by chance, or of purpoſe rather, let fall the vaile which ſhe wore, diſcouering therby her naked breaſts and beauty, which was great; whereat the Emperor caſting his laſciuious eye and bewraying his affection, preſently ſaid, Were it not vnlawfull, I ſhould not be vnwilliag: to whom ſhe replied (without reſpect of modeſty) that all things were lawfull to him that made lawes for others, but was ſubiect himſelfe to none: forgetting at once both the murther committed vpon Geta her ſonne, and the ſcandals that accompanied ſo foule a ſinne, the pleaſure whereof they did not long enioy, both their deaths (by Gods vengeance) ſoone after enſuing.

Iulia her wicked ſpeech.

(7) For Caracalla remaining in Meſopotamia, and carrying (as it ſeemeth) a guilty conſcience, and ſuſpition of his life, ſent to Maternus, whom he had left Gouernour of Rome, to aſſemble all the Aſtrologers & Mathematicians (vnto which learned impoſters he alwaies gaue eſpeciall credit) and of them to enquire how long he ſhould liue, and by what death he ſhould die. Maternus hauing ſo done, wrot for anſwere, that Macrinus his Prefect of the Prætorium (then with him in his expeditiõs) went about to murther him. Which is thought rather in enuy of Macrinus to haue beene fained, then by any Aſtrologicall directions ſo giuen forth. This letter and others comming to Caracalla his hand, at ſuch time as he was buſie about his diſport, he deliuered them to Macrinus to reade, and giue him the report at his return. In peruſall wherof finding himſelfe to be accuſed of Treaſon, & fearing leſt by the ſequell he might be brought into greater danger, he incenſed one Martial a Centurion (whoſe brother the Emperour had lately ſlaine) to murther him; which was ſoone performed, and occaſion in the fields offered: for Caracalla ſtepping aſide from his train to eaſe nature, Martial, as though he had bin called, ran haſtily in without hinderance or ſuſpect, and with his dagger ſtabbed him to death; but being too late perceiued, was yet ſo haſtily purſued, that hee was hewed to pieces before his tongue could reueale the principal Traitour. Iulia his inceſtuous wife hearing of his death, with poyſon ſlew her ſelfe at Antioch, leauing her ſhame to her life.

(8) Antoninus Caracalla, ſaith Euſebius, raigned Emperour ſeuen yeares and ſixe moneths, but Herodian, Spartianus and Dio allot him ſixe yeares and two moneths: he died the eight of April, and yeere of Chriſt two hundred eighteene. The teſtimonies of theſe many Writers notwithſtanding, together with the place and circumſtances of his death, and the perſon by whom it was committed, the Britiſh Hiſtorians do contradict, reporting him to be ſlaine in Britaine, in Battaile againſt the Picts, by one Carauceus a man of a lowe and obſcure birth. But by this it may ſeeme, ſome vvounds receiued by him in thoſe Britiſh warres, gaue occaſion to that errour. He left a ſonne not by his inceſtuous mother, nor by Glantilla his wife, whom he exiled into Sicilia; but by a miſtris, whoſe name was Iulia Simiamira his coſen German, and indeede no better then a common ſtrumpet: which corrupt roots brought forth as bitter fruits, euen Heliogabalus, of whom hereafter we ſhall haue occaſion to write.

OPILIVS MACRINVS.

CHAPTER XXV.

Opilius Macrinus.

Diademenus.

An.Do.218. IN proſecuting our intended courſe, for ſetting downe the Acts and Liues of ſundrie Emperours, heereafter ſucceeding, I know I ſhal hardly ſatisfy my Readers, being no way able to giue cõtent to my ſelfe, in that, on the one ſide, finding very few remembrances concerning the ſtate of this our Iland, till the raigne of Diocleſian, the Hiſtory of that Interim may ſeeme impertinent to our purpoſe; and yet on the other ſide, conſidering how vnfit it is, that the Succeſſion of all our Britiſh Monarks ſhould be interrupted (that Royall Title being likewiſe annexed to thoſe other Emperours) I ſuppoſe it will be expected, that ſomwhat alſo be ſaid of them, though managing their affaires in places farre remote. It ſeemeth that the continuall ſtriuing for the Imperiall Diademe, and their neerer hazards at home, made them contented to giue Britaine ſome peaceable breathing, and ſo depriue vs of the Romane Records of thoſe times: which want if I ſhould ſupply out of our home-bred Britiſh Writers, I might be thought, not ſo much to repaire the ruines of our Monuments, as to heape more rubbiſh vpon them. And therefore (neceſſity ſo enforcing) I muſt craue patience, if I proceed to the reſt of our Countries Monarkes, though I cannot to the reſidue of our Countries Exploits and Affaires in thoſe daies.

An.Do.218. (2) Opilius Macrinus from obſcure and baſe Parentage, by fauour of the Emperour, without any notable deſert in himſelfe, firſt aſpired to the Office of a Prefect, and at laſt by the election of the Souldiers, to the Dignitie Imperiall. So farre from ſuſpicion of Caracallaes death; by the outward appearance of a ſeeming ſorrow, that he was held of all moſt free from the Treaſon, and the ſecond perſon worthy of their voice. For firſt, the Title was conferred vpon aged Audentius, a man of good ſort, much experience, and an excellent Captaine; whoſe wiſdome could not be drawne to aduenture his life vnder the weight of ſo vneaſie and dangerous a Crowne, but excuſing himſelfe by the priuiledge of his age, as far vnfit to weild the troubles (much leſſe to increaſe the glory) of the Empire, refuſed their offers, but with returne of as many thanks as they had giuen him hands or voices. Whereupon they againe conſulted and determined for Macrinus, which as willingly receiued, as Audentius refuſed: vnto whom they ſwore fealtie, but not long after failed in performance.

Audentius refuſeth the Empire.

(3) He made for his Cæſar, Diadumenus his ſonne, changing his name (a vſual cuſtome at their election) into Antoninus, becauſe that name was gracious among the Romans. The Senate at home confirmed all that the Armie had done abroad; vnto whom it ſeemed their right, as it were by preſcription, to haue the election of the Emperours.

Diadumenus appointed for Cæſar. Called Antoninus.

(4) His firſt expedition was againſt Artabanus King of the Parthians, that haſted againſt the Romans, for wrongs receiued by Caracalla deceaſed: but after three great and dangerous Battles, came to an attonement, and a peace betwixt them concluded. After this, as free from further troubles, he returned to Antioch in Syria, and there ſpent his time in Banquets, and other ſenſuall pleaſures, being drenched ſo farre therein, that the Armie began to diſlike his Gouernment, and to fauour young Baſſianus the ſonne of Caracalla, then preſent at Emeſa a Citie in Phœnicia, with Mæſa his Grandmother by his Mothers ſide, who there had built a Temple conſecrated to the Sunne, and therin ordained him a Prieſt; for which cauſe he was called Heliogabalus, that is to ſay in the Phœnician Language, The Prieſt of the Sunne.

Antoninus ſonne of Caracalla.

Antoninus called Heliogabalus, that is, A Prieſt of the Sunne.

(5) To this Temple in their vaine deuotions reſorted many of the Romane Souldiers; and ſeeing the beauty of the youth, allured Mæſa to bring him to their Campe: where knowne to be the ſonne of Caracalla, the Souldiers proclaimed him Emperour, and maintained his right againſt Macrinus; who after this reuolt, met young Heliogabalus in the Confines betweene Phœnicia and Syria, where he fought a bloudie Battle, and Macrinus forſaken of all, and driuen to flie; who with his ſonne haſting thorow Aſia and Bithynia, came laſtly to Chalcedon, where he fell ſicke, and was there, together with Diadumenus, put to death the ſeuenth day of Iune, the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation two hundred and nineteene, when hee had raigned one yeere, one moneth, and xxviii. dayes.

ANTONINVS HELIOGABALVS.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Antoninus Heliogabalus Emp.

An. Do. 219.

YOung Bassianus, surnamed Heliogabalus, the sonne of Caracalla before mentioned, thus elected, and prospering at his entrance, gaue hopes to his raisers, of many princely parts, and signes of those things that in sequele, by better proofe appeared to be only signes indeed: for nature had plentifully adorned him with the complements of her gifts, had his mind beene answerably furnished with vertue. But as the one was ouer-prodigall & lauish in his outward form, so was the other as sparing and defectiue in bestowing of her inward gifts: insomuch that both in mind and garment, he seemed to be that which in truth he was not. This Emperour, as appeareth by the reuerse of his money, tooke it no meane addition of honor to his Imperiall Dignitie, to be stiled, The Priest of the Sunne; which in the Assyrian tongue is called El, from whom he tooke the surname Elagabal.

(2) Assoone as hee had setled the Empire firme vpon himselfe, by the death of Macrinus, he began to discouer his own dispositions, and in wantonnesse, apparell, lightnesse and diet, to exceed any that had gone before him in Rome; and so farre differed from the manners of men, that modesty will not suffer vs to record his greatest vices.

Heliogabalus exceedeth in wickednesse all others before him.

(3) His apparell was rich, and most extreme costly, and yet would he neuer weare one garment twice: his Shooes embellished with Pearles and Diamonds; his Seats strewed with Muske and Amber; his Bed couered with Gold and Purple, and beset with most costly Iewels; his way strewed with the Powder of Gold and Siluer; his Vessels (euen of baasest vse) all Gold; his Lamps burning with no other Oile then the Balmes of India and Arabia; his Fish-Ponds filled with no other water then of distilled Roses; his Ships (in his Naumachies or Ship-fights) floted in a Riuer of Wine; his Bathes most stately built, and againe after they were once vsed, presently pluckt downe; his Plate of finest Gold, but neuer serued twice to his Table; his Rings and Iewels most rich, yet neuer worne twice; his Concubines many and chargeable, but not one laine with twice; his Diet so profuse, that at euery supper in his Court, was vsually spent a Thousand Pound Sterling: inuiting the chiefe Citizens to a Feast, he strewed all the Roomes with Saffron, as it were with Rushes, saying, That such Cattle were worthy of such costly Litter. Neere the Sea, with him no Fish was eaten: in the Land, no Flesh: whole Meales made of the Tongues of singing Birds and Peacocks, or of the Braines of most costly creatures, alwaies saying, That meat was not sauourie, whose sauce was not costly. And indeed so costly it was, that the reuenewes of Germany, France, Britaine, Spaine, Italy, Sicilia, Græcia, Asia, Syria, Ægypt, Arabia, and all the Ilands, were not sufficient to defray the charges.

(4) In his Progresse, six hundred Chariots followed him, laden with Strumpets, Boyes, and Bawdes, for whom he built a Stewes in his Court, wherein himselfe in the attire of an Harlot, made to them solemne and set Orations, terming them therin his Fellow-Souldiers, and Companions in Armes, with Instructions for them how to practise with most variety their filthy Luxuries. In regard of which kinde of actions, one doth make this doubt, whether were greater his boundlesse Prodigality, his stupendious Lechery, or his foppish Foolery: the last of which his Imperiall vertues, he gaue proof of, when he gathered in the City ten thousand waight of Spiders, professing that thereby he vnderstood how great a City Rome was: at another time, ten thousand Mice, and a thousand Wezels, which hee brought forth in a publike shew to the people, for some wise State-purpose, like the former. Aelius Lamprid. Herodian.

(5) In Rome he built a Temple consecrated to the Sunne, (like to that in Phœnicia, whereof himselfe was Priest) commanding the Christians therein to worship: as also a Chatter-house for women to meet and determine of their Attires; and brought into the Senate-house his mother Semiamira, allowing her a Voice among the Senators. In modesty I forbeare to write the particulars of his vn-manly libidinous filthinesse, adding only that which a iudicious Author speakes of him: Kings (saith he) as they haue greater power to sinne then other men, so haue they lesser safety in sinning then any man; for being set aboue others in the eye of the World, they are as Markes that are aimed at, and lie open to the shot of Reuenge. And so was the state of this Superlatiue Monster, whose owne Conscience still stung him, euen in the midst of his sweetest sinnes, and therefore euer expecting some violent end, hee prepared silken halters, richly wrought, to hang himselfe, if need were; and Golden Kniues to stab himselfe, or cut his throat; and built a goodly Tower of exceeding height, adorned with Gemmes and Gold of inualuable cost, that thence he might cast himselfe headlong, hauing these words oft in his mouth, That howeuer he dyed, his death should be pretious in the eyes of all men. But he failed of his hope, though not of his desert; for against him the Prætorian Souldiers suddenly arose, no wrong offred them, more then vnto others, but out of a Iustice in God, who repaieth sinne with sinne, and suffereth not such outragious wicked ones to escape vnreuenged.

(6) These breaking into his Palace, found him not in estate answerable to his calling, but hidde (for feare) in a homely place sutable with his dirty conditions: from whence with Acclamations thorow the streets of Rome, more like a Dogge then a Man, they dragged him with his mother saying, The Bitch and her whelpes must goe together: and after their fury spent, threw their bodies into the Common sinke of the City, and thence into Tyber, sinking them downe with great great ſtones, leſt the carkaſes caſt vp with the waues, ſhould either find buriall, or infect the aire. The Senate approuing all that was done, decreed that his name ſhould be obliterated out of all monuments in Rome, and neuer any Antoninus (a name before very gracious) ſhould rule againe their Empire: ſo odious was the remembrance of this Image af Ignominy.

(7) He was aged but foureteene yeeres when he became Emperour; by Herodians computation, he raigned ſix yeeres, and died at twenty: By Aurelius Victors he died at ſeuenteene, & raigned not fully three yeers: Euſebius ſaith, that he raigned fully foure: Onuphrius would haue him to liue eighteen yeres, & to dy the 8 day of March, Anno two hundred twenty three. Euſeb. Eccleſ. hiſt. lib. 6. cap. 20.

ALEXANDER SEVERVS.

Chapter XXVII.

Alexander Seuerus Emp.

An. Do. 223.

Before the death of Heliogabalus, his Coſin German Alexianus, by the working of his mother Mammea, was made his Ceſar; whoſe vertues daily increaſing with his age, gaue hopes to the better ſort of ſome happier times by his meanes: but ſo farre incenſed Heliogabalus (who hated nothing more then vertue,) and ſo dimmed his fame, that he often aſſaied to take away his life by trechery: But ſuruiuing him whom no man wiſhed to liue, he was with publicke bleſſings, and vnſpeakeable ioy elected Emperor; * his name they changed from Alexianus to Alexander, and his ſurname giuen of old Seuerus.

Lampridius ſaith, he was borne on the day that Alexander the great died, and had therefore his name. Sabellicus. Lampridius.

(2) He was the ſonne of one Varius, a Syrian borne, and of Mammea, ſiſter to Semiamira, though there are who ſay, that both the ſiſters, attending on their Aunt Iulia the Empreſſe, were gotten with child by young Caracalla, and ſo he father of Alexianus: howſoeuer, he was brought vp in learning from his childhood, hauing a naturall propenſion to all humane vertues, and diuine pieties: He was very skilfull in the Mathematicks, Geometry, Muſicke, Caruing, and Painting, & compoſed ſome Bookes alſo of Poetry: ſo great a louer of the liberall Arts, that he allowed the profeſſors thereof annuall ſtipends for their further encouragement: and that which moſt is, hee much fauoured the Chriſtians, from whom he tooke to himſelfe examples of life, and vrged their Precepts vnto others, and this one eſpecially * NOT TO DO TO OTHERS VVHAT VVEE VVOVLD NOT HAVE DONE TO VS. Their Chriſt he honoured (though as a Heathen man) and would haue had him conſecrated among the Romane Gods: Vnto whom he alſo was minded to haue built a Temple, had not his Idol-Prieſts hindred the ſame; but a place of their holy aſſemblies he allowed them by his Imperiall warrant: for when certain Vinteners or Victuallers laid claime to the place whereunto the Chriſtians reſorted to pray, he thus decided it, That it was much fitter that God therein ſhould be worſhipped, then belly-gods ſhould be pampered to ſurfet there. (A good document of a Heathen for ſome Chriſtians, who turne places conſecrate to Gods diuine ſeruice, into Sheep-Cotes, or to the like prophane vſes.) This good inclination of Alexander the ſonne, was vndoubtedly ſtirred vp by the inſtigations of Mammea his mother, who, as Euſebius witneſſeth, had ſent for Origen (the Chriſtian Doctour) from Alexandria to Antioch: by whom ſhe was ſo wel inſtructed, that Ierome giues hir the honourable Title of a moſt holy Woman.

Herodian; Sabellicus.

* Lampridius the trueſt relator of this Emperours acts: (for Herodian ſpeakes on ſpleene) ſaith, he cauſed this Chriſtian poeſie to be written all about his Palace, and ſometimes commanded by voice of a publike Crier. Lampridius. Sabellicus.

Alexander Seuerus incited to Chriſtianity by his mother Mammeaa Euſeb. Eccles. Hiſt. lib. 6. cap. 20. Ierome.

(3) Himſelfe, though young, ruled the Empire with great Wiſedome and Iuſtice: admitting onely ſuch for his Counſellors, as were men vncorrupt, ſage and learned, skilfull in the Ciuill Law, and experienced in Antiquities of elder times, and preferring none to any office ot charge by ſuite, but only by the commendation of each mans worth and fitnes for the place: In regard whereof, he cauſed Turinus (one of his Courtiers, who tooke money of diuers, with promiſe to procure the Emperours fauour in their ſuites) to be put to death by ſmoake, the Crier proclaiming, That hee had ſold ſmoake, and therefore with ſmoake he ſhould die, And likewiſe to cut off, in Lawyers their continuall ſelling of Iuſtice (the bane of all Common wealths) for a fee, hee granted a publike & ſet reward to ſuch as ſhould plead gratis. By which courſes, his ciuill affaires were nobly managed, and his warres likewiſe proued as proſperous: for he triumphed with great glory ouer the Parthians: The Germans alſo, who in furious manner had paſſed the Riuers Danuby and the Rhine, in many skirmiſhes he put backe, and forced them to their former obedience.

Sabellicus.

Bountiful and liberall he was both to the people & ſoldiers, as by the reuerſe of his coine aboue prefixed is ſeene, wherein is expreſſed the fourth Donatiuū and Congiarium, beſtowed by the bounty of this Emperour vpon the Souldiers and common people, of which Lampridius maketh mention in his life.

(4) But as Enuy euer attends perſons of Eſtate, and a deſire of change, breeds a diſlike of the preſent, ſo the Roman Legions growne farre out of order by the prodigious Gouernment of the laſt Emperour, proued now vnnaturall to their dread Souetaigne: whoſe warres drawing him into Germany, and thence hither into Britaine, he found ſome of his Souldiers here ſo tumultuous, that he thought fit to vſe exemplary ſeuerity towards them, whereupon they, being ſecretly secretly backt, (as is supposed) by Maximus (a potent man in the army, raised onely by the Emperours fauour) they traiterously assailed him, and together with his his mother Mammea, murthered him in a village then called Scilla, though others say he was slaine in Germany, in the City Mogunce, and some in France, no other cause mouing them, but onely his vertue; the eight day of March, when he had raigned (by Lampridius) thirteene yeeres and nine daies, aged by Herodian, and Iulius Capitolinus, twenty nine yeeres, three moneths and seuen daies, the yeere of our Sauiour, two hundred thirty sixe.

CAIVS·IVLIVS·VERVS·MAXI·EMP·

Chapter XXVIII.

Maximinus Emp.

CAIVS. IVLIVS. VERVS. MAXI. CÆS.

Maximus Cæsar.

An. Do. 236.

Aximinus, a man barbarous by birth and dispositon, (himselfe a Thracian, his father named Nicea, borne in Gotland, very obscure, his mother Ababa of litle better rancke) spent his youth in keeping of Cattell, the pouerty of his parents admitting no better maintenance: Yet afterwards his fortunes brought him vnto great aduancement, and that by working vpon the outward obiect of his person, being for shape and strength (if the reporter deserue credit) rather to be thought a vast Giant, then described for a goodly man: For Iulius Capitolinus affirmes his height to be eight foote and an halfe by Geometricall measure, & his body answerable in euery proportion, insomuch, as he did weare as a Ring on his thumb, the bracelet which his wife vsed to wear on her arme, a stature thought vncredible; and yet Iosephus, an Author of great credit, doth confidently record, that one Eleazer a Iew, accompanied Darius the Kings sonne of Persia vnto Rome, (sent by Vitellius to Tiberius for an hostage) whose height, as he saith, was fully seuen cubits, a measure surmounting this.

Iuli. Capitol. Maximinus of a huge stature.

Capitolinus calles it Dextrochertum being a broad plate of Gold set with rich Iewels, an ornament in vse amongst the Romane Ladies. Ioseph. Antiq. l. 18. cap. 6.

(2) This Maximinus increasing strength with growth, left his trade of Cattle-keeping, and resorted to the Romane Campe then in Syria, where for his admirall height, he was admitted by Septimius Seuerus into the ranke of a common Souldier, and shortly after, preferred to be one of his Guard. Bassianus made him a Coronell, and Heliogabalus gaue him the leading of certaine foot: but the last Emperour Alexander, aduanced him to be a Captaine of the fourth Legion, whose death notwithstanding he disloially practised, (of such force is the desire of Soueraignty which makes men forget all bonds of gratitude and loiall trust) and was thereupon by the Souldiers elected Emperour, with fealty sworne vnto him.

Maximinus his means of rising to preferment.

Herodian and Aurelius Victor say that this was done, Alexander yet liuing.

(3) The ignoble Vpstart thus borne from the dunghill, vpon the wings of Fortune, vnto the seat of Maiesty, thought the increase of his pride was an increase of State; and knowing he had nothing for which he might deserue to be loued, he studied in the whole managing of his estate, how by all meanes he might be feared. He therefore displaced Senatours, Captaines, Souldiers, and whom not? with murders, banishments, and confiscations of their goods: all such especially he did cut off, whom he supposed to haue knowledge of his base beginnings. The Christians likewise vnder him were martyred, (whereof Origen wrote a Booke, not now extant) and he is by Writers accounted the sixth Persecutor of Gods Saints: so that, whereas his flatterers at first called him Milo, Anteus, and Hercules, for his strength; now they all tearmed him, Busiris, Phalaris, and Cyclops, for his sauage cruelty.

Maximinus of a naughty disposition.

Euseb. Eccl. hist. lib. 6 cap. 27. Maximinus persecuteth the Christians.

(4) But his life being odious to God and Man was often attempted to be taken away; first, by Maximus, a man of a Consular dignity; then by Quarcinus (whom Capitolinus calleth Ticus) set on by the old Souldiers of Septimius Seuerus, that had beene disgraced by Maximinus; and lastly by the Army in Africa, who elected Gordianus (their Proconsul, a very worthy and learned man, of fourescore yeeres old) Emperour, and his sonne (of the same name and Princely qualities) his Cæsar: the Senate likewise confirming all that they had done. He tooke to himselfe the surname Africanus, either in respect of his Pro-Consulship which he exercised in that Prouince, or else as descēded from Scipio his family who bore that surname: His sonne Gordianus likewise was stiled Augustus, as appeareth by his Coines, whereon he writeth himselfe AVG. and vpon the Reuerse, PIETAS AVG. I.

(5) In the meane while, aged Gordianus with the Enſignes and glory of an Emperor, entred Carthage, with bleſſings and acclamations of ioy: whereat his old enemy Capelianus, Gouernour of Numidia and Mauritania (Prouinces in Africke) much enuied; and gathering forces in Maximinus his name, made head againſt him, and ſhortly gaue him Battle, wherein Gordianus the younger was ſlaine before the walles of the City. The father ſeeing his Cæſars diſaſtre, himſelfe an Emperour onely nominall, his new riſen Sunne to haue paſſed the circle of his height, and now to approach to the ſetting and fall, wiſhed againe his priuate eſtate; and in deſpaire, griefe, and diſdaine of his enemies ſucceſſe, with the Girdle which he wore, ſtrangled himſelfe to death, when hee had beene ſtiled Emperour only twenty ſix daies: wherat Maximinus was not a little ioyfull, and the Senate no leſſe perplexed, ſeeing themſelues depriued of their hopes, and now laid open to the Tyrants will, who like a Lion came raging on; threatning reuenge in all their blouds.

Gordianus the younger ſlaine.

Gordianus the father ſtrangled.

(6) The State thus ſtanding, all the Peeres and Princes thereof aſſembled themſelues together at Rome: and in the Temple of Iupiter; after long debating of their preſent dangers, concluded, that Maximus Pupienus and Clodius Balbinus together ſhould bee Emperours; men of great account and fauour with the people: Theſe taking Oath and Imperiall Robes, leuied forces to maintaine their cauſe: and Balbinus taking charge of the City, Pupienus marched to meet Maximinus, who in great pride had paſſed the Alpes, entred Italy, and now laid ſiege againſt Aquileia; in which this was very memorable, that The Citizens wiues cut off the haire of their heads, to make bow ſtrings for reſiſtance of ſo hateſull a Tyrant: where after long aſſault preuailing little, his diſcontented Souldiers fell to mutiny: and entring his Pauilion, at noone day without reſiſtance, ſlew both him and his ſonne, bearing the ſame name, whom hee had created his Cæſar, and whoſe monies, as he minted them, we haue inſerted at the entrance of his Empire. Their heads for a Trophy they ſent before them to Rome, where with ſuch acceptations they were receiued, as that the Senate acknowledged themſelues to be rid of a Monſter.

(7) Hee was, as is ſaid, exceedingly tall, his body great, and ioints proportionable, faire of face, full eies, and of ſuch ſtrength as is vncredible: and according to his limmes, ſo was his diet; for hee daily deuoured forty pound waight of fleſh, and thereto drank ſix Gallons of wine. He died aged ſixty yeeres and odde, when he had raigned three yeeres, in the yeere of our Lord two hundred thirty and eight.

{PVPIENVS MAXIMVS / CLODIVS BALBINVS} Emperours.

Chapter XXIX.

Pupienus Maximus Emp.

Clodius Balbinus Emp.

Vpienus Maximus and Clodius Balbinus thus elected together for Emperors, the one in action, and the other reſident, a great ſedition chanced betwixt the Senate and Souldiers, which grew to a bloudy iſſue among the Citizens, and Rome it ſelfe was ſet on fire in ſundry places; the Emperours preſence and authority little preuailing: which ſtrucke ſuch feare into their hearts, that they accounted theſe times moſt vnfortunate, and themſelues and preſent eſtate to be moſt deſperate. But the death of Maximinus (and his head happily brought them at the inſtant) gaue preſent life to their dying hearts. And Pupienus comming to Aquileia, as much quieted the Army; ſent backe the Lieutenants to their places of charge, and with great pompe and praiſe returned to his Fellow-Emperour.

(2) The parentage of Balbinus is reported to bee both both noble and ancient, made Citizens of Rome by great Pompey, and himſelfe borne at Cales in Spaine. Pupienus Auncestors were much latter, yet had hee borne many Offices of Magiſtracy, and euer diſcharged them with wiſdome and valour: both of them highly accounted of in Rome.

Iul. Capitol.

(3) Peace thus eſtabliſhed beyond al expectation, with ſhouts and applauſes the Emperours enter the Senate-houſe, where (according to the cuſtome and their deſerts) they were ſtiled, The Fathers of the Senat, with thankes as to the only preſeruers of their liues and eſtates: and ſome extolling the Senate highly for their prouident foreſight, in electing ſuch ſapient and worthy Emperors, contrary to the raſh and vndiſcreet practiſe of ſuch as choſe their gouernours to fit their owne fancies, rather then the charge to which they aduance them; and whoſe bad liues brought commonly their vntimely, but deſerued deaths. The Pretorian Souldiers tooke themſelues to be taxed with thoſe aſperſions, & the rather, becauſe the German ſtrangers were brought in to be of the Guard, as if themſelues were not to bee truſted: ſo turning their ſpleene againſt the preſent Emperours, ſought to ſet vp a new, which ſhortly after they found opportunity to effect.

The Emperours enuy one another.

(4) For theſe Emperours, though aged and wiſe, were not ſo linked together in affection, as they were neere ioined in authority: and therefore the winde of emulation had the eaſier paſſage betwixt the chinkes of their owne conceits; the one prizing his wiſdome and gouernment to be more iudicious; the other, his birth and Nobility to be more honourable, and each of them hauing his owne Guard, ſtood vpon his owne Guard, though one Palace contained them both: and both their endeuours euer well conſorting for the buſineſſe of the Empire.

(5) At this time the Prouinces of Parthia and Germany grew vnquiet, and, by ciuill diſcords, endangered their ſubiections: to repreſſe which, the Emperors agreed to goe in perſon, the one into the Eaſt, the other into Germany. Now whileſt theſe great preparations were in making, the Capitoline Games were celebrated in Rome, whereunto all (almoſt) reſorted, but eſpecially the new-come Guards of the Emperours. The Pretorians finding the aduantagious time, which they had long waited for, ſuddenly in armour aſſailed the Court; which Pupienus perceiuing, ſent in all haſte for Balbinus, and both their guards for defence. But his Fellow-Emperour, vpon a vaine ſuſpition detracted time himſelfe, and hindred the forwardneſſe of the Guards, ſo that theſe Traitours had eaſie acceſſe into both the Emperours Chambers, where in their rage they diſpoiled them of their Imperiall Robes, and haled theſe poore aged and innocent Emperours, like two Theeues thorow the middeſt of the City: Laſtly, they ſlew them, and left their bodies to deſpightfull ignominy.

(6) Theſe Emperours raigned together one yeere, and ſomewhat more, and died the yeere of Chriſt two hundred thirty nine: in which yeere happened ſo great an Eclipſe of the Sun, that the noone-day thereby became as darke as the mid-night.

M. ANTONINVS GORDIANVS.

Chapter XXX.

M. Antoninus Gordianus Emp.

An. Do. 239.

Gordianus (for Antoninus he might not be called, a law formerly acted inhibiting the ſame) was the ſonne of a daughter to old Gordianus (that had made away himſelfe in Carthage, as is declared) at the age of eleuen yeeres was created Cæſar by the Senate, with Pupienus and Balbinus; and at their deaths by the Pretorian Souldiers, elected Emperour, not yet fully fourteene yeeres of age. Greatly was he ſtrengthned by the Alliance and Counſell of one Miſitheus, his Prefect and Inſtructer, whom for his great learning he ſo honoured & loued, that he tooke his daughter for his wife; and by whoſe onely direction, he proſperouſly adminiſtred his State affaires.

(2) Touching the affaires of our Prouinces proceedings, or what Lieutenants were imploied in Britaine ſince Virius Lupus there placed by Seuerus (ſince whoſe death our Story hath ſpent twenty ſeuen yeeres) we finde not recorded. Yet now in the raigne of young Gordianus, ſome glimmering light for her Gouernment appeareth by an Altar ſtone found in Cumberland at a place then called * Caſtra Exploratorum, with an inſcription for the happy health of the Emperour Gordian the third; his wife Furia Sabina Tranquilla, and their whole Family: which votiue Altar was erected by the Troupe of Horſemen ſurnamed Auguſta Gordiana; when Æmilius Chriſpinus a natiue of Africa gouerned the ſame vnder Nonnius Philippus Lieutenant Generall of Britaine in the yeere of Chriſt, two hundred forty three, as appeareth by the Conſuls therein ſpecified: whoſe forme and inſcription wee haue followed by the Stone it ſelfe, now remaining at Connington among many others, in the cuſtody of Sir Robert Cotten Knight Baronet.

In his fift yeere, the Parthians vnder the Leading of Sapor their King had paſſed into the confines of the Romane Prouinces, as far as Antioch in Syria, which Cittie they had taken, with ſpoile of the Countries adioining: againſt whom, the yong Emperour in warlike manner addreſſed himſelfe, and in perſon prepared to vndergo the warres.

(3) In Rome the Temple of Ianus that long had ſtood ſhut, he cauſed to be opened, a ſure token that warres were in hand: and departing the City, paſſed the Straits of Helleſpont, and tooke his way thorow Myſia, to ſtay the Gothes that were come downe to inhabit Thracia. Thence marching to Antioch, recouered the Citie, forcing Sapor to forſake the Prouince, and to content himſelfe with his owne demaines.

Homer Iliades 4 Miſitheus poiſoned by Philip.

(4) But long this Sunne went not without a Cloud, nor his fauorable fortunes without a checke; for Miſitheus, his Neſtor, paying Natures debt before it was due (being poiſoned by Philip, as Eutropius affirmeth) was wanting in counſell, & miſſed for truſt: to ſupply which, Philip (an Arabian and of ignoble parentage) was made his Prefect; wiſe (I muſt needs ſay) had hee beene moderate; and valiant in Armes, had he been true. But the glory of a Diademe beheld with the falſe light of ambition, ſo dimmed the eie of his dutifull affection, and blinded the ſenſes of his aſpiring mind, that he, who from nothing was riſen to be ſomthing, thought that alſo nothing worth, whilſt it was ſhadowed with the name of a ſubiect. First therefore he ſought to winne credit with the Souldiers, to whom he was facile; to regard the poore, to whom hee was liberall; and in all things to outſtrip his Soueraigne, to whom he was trecherous. Gordianus his ſpeech to the Souldiers.

" (5) I got not this ſtate from my Parents by " birth, nor yet by any deſerts (I muſt confeſſe) in my " ſelfe, being the leaſt of many that did deſerue it bet- " ter: but it was you, my fellow Souldiers (vpon what " fate I know not) that haue made me what I am. If " then I haue defrauded your hopes, by carrying my " ſelfe vnder your expectations, I wiſh to bee ſet " in the place where I firſt was; or rather (if I ſo de- " ſerue) my life, and ſtate, may at one inſtant be en- " ded by your vnerring hands: For Noble mindes " cannot brooke to be curbed with the bitte of baſe " indignities, nor ſuffer their vaſſals to bee Corriuals " of their Maieſtie. It is a iealous obiect (I muſt needs " confeſſe) and many times caſts great ſuſpition whē " is ſmall occaſion: but I, for my part, haue alwaies " thought of that humour, that men cauſleſly iea- " lous, doe moſt iuſtly deſerue what they vniuſtlie " feare; and both your ſelues will bee my witneſſes, " how farre I am from the touch of that ſtaine, and " alſo the dailie occurrents of my Caſar, (if ſo low I " may terme him) doth make more then manifeſt. I " am but yong, yet elder by ſixe yeares then I was; " my body tender, yet expoſed to the chance of " warre; my counſell raw, yet bettered by your wiſe- " domes; and my conqueſts in my ſelfe nothing, but " yet in your valours both glorious & famous. What " then are mine errours, that I may amend them? or " your diſcontents, that I may redreſſe them? for by " the powers of heauen I proteſt, it is your loues " which I moſt eſteeme, and the good of the Empire, " for which I onely wiſh to liue; the firſt is in your " powers to beſtow at your pleaſure, but the other in " me (if it be poſsible) ſhall liue euen after death.

(6) Theſe complaints notwithſtanding, Philip ſo politickly, nay, rather traiterouſly, brought his owne proiects to passe, as that the yong innocent Emperour was displeased, and abandaned of all: in which distresse he first sued to be made his Cæsar, and that denied, to be his Pretorian Prefect: but neither would bee had, yet at length the charge of an ordinary Captaine, was with some difficulty granted him. But Philip bethinking himselfe of the greatnes of Gordianus his bloud, his loue and esteeme both in Rome and the Prouinces, and his owne vertues equalising any, hee commanded him to be slaine in the twenty two yere of his age, and the sixt o f his raigne. The Senate hearing thereof, elected M. Marcius, and after him againe, L. Aurel. Seuerus, Ostulianus. But Philip through the giddie multitude, preuailed against both. This Emperour though yong, so well demeaned himselfe, that the Senate by authoritie added to his titles TVTOR REIPVBLICAE, and PARENS PRINCIPVM POPVLI ROMANI; and after his death euen by his owne murtherers, his Monument of faire Stone was raised in the confines of Persia, and vpon his sepulcher this inscription set:

Gordianus slaine.

DIVO GORDIANO VICTORI PERSARVM VICTORI GOTTHORVM VICTORI SARMATARVM DEPVLSORI ROMANARVM SEDITIONVM VICTORI GERMANORVM SED NON VICTORI PHILIPPORVM.

To the Sacred Gordianus vanquisher of the Persians, Gothes, and Sarmates, extinguisher of the Romane Ciuill discords, and subduer of the Germans, but not of the Philippians.

(7) He was of condition most noble and louely, of behauiour gentle, very studious and giuen much to learning; hauing in his Librarie no lesse then threescore and two thousand Bookes, as is reported. The truth is, that wicked people were not worthy long to enioy so vertuous, so clement, so peereles an Emperour. He died in the moneth of March, in the yeere of our Redeemer two hundred forty fiue.

CHAPTER XXXI.

M. IVLIVS PHILIPPUS CÆS.

Iulius Philip. Emp.

An. Do. 245.

WHat man is there, who considering those forepassed murthers, of so many, and so mighty Monarchs, would not, by the spectacle of others calamities, be induced to preferre the securitie of a moderate estate, before the desire of Soueraignety; whose glorious content is onely in appearance, but the cares and hazards are both reall and perpetuall? But of so attractiue vertue is the Load-stone of Maiesty, through the imagined felicity thereof, that most mens desires are drawne to that one point of the Compasse; and if a little faire winde of fortune shall blow on them, they will lanch forth with their full sailes into the Mare incognitum, a Sea of vnknowne calamities. And amõgst others, such were the blinde desires, and such the vnhappy euent of this Iulius Philippus the Arabick Barbarian. Of parentage obscure and ignoble, as Victor and others affirme, who pluckt off the imperiall robes of his Liege-Lord, to inuest himselfe.

(2) Being now accepted as Emperour by the Souldiers in Parthia, he wrote to the Senate of the death of Gordianus, as though it naturally had happened, and with faire pretensions of his good purposes, but more through the feare of his Parthian Soldiers, obtained their consents; whereupon shuffling vp a most dishonourable peace in those parts, and declaring his sonne Philip for his Cæsar, (whose Coines with his, we haue set in the beginning of this Chap.) hee made all speede towards Rome: where, the yeere insuing, his shewes & games were exceedingly magnificent, for the Celebration of the Birth-day (as we may terme it) of Rome, that beeing, the thousand yeere from her foundation.

(3 It pleased God at length to touch this Emperours heart, both with such a sense of his owne forepast sinnes, and also with the light of heauenly truth, that he hath the honour of being the first Emperour baptized into the faith of Christ, together with his sonne Philip, and his wife Seuera: though the publike

And howſoeuer Pomponius Lætus accuſeth him to bee a diſſembling Prince, yet Euſebius declareth the effects of his Profeſsion farre otherwiſe: for Philip (ſaith hee) ſeeking to communicate with the Saints, could not bee admitted, till ſuch time as he had made open confeſsion of his Faith; at which time he ioined himſelfe with thoſe, who for their ſinnes were brought to examination, and was placed in the roome of the Penitents, becauſe that in many things he had beene faulty: which willingly he obeied, and declared by his workes his ſincere and religious mind towards God. Which may the rather appeare by Sabellicus and Bergomenſis, who ſhew, that the hatred of Decius againſt Philip and his ſonne was conceiued, for that they had committed the cuſtodie of their Treaſures vnto Fabianus the Chriſtian Biſhop of Rome, who baptized them, as ſome write; though others ſay, Pontius the Martyr did it.

But the Emperour fearing this to be but policie in Decius, leſt by delay he might giue him more ſtrength, omitted no time to vphold his owne, and with a mighty Armie vndertooke theſe affaires himſelfe, not truſting any more to the diſpoſall of his Captaines. And immediately departing Rome, with a ſterne reſolution, and ouer-hard hand, held the reine of that begun Expedition, whereby he preſently loſt the loue of the Armie, and Decius was accounted the more worthy of rule, whom in Verona they forthwith proclaimed Emperour, and cut off Philips head thorow the teeth, before they had departed Italie. At newes whereof, the Pretorians ſlew Philip his Cæſar and ſonne, a man of ſo obſeruable compoſednesſe, as that he had beene neuer ſeene to laugh in all his life. C. VIBIVS TREBONIANVS GALLVS, CAIVS VIBIVS VOLVSIANVS, Emperours.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Tre.Gallus Emp.

Vibius Voluſi. Emp.

An.Do.252.

THis ouerthrow of the Romans, and death of Decius, in outward ſemblance was ſo greeuouſly taken by Trebonianus Gallus, that no man was ſo forward for reuenge as hee, and therefore the laſt in ſuſpicion of Treaſon. The Armie hee ſtrengthened, and daily encouraged, pretending great ſeruice againſt thoſe barbarous Scythians, but all to gaine credit and liking of the Souldiers, whereby hee ſoone atchieued his deſire, and with their applauſes was proclaimed Emperour.

Gallus elected Emperour.

(2) By Birth, he was deſcended of an honourable Familie in Rome: but true honour cannot harbour where dwelleth treachery & falſhood, as it was with him, when appointed by Decius to bee Gouernour of Myſia, and to keepe the paſſages from the inuading Gothes, the deſire of Rule ſo corrupted his minde, that he plotted with them againſt the Army, and betraied the truſt and life of his Soueraigne.

His parentage.

Pomp.Letus. Blondus. Sabellicus.

(3) Neither is he ſtained with the blot of Treaſons only, but alſo with a careleſſe and cruell gouernment; for with the Gothes hee made a diſhonourable peace, whereby the Romans (who were Lords of the world) became Tributarie by a yeerly pay to thoſe vnciuill Scythians; who neuertheleſſe in ſhort time brake their Truce with him, ſacking and ſpoiling the Prouinces of Thraſia, Myſia, Theſſalia, and Macedonia: the Perſians then alſo by their example entring Meſopotamia and Syria, made ſpoile euen thorow Armenia.

(4) Gallus little regarding theſe troubles abroad, conſumed his time idly in Rome, rather as a Bondman to his owne voluptuous deſires, then a Conquering Monarch; taking for his companion and Fellow-Emperour, his ſonne Voluſianus, as appeareth by inſcrip-tion of Coine placed before, a very childe, whose yeeres did quit him of any Capitall Crime. But himself not perceiuing the infortunate successe of Decius for persecuting the innocent Christians, stumbled (as Eusebius saith) at the same stone, and banished them whose Praiers preserued his prosperous estate: at which time followed so vniuersall a Pestilence, that no Prouince in the world was free from the same: and his wicked Life and most vnfortunate Raigne hastned now vnto their period.

(5) For the Gothes continuing their furies begunne; his General Aemilian Maurus ouerthrew them with a wonderfull slaughter; whereby he grew so famous, and Gallus so contemptible, that the Souldiers (euer affecting change) proclaimed him Emperor, the newes whereof soone rouſed Gallus from the Bed of his lasciuious pleasures, and with his sonne entred the quarrell against Aemilianus, whose fortune wss to slay them both in fight, the yeere of Christs Incarnation, two hundred fifty three, after he had raigned not fully two yeeres, and liued (as Victor testifieth) forty and seuen: whereupon the Armies ioining their forces together, conferred the Imperiall Title and Ensignes vpon the Conquerour.

Emilianus succeeding Gallus by the only election of the Mysian Army, was by birth an African in the Prouince Mauritania, of Parentage base and obscure; who being risen by the Warres from meane places of seruice, and no better then a Common Souldier, aspired to the charge and credit of a Captaine Generall.

Aemilian. Maurus his descent.

(2) His Election at first was contradicted by the Italian Bands, in fauour of Valerianus their owne Leader, whom they sought to raise Emperour, the Senate also inclining thereto, the fame of the man among them was so renowned. The most voices therefore were heard on his side. Some haue rather accounted Æmilianus an Vsurper, then rancked him in the catalogue of lawfull Emperours.

Eutropius.

(3) But seeing Eutropius doth allow him the place, we are not to dispute his title or claim; only his short time of gouernment admitteth no matters of large discourse, being cut off in the budde, before the graft had time to spring, For his Army disliking what themselues had done, and hearing of the worths and election of Valerianus, laid down their weapons born in his defence, & tumultuously murdered him in the heat of their blouds, after hee had raigned in name, without action, the space almost of foure moneths.

Aemilian. Maurus his end, and continuance of his raigne.

(4) So vnconstant is the state of worldly felicity, and may be compared to a masterlesse Shippe, which without Tackle is left to the mercy of the raging Seas, that is one while caried with the faire windes of hope towards the hauen of wished desires, but straightwaies ouerwhelmed with the waues of despaire: and most especially him that is borne vpon the opinions of the giddy multitude, now carried aloft vpon the flouds of their fawning fauors, and anon left in the sands of their retiring ebbes, with a sudden shipwracke of all their fore-gone fortunes. And these aduentures too soone Æmilianus felt, who the same yeere that hee thus put foorth to Sea, lost all his aduenture, and therewith also his life, Anno 253.

CHAPTER XXXV.

An.Do.254.

IF euer the saying of the wise Athenian Solon (spoken to Cræsus the rich king of Lydia) was true, That no man can be happy before the day of his death: then most truly may it be verified of this Valerianus the next succeeding Emperor: whose yeres were multiplied with increase of honour, vntill they came to seuenty and seuen, but then were clouded with such ignominious miseries, as the like had neuer hapned to any Romaine Emperour before him, and (I may well say) to no other Monarch in the world before liuing: such is the Ordinance of our great God, sometimes from the Dunghill to raise men of low degree, & to place them with Princes in the Chaire of Maiesty; then againe to bring down the Mighty from their Seate of glory, & to leaue them chained with the poorest captiues, & basest Vassals. For such was the State of that Great & Proud King of Babel, who from the height of Maiesty fel into the cõditions of an vnreasonable Beast; and so was it with Valerianus, though not vtterly abandoned frõ the Society of men, as Babels King was: yet was he caried Captiue vnto a nation whose Society was scarce humaine, and where his vsage was more then barbarous.

Dan. 4.27.

(2) This man was both nobly descended, and of so great esteeme among the Romans, that being but a priuate man, and then also absent, they chose him for their Censor, an Office of high dignity, conferred euer vpon the Best, as Trebellius Pollio, who wrote the History of his Life, hath declared. Eusebius reporteth his beginning to haue beene gracious and milde towards the Christians, aboue any of his Ancestors whatsoeuer: yea euen those who were themselues openly accounted Christians: insomuch, that his Clemency was their Protection, and his court the Sanctuary of their safeties. But Satan (whose hatred sleepeth not) stirred vp an Egyptian Sorcerer against them, who so inchanted the Emperors heart, that with great cruelty he began the Eighth Persecution, & so raged that some haue appropriated the sayings of the Apocalyps in the thirteenth chapter vnto him, as to whom power was giuen for two and forty moneths ouer the Saints of God, and a mouth to vtter great blasphemies: Of which opinion is the ancient Dionysius Alexandrinus. Many indeed were the Martyrs that he caused with horible tortures to die, and more had done, if the iust reuenging hand of God had not cut him off.

(3) For Sapor the sauage King of Persia, making great spoile in Syria, Cilicia, and Cappadocia, drew Valerian from Rome into Mesopotamia, to withstand his rage; where striking Battel with him, was left (either by Treason or Chance) without sufficient Guard to secure his Person, and was there taken Prisoner by the Persians; hauing then raigned seuen yeeres (whereof two were spent in spilling of the bloud of Saints) and thence forward, the rest of his life was inthralled to a most miserable and mercilesse seruitude: For the Tyrannizing Persian puft vp with this fortunate gale, to an excessiue swelling of pride; whensoeuer he was disposed to take Horse, made Valerianus his Foot-stoole, causing this Greatest Monarch of the World to whom all Nations did homage, to bow downe his neke and backe for himselfe thereon to tread, and mount vnto his Saddle: In which vnsufferable slauery, his old body indured without release, to the end of his most wretched life, which by some Authours account was full seuen yeeres more; the very time of the Babylonian Kings abasement.

(4) But herein the misery of Valerianus is much greater then Nabuchadnezars was, in that God both restored him to his former glory, and indued him with heauenly grace to confesse his sinnes; whereas Valerianus perished in the desperate calamity whereinto he was fallen; as Eusebius sheweth in these words: And thou Valerian, forasmuch as thou hast exercised the same cruelty in murdering the subiects of God, therefore hast proued vnto vs the righteous Iudgement of God, in that thy selfe wast bound in Chaines, & carried away for a Captiue Slaue with thy glorious Purple and thy Imperiall Attire, & at length also cõmanded by Sapor King of the Persians, to be slaine, & powdred with salt, hast set vp vnto al men a perpetuall Monument of thine own wretchednesse.

Eusebius in sem. ad conuentum Sanctorum.

(5) How vnspeakeable the cruelties were which this wretched Emperor endured by that Tyrant, may hence appeare, in that not only those which were Allies to the Romane Empire, but also the Barbarous Kings, and friends of Sapores were moued with commiseration, and distaste, as Trebell. Pollio proueth by the copy of one he produceth from King Belsolus, as followeth.

" Belsolus King of Kings to King Sapor greeting. If " I were assured that the brightnes of the Romans
" might be dimmed, or their Emperial greatnes were
" at the ebbe of their fall, I would with thee reioyce
" for thy present fortunes, which in thy own conceit
" are glorious to thee, and beneficiall to vs all thy " fellow Princes: but take heed thy pride deceiue thee
" not, that thou be not a hurt to thy Successors, & vnto
" vs all; for one Ship drowned by tempest doth not " minister distruction to the whole Fleete, nor one
" ouerthrowne assure a full conquest. But rather con" sider how many Nations of enemyes, the Romans
" haue made vassals to their Empire. The Gaules we " know haue sacked Italy it selfe, and haue set the " citie of Rome on fire, but now we see them a seruile
" nation, and themselues made subiect to the Romans;
" The Africans likewise ere this haue giuen them ma" ny ouerthrowes, yet at this day the dice is cast, and
" the Africans chance is, to serue the Romans. To let " passe more ancient and remote examples, Mithri-
" dates King of Pontus, & lord of all Asia, far mightyer
" then thou, was by the Romans ouerthrowne, & Asia
" made a province vnto their subiection. They haue
" lost, thou wilt say; but what? a weak old mã though
" an Emperour: their strengths little lessened, hauing
" choise

"choise sufficient both of electiō and reuenge. Thou "hast won,but how?by valure? Nothing lesse; but by "treachery,and that also by thine enemies assistance: "yet herein assure thy selfe, that their fidelty to thee- "ward is of no firmer assurance. Follow then my "counsell; make benefit of the occasion, deliuer the "Romans their Emperor, wherby thou mayest obtaine "with them a perfect peace for thy selfe and vs: & so "I cōclude that thy fortunes are great, and wherof I "am glad,if thou thy selfe know how to vse them.

Other Princes also of the East, as of the Bactrians, Albanians, Iberians, and Scythians, inhabiting Mount Taurus, had such sense of these ignominious vasages, that they disdained to receiue the letters from Sapor of his victorious successe, & sent their Ambassadors to Rome, profferring their assistance for the redemption of their Emperour; yet all auailed not, and Sapor held still his Prisoner, abating nothing either of his owne pride, or his Captiues misery, but in the end (so hellish a fiend is reuenge) commanded his Eyes to be pulled out, and so for age and griefe he died, as Eusebius saith: but Agathus (a writer of credit) reporteth, that he was flaied aliue by direction of this vnhumane King. Thus did God punish one Tyrant by another, and thus himselfe felt those torments vnpittied, which he had without pitie inflicted on others. The race of whose Raigne is accounted to bee seuen yeares before his Captiuity, wherein he liued almost so long as Galienus his sonne sate Emperour, and died in the yeere two hundred sixty one.

Valerianus had his Eyes puld out.

P. LICINIVS GALIENVS.

Chapter XXXV.

Valerian now Captiue in Persia (while Odenatus grasping the aduantage, tooke vpon him the Empire of the East; & the now guideless Army of Rome, occupied onely in spoile and mutiny, their leaders in faction, and the whole State astonished in affrighted terrour and amazement) Balista (a gallant Romane gentleman) moued with the instant misery of the Common-wealth, resolued by electing anew an Emperour, to preuent the apparant ruine of his owne Country: yet neuer in this his worthy resolutions, once dreamed of Gallienus, (though before chosen Augustus in the full fortune of his father) but the affection of the Army forcibly setled the Garland vpon Marcian and his two sonnes, as the most worthy; who with his eldest not long after was subdued by Aurelius vsurping Illyria (against Gallienus then receiued Soueraigne by the Romane Senate) and his youngest betraied to murder by plot of Odenatus, left the distracted empire to those three; of which the last disdaining much the indignity offred to the State of Rome by that base captiuity of Valerian, whose calamity nothing touched the sense of his vnnaturall sonne, entred a warre against the Persians, & tooke from them their Cities Nisabis & Carras. But such was the moderation of this man, that although he had power of an independant Soueraignty, yet he held still a good correspondency and intelligence in all his actions of Gouernment, with Galienus, to whom he sent (as monument of victory and Reuenge) such of the Persian Nobility as became his Prisoners: and thus Odenatus did conquer, and Galienus triumph. But such was the baseness of Galienus, that when he could not by any Princely vertue in himselfe, eclipse the true merit of Odenatus, he endeuored to deface by treachery what he could not suppresse by valour. But in this failing, he made him then (through feare) copartner of his Empire, stiling him Augustus, and stamping his face & the Persian Triumph vpon the publike Coine of the State, by approbation of the Senate; leauing him alone to defend those Frontiers of the Empire, whilest himselfe, neither regarding his old fathers miseries, (most miserable that he had so vnnatural a sonne) the dishonour of the Romane State, nor the reuolts of the Prouinces, wherof newes was daily brought him, spent his vnprincely thoughts vpon fruitlesse deuices, as in reseruing sundry Fruits and Flowers, that they might grow greene and flourish all seasons of the yeere; and (which was worse) vpon women and wanton dalliances. Yet had hee a Lady of excellent beauty and allurements, Cornelia Salonina Pipara, to his wife, the daughter of the King of the Marcomanni; whose feature wee finde often minted vpon her Monies. His sonne by her Saloninus hee adopted Cæsar, of whom there is no more remembred in Storie, then that hee was borne noble, trained vp princely, and perished through the errours of his father, and not his owne. And to his brother Licinius Valerianus (to whom the father had giuen the title of Cæsar) he added the honour of Augustus, And therefore we haue not held it improper, to adioine to his their monies in the front of his life.

(2) The calamities of this Emperours time were so many, as almost exceed credite: and Signes shewed both both in the Heauens and the Earth, manifested his wrath that sate vpon the Throne of Iasper; from whose presence issued Thundrings, Lightnings, and voices. For (by Writers of best credit) the Sunne was clouded as vnder sackcloth, and not seene for many daies together Earth-quakes great, and fearfully resounding, ouerthrew Cities & other edifices, shaking the ground so terribly, that vast Caues, and hideous gaping bowels of the earth were thereby laid open, and wher eout (no lesse strangely) flowed great streames of salt waters. The Earth roared, and seemed to thunder, when there was no voice heard in the aire. The Sea ouer-swelled her bankes, and brake into many Continents, drowning Countries, Cities, and People: and (besides all these) so violent a Pestilence raged, that in Rome no lesse then 5. thousand persons died in a day.

Great & mighty Earth-quakes.

Galienus staied the persecutions of the Christians

(3) These miseries somewhat mooued this Heathenish Emperour to remorse: and thinking thereby to pacifie the wrath of the Diuine Powers, hee staied the Persecutions of the Christians, sending out his Edicts in fauour of them. For not only the Heauens, Earth, & Seas declared the anger of their God, out of whose mouth went a two-edged sword, but the Prouinces also seemed to be remoued out of their places. The Souldiers of al parts electing their own Generals, aduanced no lesse then Thirty at once; who assumed the title of Emperours, but are recorded to Posterities by the name of Vsurping Tyrants. And as they were all deadly opposite each to other, so were they iointly almost all bent against Galienus; wherby the Roman Empire was more oppressed with her owne forces, then euer it had bin by forraine powers. And since sixe of them assumed the Purple Robe in this Westerne Angle of the Empire, it will not be impertinent to the course of Story, with a light touch to remember them, and to expresse their Monies, as we haue done the rest of those that held the reines of gouernment in these parts of the Romane World.

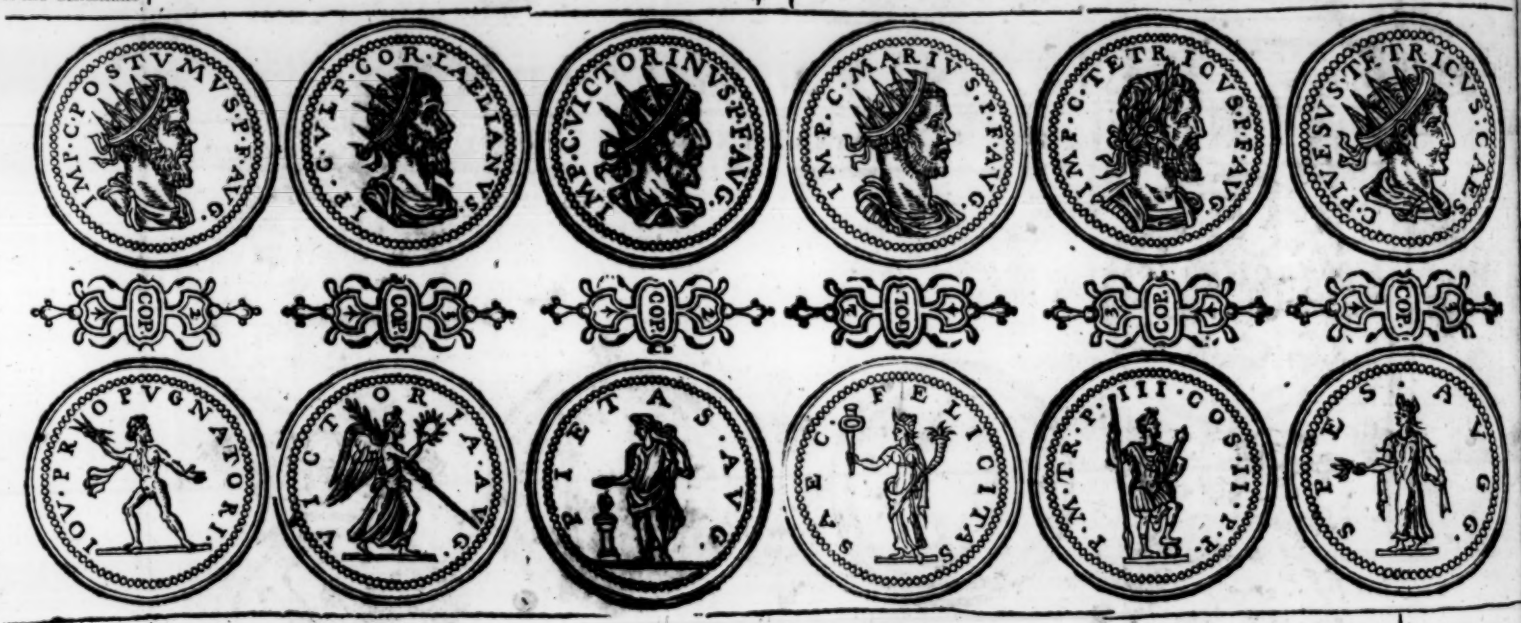
Thirty Emperors at once.



M. Cassius Labienus Posthumus after the death of Saloninus (who was committed to his education by Gallienus) assumed the Empire, by aide and encouragement of those of Gallia, ouer whom he had born the office of lieutenancie by fauour of Valerian the Emperour. And these againe, as all Populars greedy of Innouation, from him and Iunius Cassius Posthumus his sonne, tooke both honour and life, after ten yeares gouernment. This opportunity either made by L. Aelianus, or fitly taken, mounted him vp with ease into that Emperial throne, in which he sate not with like fortune of continuance, though of confusion. To this man succeeded together, M. Aurelius Victorinus and Lucius his son; both in a tumult neere Coleyn by their souldiors murthered. And had not the inordinate lust of the elder, blemished his other vertues, he had to all the most excellent Emperors bin nothing inferiour; in the best of their other vertues.

(4) The restlesse humor now of the giddy Commons, next setleth it selfe vpon Aurelius Marius, a Soueraigne sutable in his meane condition, to their base affections (for hee was no better then a Black-smith) yet to him a man of their own meanes & making, they were no lesse vnconstant and cruel, then to the rest: after three daies, setting an end of his gouernmẽt, with a sword of his own forging. And therfore Piuesius Tetricus, the father and sonne, though ascending the throne of Maiesty, with the greatest applause of that people, and filling it vp with much merit and happy successe of their own; when they considered the insufferable insolencies and desperate practises of that prophane ranke, chose rather to adorne Aurelians Triumph, in a voluntary captiuity, then to liue and rule at the deuotion of a lawlesse multitude. And these times seemed no lesse fatally bent to bloud, disorder and tyranny in other parts as well as these: For the Pannonians raised Ingenuus: The Mysians, A. Regillianus: The Egyptians, Æmilianus: In Africa Celsus was proclaimed: In Illyricum, Aureolus: and in the East, Odenatus, (a man the more famous for Zenobia, his glorious and magnanimous wife; Whose valour was so feared of Galienus, that to make him his, hee admitted him his Fellow-Emperor, with the Stile of Augustus, as we haue remembred before.) The [a] Germans inuade Italy: The [b] Gothes waste Greece, Pontus and Asia; The Samaritans seize [c] Austriche and Hungary: The Persians robbe Syria: The Saxons breake into Gallia: The Franks into Spaine: In a word, all are in vproares, the second seale opened, and the Red-horse prepared for Battaile, whose Rider receiued a great and sharpe Sword, with Commission giuen him to take Peace from the Earth: and these times of troubles are so famous in Story, and the reuolutions of acts so agreeable to the words of the Prophecie, that they may seeme iustly a most exact accomplishment of that sacred vision.

ROMES glory thus declining, and the Imperiall Foundations thus vndermined, the aſpiring tops of all that beauteous frame beganne to ſhake, and to foreſhew the ſignes of her approching fall. And had not the Fates euen at that inſtant raiſed a ſtay to vnderprop the Walles, thoſe mounted Towers which ſo long had braued the Skie, had beene laid leuell with the Ground, and made the ruines of All conſuming Time.

(2) For whereas by the ſtrange confuſions vnder the late Emperour, the Eagles body was burdened with the waight of thoſe thirty heads at once: of which number though many of them by their owne mutuall rauening were conſumed before the death of Galienus, yet the mightieſt, as Aurelius Gouernour of Dalmatia; Tetricus and Victorinus, who held Britaine and Callia; and Zenobia (the Heroicke Queene and wife of Odenatus) all the Eaſt; to omit the Murderers of Galienus, that durſt not make their claime, (their deed ſo ill diſgeſted) all theſe were ſtill remaining and ſtrong, at ſuch time as Flauius Claudius by the Souldiers was elected before the Walles of Milan, and confirmed with much ioy by the Senate in Rome.

His deſcent.

(3) This Flauius was deſcended of noble Parentage, out of Dalmatia, by ſome; or as others ſay, of Dardania, and ſprung from the Troian Bloud. But Aurelius Victor will haue him the ſonne of Gordianus the Emperour before ſpoken of. Howſoeuer, a moſt worthy man he was, an excellent Captaine, of ſingular continence, a iuſt Indge, a louer of ſtrangers, ſeuere to the wicked, but moſt benigne to the vertuous: ſo that we may well ſay, In Rome was a new world; or at leaſt, In the World was a new Rome.

Flauius Claudius his vertues.

(4) His firſt Expedition was againſt Aurelius, that held Milan, whom he there ſlew, and ioined his ſouldiers to his owne ſtrength. But preferring the generall good before his particular quiet, he addreſſed his warres for the Eaſt, againſt the Gothes, who (as Iornandes their Story-writer reporteth) had infeſted thoſe parts of the Empire (for fifteene yeeres continuance) with continuall irruptions, and had now lately entred friendſhip with many other like barbarous Nations, inuading Thracia, and the Countries before them, euen vnto Macedonia: and thence taking their way thorow Hungarie, came downe the Riuer Danubie, with two thouſand Saile of Ships, fraught with Munition and Men. To meet theſe, Claudius prepared: but before his Encounter, he wrote thus to the Senate:

(5) "Renowned Fathers and Reuerend Lords, vnderſtand ye for certain, that three hundred and twentie thouſand men of warre are entred our Confines, whoſe weight doth ſeeme to burden the Earth it ſelfe, and whoſe warre-like preparations make theſe parts of the Empire to tremble and quake; with whom I am now to ſtrike battaile: wherein if the Conqueſt be mine, the ioy will be yours. But if I fal, yet I pray remember that I fight after Galienus hath raigned, and rent the ſtrength of the Romans in theſe remote Prouinces; and after the Rebellions of Lollianus, Poſthumus, Eugenius, Regillianus, Celſus, and others, who haue ſo weakened the ſinewes of our Armes, and broken the Swords and Launces of our defence that I may well ſay, Wee want, if not ſtrength, yet weapons wherewithall to fight. And to our ſhame be it ſpoken, Zenobia a Woman commands all our Croſſe-bowes, and bends them againſt our vnarmed breſts. How ſmall ſoeuer therefore our performance ſhall bee in this ſeruice, repute it (I pray) for great, and wiſh our proceedings may ſort to the weale of the Empire.

Claudius Letter to the Senate.

(6) Which done, with no daunted ſpirit he entred Battaile, and with more then wonted courage fought ſo valiantly, that he ſlew and tooke Priſoners, to the number of three hundred thouſand fighting men, with two thouſand Ships laden with Munition, ſo that whole houſes were filled to their topps with Targets, Shieldes, Swords, and Launces, and other abiliments for Warre, whereof he wrote againe to Rome: and following the Enemie with ſucceſſe of Victorie, in Thracia neere Bizantium, in Macedonia neere Theſſalonica, droue the Gothes out of thoſe parts which they had ſo long infeſted; and reſtored the wonted bounds of the Empire. Thence marching into Germanie, neere the Lake called Garda, gaue that reuolted Nation a great ouerthrow, where (as Eutropius and Victor doth report) hee vanquiſhed two thouſand of thoſe ſtrong Germans, and there eſtabliſhed againe their ſubiection to the Romans power. And now minding to go forward againſt Tetricus and the puiſſant Zenobia, a Feauer did firſt cut off his purpoſe, and ſhortlie after his life: a thing very ſtrange and rare in that age, as by the courſe of their raignes wee haue hitherto ſeene; not that ſo great a Monarch ſhould die; (they being all of the ſame earthly mould that meaneſt men are) but that in thoſe daies a Roman Emperour ſhould die in his bed, as other men doe, of a naturall death.

Gothes vanquiſhed.

Flauius Claudius died a naturall death.

(7) He was of perſonage tall, his bodie well compoſed and ſtrong, bright and cleere eies, his face great and full; and of life moſt temperate and chaſte. He raigned one yeare, tenne moneths, and fifteene daies, and died the fourth of Februarie, in the yeere of Chriſt, two hundred ſeuentie one. His Statue of Gold was ſet vp in the Capitoll, and his Target of the ſame metall hung vp in the Senate houſe; himſelfe (in honour of his admired worth) placed among the Romane Emperours that were deified for Gods: ſuch an eſtimation and loue did his vertuous life procure vn to him euen after his death.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

A. Quintilius Emperor.

A.Do.271.

QVintilius, the Brother of Claudius, and Vice-Roy in his abſence for the Guard of Italy, was by the Armie whereof hee had command, proclaimed Emperour immediately vpon the Newes of Claudius his death: The Senate as ioifully confirming his Election, as they were ſorrowfull for their loſſe of his moſt worthy Brother. Brethren indeed they were by nature, and in conditions not much vnlike; ſo that what ſeemed to bee haſt in the one, was in the other ſuplied and ſtill remaining: For this M. Aurelius Quintilius, was both wiſe for Ciuil Gouernement, and experienced for Warres, wanting no complements of an abſolute Prince.

Eutropius.

Quintilius brother to the laſt Emperour.

(2) But long his glaſſe ſtood not without a turne, nor his Fortunes fauning without a frowne. For the victorious Souldiers which in his expeditions had followed Claudius, and thought themſelues worthy of the firſt voyce in Election, proclaimed Aurelianus for Emperour, a moſt valiant Captaine; and of whoſe proweſſe there had beene ſo ſufficient experience, as that Quintilius knew hee could not ſtand againſt him.

And therefore miſtruſting the ſtrength of his Title, and affections of his Souldiers, reputed it ignominious for a noble minde, to die with leſſe honour then he attained vnto, and enioied by his life: and therfore reſoluing to die an Emperour, choſe rather by a voluntary cutting of his own veines, to powre out his life with his bloud, then to hazard the chance of vncertaine warres, or to returne to his priuate eſtate.

Quintilius cut his owne veines, and ſo bled to death.

And thus no longer raigning then ſeuenteen daies, (which ſhort time could miniſter little matter of larger diſcourſe) hee died with his brother the ſame moneth of February the twentieth day, and yeere of Chriſt his incarnation, two hundred ſeuentie one.

He raigned but ſeuenteene daies.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Val. Aurelianus Emperour.

An Do.271.

SO ſhort was the Raigne of the laſt Emperour Quintilius, that Aurelianus who followed him may be ſaid to be the Succeſſor of Claudius, and not of him: being elected dy his Legions in the Eaſt, as ſoone as the other had beene in Italy (though confirmed before him of the Senate in Rome) continued ſtill his riuall for Maieſtie, and attained the top of that high ſet Gole, whereof Quintilius failed, before his foot had well mounted the firſt ſtep.

Aurelianus his deſcent.

(2) This Valerius Aurelianus was of parentage neither honorable nor rich, and yet his fortunes carried him to the height of both. Some recount his birth was of Dacia; others of Myſia; both ſo doubtful that Flauius Vopiſcus, (the copious Writer of his Life) leaues it vndecided, and to the cenſure of his Readers. His riſings were by the Warres; whereunto from his childhood hee had a naturall inclination: and for continuall carying of his weapons, was commonlie called Aurelianus the Sword-bearer.

(3) His ſeruice was ſufficiently knowne to the Generals of diuers Prouinces, who had forty ſundry times imploied him in the charge of a Lieutenant: and vnder Claudius in Perſia he was the Coronell of the Horſe. In the warres of Sarmatia he is reported to haue ſlaine Forty enemies with his owne hands in one day; and at other ſeuerall times, to the number of nine hundred men, as both Vopiſcus and Theoclius haue affirmed. And generally ſo famous were his deeds, both before he was Cæſar, and after, as that he is by ſome compared with Iulius and Alexander.

Aurelianus comparable with Cæſar and Alexander.

(4) Vpon the ratifying of his election by the Senate at Rome, hee haſted not thither to be ſaluted and enſtalled Emperour, but forthwith marched againſt the Sueuians and Sarmates, who ſore infeſted the Empire with warres: and hauing ſoone ſubdued them, and quieted thoſe parts, in great haſte hee came into Italie againſt the Germans, who with Fire and Sword had gone as farre as Milan: and them likewiſe with great valour hee forced thence. Then entring Rome with great pompe, cauſed the Walles to bee repaired and inlarged, which was not lawfull but onely for Victorious Emperours. But long he ſtaied not, ere he returned into Syria, againſt the ſtout Queene Zenobia, whoſe braue reſolutions, & warlike power for fight, her Letter in anſwer vnto him (when being ſorely tired, he proffered her wealth, life, & liberty to yeeld) doth manifeſtly declare: the tenor thereof being as followeth.

Aurelianus inlarged the walles of Rome.

*The great Citie Palmyra (ſaith Ioſephus) was built by King Solomon; whence their Nation tooke the name. It bordered vpon the Parthians Kingdome in the middle betwixt it and the Roman Empire.

(6) This haughtie anſwere of that vndaunted Queene, put more fire to the furie of Aurelianus, who tooke the Letter in ſuch ſcorne, that he threatned death to the Inditer, (whom he ſuppoſed to be Longinus the Philoſopher, who was alwaies with her; and her Inſtructer) which afterwards he did accompliſh: for deſtroying her ſeuerall Aids before they could meete together, and beſieging Palmyra her ſtrong Citie, hee brought the ſame to ſuch diſtreſſe, that in the end hee tooke her Captiue; and glad of ſuch a prey, carried her himſelfe to Rome, where following his Chariot of Triumph, attired in Tiſſues and richeſt Robes of price, ſhee was led his Priſoner in Chaines of Gold: vpon whoſe preſence the Spectators with admiration ſo much gazed, that ſomwhat it dimmed the Maieſtie of Aurelianus: for ſhee is ſaid to be exceedingly faire, though not very white, but ſomewhat browne: her eies blacke and bright, her teeth ſhining like pearles, her bodie tall, and of moſt ſtately proportion, her countenance modeſt, milde, and pleaſing; her voice ſweet, her conuerſation honeſt, her minde chaſte, and body continent, wiſe, temperate, and learned in the Greeke, Latine, and Egyptian tongues, hauing read the Romaine hiſtory in Greek, and herſelfe abridged the Alexandrian, and all the Orientall hiſtoryes. CHAPTER XI.

Claudius Tacitus Emp.

An. Do. 276.

Aurelianus being dead no man sought to be Emperour.

THE former seditions ended by Aurelianus, and the state of the Empire remaining now in quiet, no man appeared to sue, much lesse tumultuouslie to striue for that Royal Diademe; but all the great Commanders (as though they made courtesie in giuing way each vnto others) stood at the foot of Maiestie; no man attempting higher to mount. The Souldiers sent to the Senate, to designe the man whom they best liked; the Senate requested the soldiers to elect him whom they held worthiest; in which respectiue complements, and most kinde correspondencie of all parts, eight moneths passed with a peaceable Interregnum, as writers report.

Senate and Souldiers strain courtesie who shall choose the Emperour.

Eusebius. Vopiscus. Orosius. Onuphrius.

(2) It seemeth, the fresh sense and fearfull experiences of the former heady proceedings, made men more wise, then to seeke their owne death, and especially the Generals to be better aduised, then to runne desperately vpon their owne destructions. A change vncredible, that Thirtie ere whiles would needs be stiled Emperours, among the tumultuous Soldiours (though they were sure to buy the vse of that name with their deareſt bloud) and not one now in peace could bee found, either hasty to seeke it, or verie willing to accept it.

Claudius Tacitus elected Emperor.

(3) At last both Senate and Soldiours, hauing in their eye M. Claudius Tacitus, a man very Noble and of Consular degree, of great age, singular learning, & long experience in Magistracie; him by a ioint and conspiring suffrage, they all elected to their Empire: but he hauing before hand some inkling of this their purpose, got him out of the way, liuing very secretly two moneths at his Rurall Mannor, flying (saith Vopiscus) that high dignity which he fore-saw would proue his ouerthrow. And when they did by Embassages often sollicite him to accept of their Election; sending him the Ensignes and Stile of Augustus: hee againe returned them, though with harty thanks, yet absolute deniall, alledging by reason of his age and infirmitie, that hee was euery way vnable to discharge their so great expectations.

(4) But after much inter-course, and many intreaties passed, at length (the necessitie of the State so requiring) he accepted their offer, though not with much contentment to himself, who knew the waight of so great titles would proue heauy & alwaies dangerous for him to beare; but with vnspeakeable ioy, was receiued by the whole State, which promised all blessed hopes to the State vnder so worthy, so wise, so vertuous, learned, and so iust an Emperour.

Claudius Tacitus his vertues.

(5) For as before his aduancement, he was of Exemplary composednes and vertuous disposition, so in this high Estate, his life was temperate, and without al pride; & so desirous to be a Preceder of moderation, & singularity vnto others, as that he would not permit his Empresse to weare any Iewels of high price, nor to vse other customable superfluitie, or excesse in his owne house. For learning and learned men, whom he euer embraced in his priuate Estate, he now by all meanes endeuored to honour and aduance, and publikely professed, that what Imperiall vertues hee had, hee was to ascribe them to his study of good lettters. For which cause, hee was wont to call Cornelius Tacitus (that worthiest Historian of the Romans State) his Father, and commanded his workes to be carefully preserued in euery Library throughout the Empire; and ten times euery yeare to be transcribed on publique cost. All which notwithstanding, many of that worthy Authors Bookes haue since miscaried.

Claudius Tacitus his care to preserue the works of Cornelius Tacitus.

(6) But his vertues were too great for the world long to enioy: and sith his Raigne was but short, it is booteless to lengthen it with long discourses: For his Peace continued without any memory of Warres; and his short time (wherein hee did nothing without consent of the Senate) was spent rather reforming other mens vices, and abuses of the Lawes and State, then in displaying his owne vertues; which doubtlesse (if their faire streame had not beene vntimely stopt) would haue proued incomparable to any his fore-goers, and vnmatchable by any his followers. What death hee died is left vncertaine; Eutropius thinketh him slaine, by his rebellious souldiers in Asia, vpon his voiage against the Persians: but Victor reporteth that hee died a natural death, and that of a burning-feuer, in the cittie of Tharsus: And Flauius Vopiscus, (who wrote his life) saith his death came vpon a surcharge of griefe, by reason of factions; whereby (the infirmitie of his age thereto helping) his vnderstanding was crazed, and his heart broken, whereof hee died, when he had raigned six moneths, and twenty daies, the yeare of Christ Iesus, two hundred seuentie six.

CHAPTER XLI.

M. An. Florianus Emp.

An.Do.277.

Florianus made himſelfe Emperour.

NO ſooner was the death of Tacitus diuulged, but his brother Florianus (much vnlike him in that point) tooke vpon him the Name and Authoritie Imperiall, without expecting any election either of Senate or Souldiers; and therfore not likely long to ſtand ſure. And although in all other princely parts he was not much vnlike his brother, yet hauing ſo great an Oppoſite as Probus was, on whom the Eaſterne Armie had conferred the ſame Title, the bloſſomes of his conceited hope withered euen in the budde, and periſhed before they had any time of growth.

(2) For, no ſooner came to his eares the newes of Probus his election, but he found that heady and precipitate attempts were pleaſing in their Beginnings but full of difficulties in their Proceedings, and moſt diſaſtrous in their Succeſſe: and therefore deſpairing both of Men and Meanes to raiſe the Building, whoſe foundation he had ſo haſtily (but too weakly) laid, he cauſed his owne veines to be cut, as Quintilius before him in like caſe had done, whereby he boldly bled to death, after hee had enioyed a Titular Soueraignty onely eighty daies, ſaith Eutropius: but Vopiſcus ſaith, not altogether two moneths, and thinkes him killed by the Souldiers, in the City Tharſus likewiſe, in the yeere of Chriſt two hundred ſeuenty and ſeuen.

CHAPTER XLII.

Val. Probus Emp.

An.Do.277.

THE Eaſterne Army moſt potent and famous at the death of Tacitus, from them was expected the new Emperours election, which accordingly they did, but with much more wiſedome and deliberate circumſpection, then the Souldiers of thoſe times were accuſtomed to doe. For euery Captaine of the Army ſingled out his owne Companies, and in ſeuerall Aſſemblies exhorted, that all affections laid aſide, they would apply their mindes to thinke of the worthieſt man, on whom they might conferre their voices and fauours. At which time, the opinion of Probus his worth had ſo generally poſſeſſed the hearts of all men, that the ſhout and cry of all was vniforme, Let vs haue Probus for our Emperour. This being ſignified to Rome, the Senate with applauſe and thankes approoued and confirmed his election, with additions to his Title, Auguſtus, The Father of his Countrey, and the higheſt Biſhop. For in thoſe times, euen amongſt Heathens, the ſacred Title of a Biſhop was accounted an additament of honour euen to an Emperour.

Probus called father of his Country, and the higheſt Biſhop.

(2) He was borne in Hungary in the City Sirmia, of honourable Parentage, eſpecially by his mothers ſide. His fathers name was Maximus, a man famous in Military Seruice, who died Tribune at the warrs in Egypt: and himſelfe very young, but very valorous, by by the Emperor Valerianus (who so loued him for his vertues, that he vsed to say of him, that of all men he best deserued the name Probus, that is, vertuous) was made a Tribune also. In which Office, with great praise he serued vnder Galienus, Aurelianus, & Claudius the Emperours: vnder whom, besides other exploits he fought seuerall single-combats to the great honour of himselfe and Country, and receiued as markes of victories, many Ciuicall Crownes, Collars, Bracelets, Launces, Banners, and other Ensignes of Martial deuice and Priuiledge. Preferred to be Generall in Africa, he subdued the Marmarides: In Egypt the Palmerines; vnder Aurelianus the Sarmates and Germans; vnder Claudius the Gothes; and in all places so famous for his Acts, that he was compared with Hannibal and Cæsar.

Probus comparable with Hannibal and Cæsar.

(3) His first seruice after he became Emperour was in Gallia, against the Germans, that had made themselues Lords thereof, where in one Battell, continuing two daies, he slew foure hundred thousand of them, and recouered seuenty Cities, from the Enemy, as himselfe signified by his own Letters to the Senate. After this warring in Sclauonia, he quieted the Prouince of Muscouia, Russia, and Polonia: And entring Thracia, did no lesse in Greece, Syria, Arabia, Palestina, and Iudea; whence passing into Persia, hee had honourable compositions of Narseus their mighty King. Wherupon issued so vniuersall Peace, that there were no warres heard of in all the Prouinces of the Empire; insomuch that it was a common Prouerbe, The very mice durst not gnaw for feare of Probus. But long it lasted not, ere hee was disturbed: for the Egyptians erected one Saturninus, a Captaine both wise an valiant, for Emperour, and that so sore against his will, as he was like to be slaine by them for gaine-saying their desires; and by a speech deliuered to his erectors, he made known to them his auersnes from so dangerous an ambition; to this effect.

Saturninus chosen Emperour.

His speech to his Electors.

" (4) Fellowes and Friends, by my whole endeuours I haue alwaies sought to preuent that, which " now I see I cannot shunne, I meane the Throne of " Maiesty; which howsoeuer to others, it may seeme " full of glory and security, yet to my self, I foresee it " will proue, both base and dangerous: Base, for that " I am no more the master of mine owne affections; " which hitherto in my priuate estate were bestowed " freely, & where I thought best, but must hēce-forth " be carried at other mens dispose, & cast vpon those " that deserue them least. That little time that I was " wont to take, in retyring my selfe to my selfe, must " now be straitned to serue others; and my thoughts " wholly spent to prenent those weapons, which are " borne (in shew) for my defence, but are (in truth " the keyes of mine Imprisonment. I cannot go with- " out a Guard: I cannot sleepe, without a watch; I " cannot eate without a Taster; these are but bonda- " ges to a free condition, and neuer neede in a pri- " nate fortune. That it is dangerous, it is no lesse appa- " rant: for besides the sharpe-pointed & waighty sword " hanging onely by a twisted threed ouer our heads, " Probus is not a Gallienus to compound for the Dia- " dem, but to touch his scepter, is to awake a sleeping " Lion: What should moue you then, to stir vp his " wrath, to seeke my death, and your owne destructi- " ons? For assure your selues when I die, I shal not die " alone: So all our fame purchased in so many yeers " imploiments, shall be lost by this one daies worke: " and my Conquests in Africa, of the Moores, and in " Spaine, branded lastly with the eternall scarres and " infamy of Rebellion.

(5) These speeches (as Flauius Vopisc. the writer thereof receiued them from the report of his Grand-father, who was there present and heard them) could nothing at all diuert the resolution of the Souldiers, but that they persisted and maintained their election against Probus: who vpon notice thereof, hastning toward them with a mighty power, offered them pardon, as one vnwilling to shed Ciuill-bloud, or to lose so worthy a man as Saturninus was: but vpon refusall of his proffered Clemencie, hee gaue him a most sharpe battell, wherein most of the Reuoulters were ouerthrowne, and Saturninus in the assault of a Castle besieged, was slaine, to the great griefe of Probus, who sought to haue saued his life.

(6) But with his death ended not all Ciuill Broiles: for Bonosus & Proculus two monsters of that age (though of different kinds of vices) opposing themselues against him, and assuming the Title and Robes Imperiall, vsurped the Prouinces of Britaine, Spaine and some part of Gallia, knowing that in these places Probus was not much beloued. Bonosus was borne in Britaine, but brought vp in Spaine, without note of action, but onely in his cups, for hee was esteemed the greatest drinker of all men liuing: insomuch as Aurel. said of him, he was born nō vt viueret, sed vt biberet; not to draw breath, but to draw in liquor: & yet (as it seemeth) hee was in good account vnder the said Aurelianus, hauing a charge of Ships vpon the Germane Seas, which either by treacherie or negligence were burned by the Enemy, in the mouth of Rhine, and (as Probus tooke it) not without the priuity of Bonosus: who therefore not daring to stand to the triall, made all his powers against the Emperour, but was in Battell ouercome, and despairing euer againe to make head, put his owne in a halter, whereupon it was said, that a Barrell was hanged, and not a Man.

(8) Some stirs there were at that present in Britany by the incitements of their Gouernor whose name though Histories doe not specifie, yet he may seeme to be that Cl. Corn. Lalianus, whose ancient Coynes are found in this Iland, and not else-where: and his meanes to the place, was Victorinus a Moore, in great fauour with Probus: who taking himselfe not cleare from suspition got leaue of his Emperor to repaire vnto Britaine, where giuing it out that he was come thither for safety of his Life, was courteously receiued by the Generall. Whom secretly in the night hee murthered, and then speedily returned to Rome; hauing by this Expedition, both appeased the tumults in the Prouince, and approued his fidelity to Probus. About this time (as is recorded) certaine Vandals and Burgundians that had inuaded Gallia were sent into Britaine by the Emperour to inhabite, who though they had troubled the Romans peace in Gallia, yet did them good seruice in Britaine to stay their subiection; and the Britaines themselues for some good seruices were now suffred by these Emperours, to plant Vines, and make Wines with other matters aswell for pleasure as profit.

POBVS thus ſlaine in the midſt of his Army, without any apparant cauſe miniſtred, the Souldiers were ſtricken into a great feare, and miſtruſted each other to be guilty of the Treaſon: no man therefore diligent to finde out the beginner, nor haſty to puniſh the bloudy executors; but holding the right of Election to remain in themſelues, they preſẽtly choſe Carus for their Emperor, who had been the Pretorian Præfect, valiant, ſufficient, of worth and eſteeme; whereunto the Senate likewiſe conſented.

(2) From whence or what parents we ſhould deriue his birth, is vncertaine, and of diuers writers diuerſly reported. For Flauius Cæcilianus, who wrot the ſtory of his time, as Vopiſcus doth report, ſaith, that he was born in Sclauonia, or as we call it, Moſcouia. Oneſimus an ancient writer affirmeth his birth was in Rome, and that his father was a Sclauonian indeed, but held for a citizen, as he citeth by letters from Vopiſcus: Aurelius Victor, Euſebius, and Paulus Oroſius wil haue him a French man, and borne at Narborne: but whence ſoeuer, his princely parts deſerued theſe his princely preferments, and no waies for the ſhort time of his raigne, carried he himſelfe vnder expectation. (3) His firſt proceedings was to finde out the murtherers of Probus, whom he ſeuerely puniſhed, which tooke away all ſuſpition of treaſon in himſelf. Then marching againſt the Sarmates, whoſe furie had pierced ſo far into Panonia, that they threatned Italy it ſelf, he ouerthrew with the ſlaughter of ſixteen thouſand, and tooke twenty thouſand of them priſoners. And leauing Carinus (his elder ſonne) to gouerne Britaine, Gallia, Illyricum, and Spaine, himſelfe with the younger, Numerianus, prepard for the Eaſt againſt the Perſians, in which expedition he tooke in his way Meſopotamia, Seleucia, and certaine cities whom the enemy had entred: and being ſurprized with ſicknes, and not able to trauel, pitched his Pauilion vpon the ſhore of Tigris, where in the midſt of his armie (about the yeere of our ſaluation 283.) garded from all ſuppoſed dangers and aſſaults of man, felt the vnexpected ſtroke of death euen from the hand of God himſelfe: for in his bed by a thunderbolt falling from heauen, he was ſlain, with many others thẽ preſent with him in his tent, and the ſame conſumed altogether with lightning fire.

Cardinus ſlaine by a thunderbolt.

(4) The terrour thereof ſo daunted the courage of his whole army, that no further they proceeded in their enterpriſe: and his death was ſo grieuous vnto Numerianus now elected Emperor, that with continuall weeping (a fault in few ſonnes who are raiſed by their fathers fall) his eies were ſo weakned, that he could not indure any light. Vpon which accident, Arrius Aper, (his wiues father) tooke occaſion to cõſpire his death, hoping thereby to attaine the Empire himſelfe. For hauing at all times free acceſſe to his preſence, at length in his cloſet he ſecretly murthered him; pretending to the army, that his infirmity onely kept him from fight; and ſo leauing his body to putrifie and corrupt, in ſhort ſpace by the very ſauor therof the treaſon was diſcried, and the Traitor ſlaine by the hands of Diocleſian, who was both his Iudge and executioner.

(5) His Empire thus ended before it was well begunne, the army proclaimed Diocleſian, a Principall man in the Campe for Emperour: who to vphold his electiõ, made al his power for Gallia, againſt his Concurrent Carinus, a man of profuſe ſenſuality, who there had cauſed himſelfe to be proclaimed, and in his fathers abſence had ſo ruled there and in Britaine; that Porphyrio liuing at the ſame time, gaue out this teſtimony, that Britaine was a fertile Prouince of tyrants. Val. Dioclef. Emp.

Val. Maximian, Cæſar and Emp.

HE Empire thus deuolued to Diocleſian, with approbation of the Senate, hee euery way ſtudied to bee accounted worthy of the ſame, as knowing well his birth was no way anſwerable to his preſent lot: and therefore choſe for his Cæſar, Maximianus, a man of better deſcent, very honourable, wiſe, and valiant, as was manifeſted in his firſt ſeruice againſt the Gaules, whom with an infinite number of peſants in that prouince, troubling the peace of the Romans, hee with much ſlaughter ouercame. For which exploit ſo fortunately accompliſhed, the Emperour made him his Conſort in the Gouernment.

(2) Diocleſians parentage is vncertainely reported by Writers; ſome making him the ſonne of a Notary, and others of a meere Bondman; but all agreeing that his Country was Dalmatia, & his offspring very baſe. This man being but a Common Souldier, conſulted with a Witch for his future ſucceſſe; who told him (if you pleaſe to beleeue the reporters) that he ſhould become an Emperour after he had killed a Bore: to which he gaue credit, and euer was a great enemie to that beaſt, and in time grew vnder Probus to ſo great account for dexterity in expediting his affaires, that he was made Steward of his houſe, and now laſtly elected to the Empire.

Paulus Oroſius: Eutropius.

(3) The very firſt thing that he attempted, was the puniſhmẽt of his predeceſſors death: for which Arius Aper being conuicted before his tribunall ſeat, himſelfe riſing ſuddenly from the throne, ran him thorow with his ſword, in outward ſhew for zeale of Iuſtice, as not able to endure ſo foule a fact: but in truth to fulfill the Prediction of his hoſteſſe, the Druide; for that Aper ſignifieth a Bore. After which act, he held his Empire fully eſtabliſhed.

(4) To let paſſe many emploiments and troubles of the State, theſe two Emperors choſe to thẽſelues two Cæſars, whereby the One-bodied Eagle became againe foure-headed, and each almoſt of an equall authority. Diocleſian choſe Galerius Maximinus; & Maximianus, ſurnamed Herculius, choſe Conſtantius Clorus a Roman Senator, enforcing them to put away their former Wiues, & to take their Daughters for an aſſurance of loue by the bonds of that Alliance; of whom the former was imploied for defence of Illyricum, and the other afterwards into Britaine againſt the Rebellion there raiſed by Carauſius, whoſe coine is here ſet.

Carauſius a Britaine vaiſeth rebellion in An. 287 Bed hiſt. Ang. lib. 1. cap. 6.

(5) This Carauſius, by birth was a Menapian, but of low Parentage, as Beda and Eutropius ſaith; who being appointed Admirall by the Romans to guard the Britiſh Seas, from the Pyracies of the Saxons and Lower Germans, (who with continuall robberies waſted the coaſts) abuſed his authority both in ſuffering thoſe pirates to paſſe vnder Compoſitions, and in taking many Shippes and much ſubſtance from the true Subiect to his owne vſe: whereby in ſhort time he became very rich, and (like a cat ſet to keepe mice from the larder) did more miſchiefe then the Robbers themſelues. Sabellicus reports one very politike cuſtome wherby he inriched himſelfe; & that was, by ſuffering the Pirats to take as much ſpoiles as poſsibly they could before hee woud ſurpriſe them; whereby they were his inſtruments to rob others, and nothing to better themſelues.

Beda hiſt. Ang. lib. 1. cap. 6.

(6) Maximianus then warring in Gallia, and fearing the greatnes of his wealth and power, ſent ſecretly to ſlay him by treachery; and in the meane while ſurpriſed many of his principall men at * Geſſoriacum.

*Now called Boleyn in Picardy.

(7) Carauſius now rich & cempaſſed with friends, ſeeing his deſtruction thus intended and ſought, thought thought that death was but death as well to Prince as to Peazant: and therefore with a bold reſolution, and aid of the Picts or Northerne Britaines, (who had been alwaies enemies to the Roman Subiection) put on the Purple Robe, and vſurped the Authoritie and Title of Emperour, which hee moſt valiantly maintained in ſundry Battles, and ſo kept it for the terme of ſeuen yeeres.

Carauſius defendeth his vſurpation ſeuen yeers. Maximianus againſt Carauſius.

(8) Againſt him Maximianus ſet forward with a puiſſant Armie, and marched to the Britiſh Ocean: but there vnderſtanding the power of his Enemie, and finding himſelfe in want of men for Sea-ſeruice, hee pitched downe his Tents: and knowing Carauſius a man meet to command the Ilanders, and able to defend them againſt the other warlike Nations, ſent him offers of peace: the making of which is remembred vnto vs by the Coine of Carauſius before expreſſed, whereon are ſtamped the Portraitures of two Emperours ioining hands. So himſelf returning againſt the Batauians, left Carauſius for Britaine, who gouerned the Prouince with an vpright and vnſtained reputation, and with exceeding peaceableneſſe, notwithſtanding the incurſions of the Barbarous. He reedified the wall (as Ninnius the diſciple of Eluodugus writeth) between the mouthes of Clauda and Carunus, fortifiing the ſame with ſeuen Caſtles, and built a round houſe of poliſhed ſtone vpon the banke of the Riuer Carun, which (ſome thinke) tooke name of him, erecting therewith a Triumphall Arch in remembrance of Victorie. Howbeit, Buchanan thinks the ſame to be the Temple of Termiuus, & not the foundation of Carauſius.

Ninius.

But the date of his noble Gouernment was brought now to a period, by the Treaſon of Allectus his familiar friend, one whom he had imploied in managing of the State, who thirſting after the Supreme Authoritie, betraied his truſt, and treacherouſly murdered him by a wile, putting on himſelfe the Purple-Robe, ſtamping this his Image vpon the publike Coine as an abſolute Soueraigne, and aſſuming the Title Imperiall, about the yeere of Chriſt 294.

A perfidious friend.

(9) Conſtantius Clorus who had leuied an Armie, and was come with great ſpeede vnto Bulloigne in France, (a Towne that Carauſius had ſometime fortified and kept) hearing now of his death, determined the recouery of Britaine; and after great preparations, paſsing the Seas, in a dark fogge or miſt, vpon that Shore landed his men without impeachment: which done, hee fired his owne Ships, therby to fruſtrate all hopes of eſcape. Allectus, who had laien to intercept his comming, forſooke alſo the Seas, and meeting at vnawares with Aſclepiodotus, great Seneſchall of the Prætorium, as a deſperate man, haſted vpon his owne death: for encountring with him, hee neither ordered his Battle, nor marſhalled his men, but fought at randome very vnfortunately: and hauing put off his Purple Garment, he was among many other ſlaine, when he had held his eſtate the terme of three yeers.

Allectus ſlaine.

The Frankners and others of the Barbarous Souldiers eſcaping the Battle, ſought to ſacke London, and ſo to be gone: but as good happe was, the Souldiers of Conſtantius, which by reaſon of a miſtie and foggy aire were ſeuered from the reſt, at vnawares came to Lodon, where they reſcued their Allies, and making great ſlaughter of the Enemie, ſlew Gallus their Leader, caſting his body into a Brooke that then ran thorow the Citie, which thence after was called by the Britainet Nant-gall, and by the Engliſh, his Gallus Brooke, where now a faire Street is built, called (vpon that occaſion) to this day Walbrooke.

Walbrooke in London of Gallus. Camb. Trinob.

(10) The deaths of theſe two Vſurpers, with the recouerie of the Britaines vnto their wonted obedience, was accounted ſo great a benefit to the Romans, that it is moſt gloriouſly commended, and Rhetorically ſet downe in a Panegyricke Oration aſcribed to Mamertinus, in the praiſe of Diocleſian, Maximianus, and Conſtantius: where (after he had extolled the fertilitie of the Britiſh Soile, and the Riches that the Empire reaped thēce) he ſet forth the ſtrength of the Enemy, growne to ſo dangerous a head: and concluded with this Acclamation; O what a manifold Victory was this, worthie vndoubtedly of innumerable Triumphs, by which Victorie Britaine is reſtored to the Empire, their Confederates brought to obedience, and the Seas ſecured to a perpetuall quietneſſe! Glory you therefore (inuincible Emperour) for that you haue as it were gotten another World, and in reſtoring to the Romans puiſſance the glory of the Conqueſt by Sea, haue added to the Roman Empire an Element greater then all the compaſſe of the Earth, that is, the mightie maine Ocean it ſelfe: and afterwards now by your Victories (Inuincible Conſtantius Cæſar) whatſoeuer did lie vacant about Amiens, Beauois, Trois, and Langres, beginneth to flouriſh with Inhabitants of ſundry Nations. Yea and moreouer, that your moſt obedient City Autum, for whoſe ſake I haue a peculiar cauſe to reioice, by meanes of this Triumphant Victorie in Britaine, hath receiued many and ſundry ſorts of Artizans, of whom thoſe Prouinces were full. And now by their workmanſhip the ſame Citie riſeth vp, by repairing of Ancient Houſes, and reſtoring of Publike Buildings and Temples: ſo that now it accounteth that the old name of brotherly Incorporation to Rome is againe reſtored, when ſhee hath you eſt-ſonnes for her Founder.

(11) But leauing Conſtantius to be further ſpoken of in his due place, let vs purſue the Raignes of theſe two Tyrants, who new began the Perſecutions of Gods Saints in all the parts of the Empire, wherein the rage of Satan ſo preuailed, that ſeuenteene thouſand men and women were crowned with matyrdome, within the ſpace of one moneth, beſides infinite numbers of ſuch as were otherwiſe puniſhed.

As in other Countries, ſo heere in Britaine the Chriſtians Churches were demoliſhed, their Bibles and other godly writings burned, and themſelues tormented with a more cruell and longer continuance then formerly had beene vſed: for this endured the terme of ten whole yeeres together, leauing no time of intermiſsion, nor place free from the ſtaine of Martyrs Bloud.

And amongſt others, it made Britaine to be honored with the glory of many holy Martyrs, which conſtantly ſtood and died in the Confeſsion of the Faith; whereof the firſt is reported to bee Albane of the City Verolamium, who was beheaded at Holmehurſt (ſince called Derſwold) where now the Towne of S. Albans (bearing his name) is built, and in whoſe honour, Offa the great King of Mercia founded a moſt magnificent Monaſterie. Sundry others alſo in other places laied downe their liues for their Profeſsion ſake, as Iulius & Aaron at Leiceſter, ſaith Beda, or rather at Caer-leō in Monmouthſhire, as our Grand-Antiquarie iudgeth: and in Leichfield ſo many, that the place became another Golgotha, A Field of dead Corps. For which cauſe the Citie doth beare an Eſcocheon or Field charged with many Martyres for their Seale of Armes euē vnto this day.

And as Famine in great Warres is not greatly ſtrange; ſo Scarſitie exceeding Plentie, was ſeene vnder the opening of the Third Seale; whence a Black horſe ſent from God, paſſed through the earth, whoſe Rider bare a Ballance to weigh Corne, as it were Spice for dearth: and in the raigne of this laſt Tyrant Diocleſian, they that had Eagles eies might ſee threefold iudgements of God in the opening of the Fourth Seale, when Sword, Famine, & Death went all together as a pale-horſe, ſent frō the preſence of the Lamb, whoſe rider was Death and Hell, following as his Page. Theſe were the times of calamities, when as the Soules of the righteous in the opening of the Fiſt Seale, cried for vengance for the bloud of the Martyrs, whom theſe ten hornes had gored to death: and vnder the Sixth Seale, both then, and for euer the wicked are ſaid to call for the Mountaines to fall vpon them, and for the rockes to hide them from the preſence of Him that ſate vpon the Throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb, before whom none could ſtand.

(15) It was the nineteenth yeere of his raigne, in the month of March, when this Tyrant ſent forth his wicked Edicts through all his Empire; That all churches ſhould be vtterly ouerthrowne; that the Scriptures ſhould be burnt; that all Chriſtians for honour ſhould bee held infamous, and all Chriſtian ſeruants ſhould bee held vncapeable of freedome, that all Paſtors ſhould be inforced to offer to Idols, &c.

Euſeb. eccleſ hiſt. lib. 8. cap. 1. 2. 3.

(16) The fountaine & chiefe cauſe of theſe miſeries lighting on the Church of Chriſt, did ariſe from the Chriſtians themſelues, as Euſebius in theſe words declareth: After that our conuerſation through too much libertie and licentiouſneſſe was degenerated, and holy diſcipline corrupted, whiles euery one of vs did enuie, bite, and backbite each other, waging inteſtine warres within our ſelues, and piercing one anothers hearts, with the ſharpe ſpeares of opprobrious words; ſo that Biſpops againſt Biſhops, and people againſt people were at bitter contention: Laſtly, whiles nothings but hypocriſie was in the face, deceit in the heart, and guile in the tongue, whereby miſchiefe was euen full at the brimme, then began the heauy hand of God to viſit vs, &c. Where he proceedeth and ſheweth that the greeuous ſinnes of the Chriſtians, were the cauſe of drawing downe theſe iudgments on their heads.

Euſeb. biſt. eccleſ. lib. 8. cap. 1.

(17) And ſo this wicked Tyrant accordingly was but as Gods Inſtrument and Iron-threſhing-ſtaile, to bruiſe the precious wheat and ſeed of the Goſpell, and to cruſh that outward glory of the Chriſtian profeſſion, which then was floriſhing in moſt parts of the world.

Amos 1. 3.

(18) But long the Lord deferred not their releaſe, nor that Tyrants end. For after the Firſt yeere of their perſecutions, and twentieth of his Raigne, the thirteenth day of Aprill, in the yeere of Chriſts Natiuity three hundred and three, hee with his Fellow Emperor (both of them by the reuenging hand of God, ſtricken with a mad, humor) ſaith Euſebius) renounced the Empire, and deſcending from the Tribunall put off their Purple and Imperiall robes, whereby they againe became Priuate men.

Euſeb. Eccleſ. biſt. lib. 8. ca. 21.

(19) Diocleſian retired into Dalmatia, where in the Citie Salonia, hee poiſoned himſelfe, as Aurelius Victor affirmeth: and Euſebius ſayth, that no ſmall diſeaſe ouertooke him, for that hee dyed mad. His conſort Maximinianus eſcaped not vnpuniſhed, but died for attempting the Murther of Conſtantius, and as Euſebius auoucheth, he hanged himſelfe in the City Marſillis: ſuch ignominious deaths followed theſe two perſecuting Tyrants, wherof Diocleſian had formerly made himſelfe a God, and by an Edict commanded his Foote to be kiſſed: a practiſe pretily ſince imitated by his Succeſſors, who haue reuiued the wounded Head of the Beaſt, and haue trod his ſteppes in wounding and perſecuting the true members of Chriſt.

FLAV. VALER. CONSTANTIVS CHLORVS, C. GALERIVS VALERIVS MAXIMIANVS.

CHAPTER XLV.

Conſtantius Chlorus, Emp.

G. Val. Maximianus, Emp.

Diocleſian and Maximianus reſigned vp the Empire the 9. Cal. of May, in the yeere of Chriſt 304.

Galerius and Conſtantius Emperors.

The Chriſtians enioy peace.

Diocleſian and Maximianus reſigning vp their Soueraignties (as is ſaid) at the Citie Nicomedia in Bithynia, cõmitted the charge thereof, and the defence of the Common-weale vnto Galerius and Conſtantius, who had been their Cæſars: vpon which occaſion, great peace followed in the Church of Chriſt, and moſt eſpecially vnto theſe weſterne Prouinces. For thoſe Emperors confirmed by the Senate, preſently diuided the Empire betwixt them, as two Seuerall Eſtates, and not ſubiect to one Gouernment, as formerly had been exerciſed; which (as Euſebius hath noted) was the fatall end of the Imperial Glorie.

(2) Vnto Galerius fell the gouernement of Sclauonia, Macedonia, Thracia, Egypt, and the Prouinces in Aſia, who tooke for eaſe of that burden theſe two, whoſe Coines we haue here expreſſed:

Maximianus and Seuerus made Cæſars.

C. Galerius, Valer. Maximianus, and Aurel. Valer. Seuerus his ſiſters ſonnes, whom in the yeere of Chriſt three hundred and ſix, hee elected Cæſars, and after Auguſti; which honours the laſt enioied not long, for he was ſlaine at Rome by the treachery of Maxentius, after one yeare. And the other, when he had foure yeeres gouerned as Cæſar, and three as Auguſtus in the Eaſt, died at Tharſus in Cilicia.

(3) And to the lot of Conſtantius, who much at one time with his Copartner, elected his ſonne Conſtantine (ſo famous in Chriſtian hiſtorie) Cæſar, fell Italy, France, Britaine, Spaine, Germany, and moſt of the Prouinces in Africke: which ſeeming to him (who rather choſe to gouerne well then much) too ſpatious, gaue vp to Galerius all that in Africke, as too remote from the Seat of his reſidence, and eie of his directiõ.

Conſtantine the Great elected Cæſar.

(4) This good Emperour was for his Paleneſſe ſurnamed Chlorus, by birth a Roman, his father named Eutropius, his Mother Claudia, Neece to the Emperor Claudius. Himſelfe had attained the dignitie of a Senator, and was both Wiſe, Valiant, Noble, and Vertuous; whoſe parts Euſebius doth thus commend.

Euſeb. eccleſ. Hiſt. lib. 8. cap. 16.

Conſtantius was a man of ſingular clemencie towards men, and pietie towards God. He did not partake with him in crueltie, whoſe partaker he was in Soueraignetie: neither ſtaining his Raigne with the bloud of the Saints, nor deſtroying our Churches and places of Prayer, as Maximianus furiouſly did; but rather he reuerenced and highly honoured thoſe who truly honoured God. For which God ſo bleſſed him, that this godly Father left a more godly Sonne Conſtantine, the Heire of his well-gotten Empire.

(5) To which his vertues, other Authors adde, that he was of great affabilitie, louing, and gentle, little regarding his Priuate Profit, but altogether raigning to inrich his Subiects, and to that end would often ſay; That it was more behoouefull for the weale publike, that the wealth of the Land ſhoud be diſperſed into the commons hands, then to lie locked vp in Princes coffers. In which kind, ſo auerſe he was frõ all ſuperfluities, that hee may be adiudged faulty the other way: for vpon Feſtiuall daies, and in his Entertainments of Strangers, he was faine to borrow Plate of his friends (for ſuch many times are richer then their Soueraignes) to furniſh his Table and Cupbords.

Pomp. Lætus.

(6) But aboue all other vertues, was his louing countenance and protection to the late perſecuted Chriſtians, making his Court their Sanctuarie, and his Chapell their Oratorie. And to winnow the Chaffe from the Wheat, he vſed the like policie as Iehu King of Iſrael ſometime had done againſt the Prieſts of Baal. For he commanded all his Officers to offer ſacrifice to the Idoll-Gods, pretending to diſ-court all ſuch as refuſed: but contrariwiſe thoſe that obeied thee put from him, with this reproſe, that hee who is diſloyall to his God, will neuer be true nor iruſtie to his Prince.

2. Kin. 10 20.

Conſtantius politie to trie who were true Chriſtians.

(7) When he was firſt made Cæſar, he was forced to forſake his firſt wife Helena, by whom hee had his vertuous ſonne Conſtantine, and to take Theodora daughter in Law to Maximianus, for a further confirmation of friendſhip.

Conſtantius his wiues.

(8) Helena by birth was a Britaine, the daughter of Cœlus a Britiſh Prince, as ſaith Eutropius, though Nicephorus make her of Bithynia, and Beda termes her his Concubine, ſome an Inne-holder, and others for her perſon and parentage ſtand very doubtfull: to meet with whom, let vs heare the cenſure of Times Chiefe Secretarie, the learned Cambden in his Britannia: Conſtantius (ſaith hee) what time hee ſerued in Britaine vnder Aurelian, tooke to wife Helena daughter of Cœlus or Cœlius a Britiſh Prince, on whom he begat that noble Conſtantine the Great in Britaine; for ſo (togither with that great Hiſtoriographer Baronius) the common opinion of all other Writers with one conſent beare witneſſe, vnleſſe it bee one or two petty Greeke Authors of late time, and thoſe diſſenting one from the other; and a very learned man, grounding vpon a corrupt place of Iul. Firmicus. Howbeit, compelled he was by Maximianus to put her away, for to mary Theodora his daughter. This is that Helena which in Antique Inſcription; is called VENERABILIS and PIISSIMA AVGVSTA, and for Chriſtian Pietie, for cleanſing Ieruſalem of Idols, for building a goodly Church in the place where our Lord ſuffered, and for finding the ſauing Croſſe, is ſo highly commended of Eccleſiaſticall Writers.

An. Do. 306.

THE Father thus departing both gloriously and peaceably, in the presence of his Son and sage counsellers; the griefe in the losse of the Sire was no greater then was the ioy conceiued that they had gained the sonne for his Successour: all men reioicing at the good fortune of that iourny, wherein hee came to close the eies of his dying father, & to comfort the sorrow of his mournefull Country-men.

Euseb. Eccl. Hist. lib. 8. c. 14.

Socrat. Eccl. Lib. 1. cap. 2.

For forthwith heere in Britain by acclamation of the people, assistance of the Souldiers, and aduice of Erocus King of the Almans (who by the way had accompanied him hither in his flight from Rome) they proclaimed him at all hands Emperour, and Successour to that part of the world which his father held. This election was ioifully ratified by the Senate; and of al other Prouinces so gladly accepted, that they ac counted this Iland most happy of all other, whose chance was first to see him their Cæsar, as in these words of the Panegiryst is seene: O fortunate Britaine, and more happy then all other Lands, that hast the first sight of Constantine Cæsar.

Panegyricke Oration vnto Constantine the great.

(2) His birth (as is said) was in Britaine, and honourably descended; his father a Roman Senator, Cæsar and Emperor; his mother a Britaine, (daughter to Cœlus) a Princesse vertuous, wise, chaste, and religious: himselfe in true Piety degenerating from neither. At his first entrance he pursued the reliques of the warre which his father had begunne against the Caledonians, and other Picts, subduing the Britains that were more remote, and Inhabitants of those Ilands that are witnesses (saith one) of the Sunnes set or going downe.

Eutropius. Constantines descent.

Euseb. in vit. Constantini.

(3) Maxentius the sonn of Maximianus Herculius, who at the death of Constantius was proclaimed Augustus by the tumultuous Pretorian Souldiers at Rome, and Romulus his sonne (whose face wee haue heere with his fathers from both their moneies expressed) was created his Cæsar (the way to that Seat of Maiesty whereunto hee had too hastily and most vnduly climed:) for now this Vsurper by his Necromancies, Adulteries, Persecutions and murders, was growne so vntolerable and odious, that the Senate sent to Constantine, craving his aid and redresse; who sore lamenting the sores of the Empire, and the case of the Christians, first wrote: but that taking no effect, prepared his forces against Maxentius.

Sabellius

Maximianus the father, either in true zeale or fained pretences (which by the sequell is more probable) tooke great offence at his sonne Maxentius vnsufferable outragiousnesse; and vnder colour of dislikes and redresse, repaired to his sonne in law Constantine that had married his daughter Fausta, and notwithstanding his faire pretences before the face of Constantine, yet secretly he tampered with Fausta to make away her husband. But the good Lady wel knowing that the bond of a child is great, but greater the loue of a wife, reuealed his treachery to Constantine, who caused him thereupon to be put to death, a fit end for so bloody a Tyrant. And ripe was the like destiny for his no way-degenerating sonne, against whom hee prepared his forces: and drawing Licinius Gouernour of Sclauonia, who was made Cæsar, to his side, by giuing him his sister Constantia to wife, (a man but of an ordinary descent, though Galienus Maximinus had made him in Illyria his Copartner in the East) hasted towards Rome with an Host of ninety thousand foot, and eight thousand horse; leuied out of Britaine, France and Germanie.

Maximianus put to death by Constantine.

(4) But knowing well that successe in warre dependeth more on diuine assistance then humane strength, and doubtfull what God he should in this blessed enterprise inuocate for aid, (for as yet he was not fully setled in the Christian Faith, though the Gods of the Gentiles he obserued altogether deceitful) cast vp in this his holy meditation his eies Eastward to heauen, and had by diuine ordinance presented to him in obiect the signe of a Crosse, wherein were Starres (as letters) so placed, that visibly might bee read this sentence in Greeke, IN HOC VINCE, as diuers Authors report.

Yet are there some frō the testimony of Eusebius himselfe, vnto whom this blessed man did declare his vision, that affirme this forme being the first Greeke Character of the name of Christ (to which the reuerse of Decentius hereafter expressed, as of many others may adde much probability) rather then either of these, although Tertullian and S. Ierome affirme that the latter was the very figure of the Crosse whereon our Sauiour died: but this as a question beyond my iudgement or intention, I leaue to these learned Diuines and others, who haue laboured in that subiect with curious search.

(5) This miraculous ſigne promiſing Victory and that (ſaith Euſebius) not in an Inſcription only, but by voice of Angels, was ſo comfortable to Conſtantin, that with great courage he went forward, bearing before him and his victorious Army, in place of the Imperiall Standard, the forme of this viſion imbrodered with gold and ſtones of greateſt price. And as one armed from heauen, proceeded againſt his helliſh aduerſary.

Pomp. Lætus Maxentius truſteth to Sorcerers. Sabellicus.

Maxentius as much depending vpon his Sorcerers, was no leſſe aſſured of the victory. In furtherance whereof, as a ſtratagem of warre, he framed a deceitfull Bridge ouer the riuer Tyber neere to Pons Miluius to intrap Conſtantine: but ioyning battell, and ouerlaid with ſtrokes, retired and fled, and (whether for haſte, or through forgetfulneſſe) tooke ouer the ſame Bridge, which ſuddenly failing vnder him, hee was with many more drowned, and Conſtantine remained victor. In memory whereof, he cauſed a triumphal Arch to be erected in the midſt of Rome, wherein his Statue was imboſſed, holding in his Right hand a Croſſe, according to the faſhion of that which hee had ſeene in the heauens: and vpon ancient inſcription in memory of this victory, this we finde engrauen: INSTINCTV DIVINITATIS, MENTIS MAGNITVDINE CVM EXERCITV SVO, TAM DE TYRANNO QVAM DE OMNI EIVS FACTIONE, VNO TEMPORE IVSTIS REMP, VLTVS EST ARMIS: Thus: By inſtinct of the diuine power, with great magnanimitie and helpe of his army in a lawfull warre, he reuenged the cauſe of the common wealth, as well on the Tyrant himſelfe, as on his whole faction all at once. With the like ſucceſſe had he warred againſt the Frankners in Batauia, whoſe victory was likewiſe ſtamped in gold, where is a woman ſitting vnder a Trophey, and leaning her head vpon a Croſſe-bow, with this inſcription, FRANCIA.

(6) But as his fame increaſed in the mindes of moſt, ſo was it as much maligned by Licinius his fellow Emperour and Brother in Law; who in his heart neuer fauoured the Chriſtians, howſoeuer for a time outwardly he ſuffered their Religion: but at laſt, ſeeking occaſions againſt Conſtantine, he raiſed a cruell Perſecution in the Eaſt, where he raigned with Martinianus, whom at Byzantium, & Iulius Licinius Licinianus at Arlas, he had before made Cæſars: permitting thē to ſtampe theſe monies, as markes of Soueraignty

(7) By this affliction of Gods Church, he inforced this champion of God for their defence to prepare his forces, with which he met Licinius in Hungary, where he gaue him a great ouerthrow. But hee eſcaping to Byzantium, in Aſia the leſſe, ioyned again battell, and was there taken Priſoner: yet by the mediation of his wife Conſtantia, had his life ſpared, and was confined within the city Nicomedia; where for his treaſons afterwards, he and his ſonne Licinianus that ſomewhat ſuruiued him, were put to death. And now the peace of Gods Saints manifeſtly appeared, and the progreſſe of the Goſpell paſſed vntroubled.

Licinius put to death at Nicomedia, and his ſonne after. Anno 326.

(8) For now (ſaith our Gyldas) no ſooner was the blaſting tempeſt and ſtorme of Perſecution blowne ouer, but the faithfull Chriſtians, who in time of trouble and danger, had hidden themſelues in woods & deſerts, and in ſecret caues, being come abroad to open ſight, reedified the Churches ruinated to the very ground. The temples of holy Martyres they founded, and erected (as it were) the Banners of victory in euery place, celebrating feſtiuall holy daies, and with pure hearts and mouths performing the ſacred ceremonies: for the which bleſſedneſſe, he euer after had the Attributes aſcribed vnto him of moſt bleſſed Emperour, moſt pious, happy Redeemer of Romes City, Founder of Peace, Reſtorer of Rome, and of the whole World, moſt great, inuincible Auguſtus, Sacred, Diuine, and of ſacred memory, &c: Howbeit, for admitting theſe praiſes, as it ſhould ſeeme, he is taxed by Eutropius & Victor of pride; as alſo cruelty, for putting to death Criſpus his ſonne (by Mineruina his concubine; whom hee had made Cæſar, and permitted to ſtampe theſe monies here vnder inſerted) as likewiſe his wife Fauſta ſiſter to Maxentius: but others affirme that the cauſes of their deaths were iuſt, though (as Paulus Oroſius ſaith) the reaſon thereof was kept ſecret, and Zoſimus doth therein excuſe him, as Caſſiodore relateth, and ſo doth Rufinus and Euſebius.

(9) Touching Conſtantines affaires in this Iland, it appeareth by the laſt Author, that after his Fathers death, and his owne departure out of this Country, ſome aſpiring mind taking aduantage of his abſence, in other warres, perſuaded the people here to withdraw their obedience. Wherupon once againe he addreſſed himſelfe with his Army to the reeſtabliſhing of the Ilands ſubiection: and paſſing (ſaith Euſebius) ouer into Britaine, incloſed on euery ſide within the banks of the Ocean, he conquered the ſame. The ioyfull memory of this expedition is regiſtred to poſterity vpon his Coine ſet in the entrance of this Chapter, inſcribed Aduentus Auguſti, and by theſe Letters, P.L.N. the place of the Mint to be at London.

Euſebius.

(10) After this (ſaith the ſame Author) he began to compaſſe in his mind other parts of the World, to the end he might come in time to ſuccour thoſe that wanted helpe: and when he had furniſhed his Army with milde and modeſt inſtructions of piety, hee inuaded Britaine, that hee might likewiſe inſtruct thoſe that dwell inuironed round about with the waues of the Ocean: bounding the Suns ſetting as it were with thoſe coaſts. And of the Politicall gouernment therein by him altered, let it not ſeeme offenſiue that I, who know and profeſſe mine owne weake ſight in moſt of theſe matters, doe light my dimme candle, at the Bright-ſhining Lampe of that Illuſtious Antiquary, who ſaith:

Cambden in his Britannia.

(11) About this time (ſaith he) as euidently appeareth by the Code of Theodoſius, Pacatianus was the Vicegerent of Britaine: for by this time the Prouince had no more Propretors, nor Lieutenants, but in ſtead thereof, was a Vicegerent ſubſtituted. And againe, Seeing that Conſtantine altered the forme of the Roman Gouerment, it ſhall not be impertinent to note ſummarily in what ſort Britaine was ruled vnder him; & in the next ſucceeding ages.

He ordained foure Præfects of the Prætorium, to wit, of the Eaſt, of Illyricum, of Italy, and of Gaule: two Leaders or Commanders of the forces, the one of footmen, the other of horſemen in the Weſt, whom they tearmed Præſentales. For ciuill gouernment there ruled Britaine, the Præfect of the Prætorium or Grand Seneſchall in Gaule, and vnder him the Vicar Generall of Britaine, who was his Vicegerent, & honoured with the title, Spectabilis; that is, notable or remarkable: him obeied reſpectiuely to the number of the Prouinces two Conſular deputies, and three Præſidents, who had the hearing of ciuill and criminall cauſes.

For military affaires, there ruled the Leader or Commander

mander of the footmen in the West, at whose disposition were the Earles or Lieutenants of Britaine, the Earle, Count, or Lieutenant of the Saxon coast along Britaine; and the Duke of Britaine, stiled euery one Spectabilis,

The Earle Lieutenant of Britaine seemeth to haue ruled the Inland parts of the Iland, who had with him seuen companies of footmen, and nine coronets or troopes of horse.

Amianus Marcill.

The Earle Lieutenant of the Saxon coast: who defended the Maritime parts against the Saxons, and is named by Amianus Lieutenant of the Maritime tract, for defence of the Sea coast, had seuen companies of footmen, two Guidons of horsemen, the second legion, and one cohort.

The Duke or Generall of Britaine, who defended the Marches against the barbarians, had the command of thirty and eight garrison forts, wherein their Stations kept, consisting of fourteen thousand foot, & nine hundred horse. So that in those daies (by Pancirolus account) Britaine maintained nineteene thousand, two hundred footmen, and seuenteene hundred horsemen, or thereabout in ordinary.

Nineteene thousand foote & seuenteene hundred horsemen maintained in ordinary in Britaine.

Besides all these, the receiuer of the Emperours Finances or publike reuenewes: the Prouost of the Emperors Treasures in Britaine, and the procurator of the Draperie in Britaine; in the which the clothes of the Prince and Souldiers were wouen: and the Count also of priuate reuenewes had his Rationall or Auditory of priuat State in Britain: to say nothing of the sword-fence-schoole Procurator in Britaine (whereof an old inscription maketh mention) and of other officers of inferiour degrees.

(12) After the setling of these affaires, to the end that he might with the more facility bridle the vntamed Persians that seldome were in quiet, he remoued the Imperiall seat of his Residence into the East; for now Galerius and Licinius both dead, the rent and diuided state of the Roman Empire was in him vnited: and purposing to build there a City, as an eternall Monument of his name, he chose the plot at Chalcedon in Asia: but whiles they were measuring out the circuit, an Eagle scouping at the line flew with it ouer the Sea towards Byzantium in Thracia, to which place (the thing seeming ominous) he transferred his new foundation, and there built a most Magnificent Citie, naming it New Rome (as appeareth by an inscription of his statue) In imitation whereof, he circulated seuen hils with a wall for Height, Thicknesse, and Beauty, the faire st in the world: & not onely erected Temples, Towers, and most stately Palaces himselfe, but by his publike Edicts, commanded all the Princes of the Empire to raise therein some Monuments and memorable Edifices, beseeming the Maiesty of so glorious a foundation.

I. Viues in Annotation vpon August Ciuit. Dei lib. 5 c. 25. Sabellicus.

A Iewish Doctor thus described this Citie, in an epistle which himselfe deliuered to our English Ambassador, remaining in Constantinople in Anno 1594.

(13) Hither also from Rome hee caused to bee brought many renowned Monuments of Antiquities; as the famous Goddesse Pallas of old Troy, the Image of Apollo in brasse of an vnmeasurable bignesse; the statues of Iuno, Minerua, Venus, and the like: whereupon Hierome saith; That Constantine to inrich this one Citie, impouerished all others in the Empire: & other writers which saw it in the perfection of beauty, report it to be rather an habitation for the Gods thē the dwelling place for Earthly men. Here in also was built the Proud Palace of that Publike Library, wherin were contained one hundred twenty thousand of the chiefest written Bookes; and in the midst thereof were the Guts of a Dragon, in length one hundred twenty Foote on which was admirably written in Letters of Gold, the Iliads of Homer: The New Name of this new City lasted not long; for the affectiō of all men to the Founder, afforded it rather the name of Constantinople; as a trophy then of this Emperors renowne, though now a brand of infamie to another of that name, who lost it in the yeere 1452. to Mahomet the Turke: and as New Rome was reared and ruined in one name, so had Old Rome in Augustus her pitch of height, and in Augustulus her period.

Hier. in his additions to Eusebius.

Constantinople built by Constantine.

(14) He drew likewise hither those Legions that lay for defence of the Prouinces, as wel in Germany and Gallia, as in Britaine: from whence he brought (saith Malmesbury) a great power of British Souldiers, through whose industry and forward seruice hauing obtained Triumphant Victories to his hearts desire, and attained to the Empire: such of them as were past seruice, and had performed the painefull parts of Souldiers their full time, he planted in a certaine part of Gaule Westward, vpō the very shore of the Ocean: where at this day their posterity remaining, are wonderfully growne euen to a mighty people; in manners & language somewhat degenerate from our Britaines.

Wil. Malmsbury.

In which his doings; hee laid open the Prouinces to the irruptions of their Enemies, and is therfore by Zosimus hardly censured, as being the only man that by this meanes first subuerted the flourishing estate of the Empire. And indeed, by withdrawing his Forces out of Britaine; the Picts and other their wonted Enemies had the bolder & easier entrance into the more ciuill parts of this Iland, whereby ere long, being altogether abandoned of the Romans, it became a prey of Conqueste to the Saxons, as shall be shewed in due place

(15) But howsoeuer his policy failed, carried (as it seemeth) by a Diuine inspiration to leaue Rome; yet is this good Emperour much commended by all Writers for his many vertues, especially for that hee so laid the foundation of the Christians security, that the same hath stood vnder the protection of Princes euer since, euen vnto this day. And albeit that many Cæsars his successors, haue often attempted to shake it by their authorities, and the sharpe instruments of heretikes dangerously haue vndermined it, yet hath it borne out the Stormes of all their boisterous assaies, and stood in the strength that this Emperour first laid it.

(16) And vpon this foundation, that a glorious building might be raised, hee congregated three hundred and eighteene Christian Bishops in the City Nice in Thracia, where himselfe was present, & also President of the same Councel (though now his Beadsmen (the Popes) put him & his Successors from that right) and as another Moses, he then pacified the contentions of the brethren, and reestablished the authorities of the Bishops for the godly gouerment of the Church in that Primitiue age.

(17) But as the cleerest Sunne hath his set, and the faire st day his night, so Constantines glorious life drew to an end, though his liuing-gloy shal be endlesse: for intending a voyage against the Persians, he fell grieuously sicke, & counselled by his Physitians to be carried vnto Nicomedia, a City in Bythinia, to the Hot Bathes that naturally there sprang (which caused some erroneously to write that he becam a Leaper) he died on the way neere to the place, and in great deuotion commended his departing Soule to his Crucified Redeemer, Maij 22. the yeere of Christ Iesus three hundred thirty seuen, of his happy victorious raigne thirty one, and of his age sixty fiue; whose body was interred at Constantinople, in the Church of the Apostles that himselfe had therein founded.

Eusebius. Sigonius. Constantine buried at Constantinople. Socrates. lib. 1. cap. 26.

(18) Eusebius writing this good Emperors life, saith that he deferred his Baptisme vntill his old age, in desire that he might receiue it in Iordayne, where our Sauior himselfe was baptized; yet others thinke that he was baptized with his Son Crispus, what time he created him his Cæsar: for the Celebration whereof, he caused a most sumptuous Font to be made in Rome; which Platina & Sabellicus affirme to haue continued to their times. And the ingenuity of the same Sabellicus is much to be approued, in that speaking of Constantines Donation, which some so much vant of (though the vanity of that forgery is now laid open to the view of all by sundry learned men) he acknowledgeth (himselfe being a Romanist) that he findeth no mention of any such matter, in any of the ancient Records which he followed, and so leaueth it to the Patronage of those Craftsmen, out of whose forges it first was formed. He left to succeed him in the Empire as Augusti (with distaste of the eldest) his three Sonnes, Constantine, Constantius, and Constance, whom before he had made Cæsars, & designed by Testamēt Delmatius, the son of Anniballinus, (his brother) Cæsar: and therefore we haue inserted his mony in ranke of those that succeeded this great & glorious Emperor.

A Councell a gainſt the Arrians called by Conſtans.

Conſtans ſlaine.

Olympias the Widow of this Conſtans was giuen to Arſaces Kjng of Armenia, by Conſtantius his brother to be a bond and purchaſe of his ſurer friendſhip, of which his need was much, as the times required: for after the death of Conſtance, one Vetranio was proclaimed Emperor by the Pannonian Army, though ſhortly diſrobed, & ſent to end his decrepit age in a priuat fortune. Neophanus the nephew of Conſtans by his ſiſter Eutropia, at Rome by the abiect Rout was ſaluted Auguſtus; which he enioied not much aboue twenty daies, being ſuppreſſed by Magnentius, who had now made the truncke of Maieſty, his Soueraignes body. the Baſſe, whereby he meant with Decentius and Deſiderius, his two brethren, to aſcend the Throne.

(3) Simon Dunelmenſis ſaith that Great Conſtantine at his departure from Britaine, left one Octauius to gouerne the Land, who ſhortly rebelled, and after diuers conflicts was ſlaine by Traherne, Commander of a Romane Legion. Galfridus makes the ſaid Octauian a Britaine, and will haue him to raigne with great Victories ouer this Iland the ſpace of fifty foure yeeres, which (as Fabian hath accounted) doth extend to the time of Valentinians Rule in Rome: ſo farre doe our Britiſh Hiſtorians differ from the Romans. But from them moſt certaine it is, that Magnentius before mentioned, a Britaine by his father, though borne among the Leti in France, inueſted himſelfe into the Imperiall Dignity, vſurping France, Spaine, and Britaine. thus ſtamping the face of himſelfe & his brother Decentius, by him made Cæſar at Millan, vpon the currant Monies of ſuch reuolted Prouinces as he vſurped.

And did for three yeers bandy against Constantius, though with some vnequal successe: but lastly despairing to vphold his owne greatnesse, murdered himselfe at Lyons in Gallia, as his brother vpon newes thereof, did with a halter in the same Countrey. For this euent (no other occasion moouing) Constantius both shut the Temple of Ianus in Rome, as a token of an vniuersall Peace; and gloriously triumphed with more then a vsuall aspect.

(4) At this time the Generall of the Armie in Britaine was one Gracianus, the father of Valentinian the Emperour, by birth an Hungarian, and so strong of limme, that no fiue men could pull a rope out of his hand with all their force; whereof hee was surnamed Funarius, the Roper. This man giuing entertainment to Magnentius, was condemned in confiscation of all his goods by Constantius that now ruled sole Emperour, vnto whom also the Britaines submitted themselues, and whose Deputie after Gratianus, was aged Martin, a man (no doubt) vertuous and vpright, as he witnessed by his death: for Constantius, whose base and distrustfull heart feared the wagging of euery leafe, by the slaughter of many guiltlesse, sought to make himselfe secure: and egged on by his Flatterers, (to serue their purposes) sent one Paulus a Notarie into Britaine, to apprehend them that had aided Magnentius.

Gracianus of admirable strength.

Amianus Marcel. lib. 14. cap. 4.

(5) The said Notarie was a Spaniard, of a pestilent wit and subtiltie, especially in finding out all quirkes and deuices to endanger mens estates: whose businesse being now to apprehend and bring away such Martiall men as had entred action in the foresaid conspiracies, he vnder that pretence drew into danger many that were guiltlesse, and the Emperours true Subiects: some of which hee imprisoned, others he tormented, and many with Manacles and Chaines so bruised, that therefore he was called Catena. Old Martine the Deputie, much lamenting their miseries, besought the Spaniard to surcease, and not with the Offenders thus to punish the Innocent; whereat the proud Catch-pole so much disdained, that hee threatned and sought to bring Martin before the Counsell, and that in bands in manner of a Traitor; which so much incensed the aged man, that with his dagger he assailed him; but perceiuing the wound he gaue was not deadly, he stabd the same into his owne side, and thereof presently died: vnfortunate in this fact, but otherwise a most righteous man (saith Amianus) that thus attempted to ease the wrongs of these oppressed Britaines.

Paulus called Catena for his cruelties.

(6) But besides these their distresses, the outrodes of the Scots and Picts breaking into the Marches of the Britaines, sore molested their peace: for redresse whereof, Iulian the Caesar wintring at Paris, and distracted into sundry thoughts, was afraid in person to passe those Seas himself and to leaue Gaule without a Ruler, especially at such a time, when the Almans had stirred vp a most cruell warr: wherefore hee sent Lupicinus at that time Colonell of the Infanterie, and Master of the Armorie, to withstand their furie; a warlike man certes, and skilfull in feats of Armes, but withall proud of heart and countenance, looking high, and speaking bigge, and in gesture demeaning himselfe in his charge as an Actor vpon a Stage, and otherwise so qualified, that men doubted a long time whether he were more Couetous or Cruell. He from * Bononia imbarked al his men, and with a good gale arriued in the Hauen * Rutupi, marching in all hast to * Lundinium, that from thence, after aduice taken, according to the qualitie of the businesse, hee might make more haste to come into the field, and giue battle. But with what successe his affaires afterwards proceeded, I finde not recorded: and therefore I returne againe to the Emperour Constantius.

(7) Flauius Claudius Constantius Gallus his cosen-german he elected Caesar, permitted him to stampe this money, and linckt him in mariage with his sister Constantia. But he, designed to gouerne the East, and make good those Frontiers against the Persians, forgot the duty of his charge, and gaue himselfe vp at Antioch to all licentious lusts & cruelties: of which when Constantius (infected afore with some iealousie of his ambition) was informed, he so plotted, that this lost man, drowned in his owne vicious securitie, was surprised, and with his hands bound backward (like a Felon) giuen vp to the common Headsman for execution. His brother Iulianus was then made Caesar, and this Emperours other sister Helena bestowed vpon him, whose Victories against the Germans and Gaules gained him such applause, that he was against his will by the Souldiers elected Augustus, and made Consort with Constantius in Power Imperiall.

(8) Whose fortunes thus sticking in a tumultuous State (for, with others, Nigrinianus whose consecrated memory is left to posteritie vpon this money, attempted the disquiet of this Emperour, by an ambitious affectation of rule, that was both short & fatall to him) did plainely foreshew, that neither his Raigne nor life would last long.

For besides the affections of the time that then followed that new risen Starre Iulian, his nightly visions and imagined apparitions did both terrifie and appall his mind; for as he thought, his fathers Ghost presented vnto him, a Babe of an ingenious countenance, which strooke the Ball (that the Romans call Tufa, a Globe borne onely by a Monarch) out of his right hand, betokening noght else but a change of State. Which howsoeuer his diuiners interpreted for pleasing things, yet himselfe thought his owne Genius did still follow him, in a forlorne, poore, and mournfull habit.

Constantius apparition.

(9) For all these dumps, Constantius meant this new Election to disauow: and Iulian for his part resolued in point of honour to maintaine and vphold. Whereupon warres prepared, Constantius set forward to encounter him, and comming to Tharsus, from Antioch in Syria, fell there sick of a feuer, which still increased as he further trauelled, and in the borders of Cilicia, at the place called Mopsus welles, situated at the foote of Mount Taurus, died the third day of Nouember, the yeere of Christ by Ieromes account, three hundred sixtie foure: by others, three hundred sixtie one; when hee had ruled twenty foure yeeres, and liued fortie and a few moneths, as Amianus Marcellinus, and Pomp. Letus affirme. But Socrates and Zosimus say, that he liued forty fiue yeeres, and raigned thirty eight, that is, thirteen a Cæsar, in the life of his Father, seuen a Competitor in the liues of his brethren, and seuenteene yeeres Emperour alone.

The time of his raigning.

Hee is neither accounted with the best, nor worst Emperors, his Vertues seeming to hold scoale with his Vices: temperate, courteous, liberall, and affable; not eloquent, yet desirous to speake well; blunt witted, yet a great fauorer of learning; a most skilfull Archer, and apt to take paines, but withall very suspitious; led by Flatterers, and most cruel to the accused, and in exacting importable Tributes, drew more hatred vpon his head then mony into his coffers. But especially is he stained with the heresie of the Arrians, for whose sake he banished many of the Christians, and amõgst thẽ Athanasius, that excellent light of the Catholike Church. In fauour of those heritickes, he caused to be summoned 400. westerne Bishops vnto the Councell of Ariminum, whereof three are reported to come out of Britaine. And he is by Amianns his Life-writer, condemned for mingling foolish doting superstitions, with the sincere doctrin of the Christian Religion, giuen rather to a more intricate search therein, then to settle his opinions vpon grauitie: and stirring vp schismes and discords in maintaining of words and contentious disputations, which as they spread more and more, gat wing euen vnto this Iland of Britaine, as by the words of our lamenting Historian Gyldas is seene. when (saith he) the sweete concent of Christ the head, and his members the body, had continued vntill such time, as that deadly and perfidious Arrianisme, like to a pestiferous Serpent from the other side of the Sea, casting vp her venome vpon vs, caused brethren dwelling together, to be disioyned piteously one from another. And thus the way as it were being made ouer the Ocean, all other cruell and fell Beasts whereseoeuer, shaking out of their horrible mouthes the deadly poison of euery heresie, inflicted the deadly stings and wounds of their teeth vpon this our Country, desirous euermore to heare some noueltie.

A Councell in fauour of the Arrians assembled by Constantius.

Hilarie calleth them the Bishops of the Prouinces of Britaine in an Epistle vnto the Bishops.

(11) For personage, this Emperor was indifferently tall, his complexion brown, the cast of his eies softie, his sight quick, his haire soft, his cheekes alwaies shauen; from the graffing of his necke to the groine very long, but from thence somewhat short and bowlegged withall. His body after death was embalmed, and in Constantinople enterred nere vnto his Father, at the commandement of Iulian, whom by his testament (for all his former displeasure) hee declared his Heire and Successor.

FLAVIVS CLAVDIVS IVLIANVS EMPEROVR, APOSTATA.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

IVLIAN succeeded, whose birth had as much of Nobilitie as either the greatnesse of place; (for it was New Rome); or the high bloud of parentage could adde vnto him; for his Father Constantius, was the brother of great Constantine, not much his vnlike: & his mother Basilina was lower in her birth, though most vnfortunate in bearing him, her owne destruction. An Orphant he was left together with Gallus his brother, long tossed between the sourges of his owne imperfect constitution, and the bloudy iealousie of his ruling-kinsmen (not long before the fatall ruine of his Father) for beeing too neere allyed to their Crownes.

Iulian his Parentage.

Amian Marcell. lib. 15. cap. 7.

Meane he was of stature, yet carrying from head to foote a iust proportion and vniforme knitting of his lineaments, whereby he had agility and strength: big and broad his shoulders, his necke fat, bearing his head forward; louely and graceful was the cast of his quick and cleere eye, straight his nose, and no feature of his face amisse, but the greatnes of his mouth, and the parting of his nether lippe; the soft haire of his head he wore in a decent length, and his rough beard he cut in a pointed fashion.

His proportion and feature. Amian. Marcell. lib. 25.

(2) His educatiõ was vnder many masters, of which Mardonius a Scythian Eunuch was the first. From him he was sent to the publike Schoole at Constantinople, where of Nicocles the Lacedemõ, he learned his Grammar, and of Ecebolius the Sophister his Rhetorike; and of both of them (as Eusebius Bishop of Nicomedia hath it) the Christian Religion, in which his delight was such, that he betooke him to the function of of a Deacon, reading in publike to the people the ſacred Bookes; and aimed at no further marke of greatneſſe then the reputation of a holy man: led on with the loue of knowledg, hee went to the Schooles of Nicomedia, where, of Iamblicus, who ſucceeded Porphyry in the Chaire; he learned the Philoſophie of Ariſtotle & Plato. There bewitched at length with the fame of Libanius Eloquence, though deteſting his religion; from reading in priuate ſtudie his prophane labours; hee grew a publike hearer of his inuectiue Lectures: and imitating at firſt in exerciſe of wit onely this Rhetoricians forme of declaming, hee grew in the end the profaneſt Railer, and deadlieſt Enemy of all other himſelfe againſt the Church. And to fill vp this veſſel of iniquitie, Maximus, the onely Impoſter and Magitian then of the world, (worthily after for his impious doctrine put by Valentinian to the ſword) muſt come to Nicomedia. From him did Iulian learne ſuch Aſtrologie as ſetteth Natiuities, and ſuch Magicke as inuoketh Spirits. And here was the ſchoole of this mans Error, and Miſtris of his impietie. The ſeedes of whoſe Nature and Education hauing thus obſerued, let vs ſearch with an impartial Eye into his manners and conditions, and ſee what vertue was in the fruit.

His temperance.

Marcel. lib. 16. In Miſopo. Iulian. Imp.

(3) His temperance is commended to vs with admiration. He ſlept little; and could awake at pleaſure: his bed was euer with the hardeſt, and his diet of the meaneſt meat, and the moderateſt meaſure, whereby he neuer but once, and that by accident, disburdened his ſtomacke by vomit; and would often ſay, that it was the ſafetie of his life, that he neuer had any war with his belly. Such was his chaſtitie, that hauing loſt at once in France Helena his beloued wife, and her infant, his onely Sonne, he neuer ſo much as in ſuſpect, had an incontinent deſire. And therefore of all the Perſian beauties taken in thoſe warres, as the richeſt ſpoiles, Nec contrectare aliquam voluit nec videre: Neither ſuffer in his Army either Cookes or Barbers, as being deliciarum atq; intemperantiæ miniſtros.

And when the action was performing; ſimilior ſum deteſtanti eos ludos quàm ſpectanti. Yet doth Marcellinus tax him of much verboſitie and affectation of vaine glory. And Gregory Nazianzen charging him with intemperate paſſion as vnconſtability, ſaith; That by his ranging & furious aſpect, his vnſteady and halting pace, his fleering looke, and immoderate laughter, Talem ante opera vidi qualem in operibus cognoui.

(4) The loue of Iuſtice in this Prince is remembred to vs in his rules of DIRECTION: for he ſo amended the Lawes Ambagibus circumciſis, that the Iudges might cleerly ſee, Quid iuberent fieri, quid vetarent: and in his EXAMPLE for imitation. For when to an innocent deniall before him, Delphidius the Orator inueighed ſaying; Nocens eſſe poterit vſquam ſi negare ſuffecerit: himſelfe replied, Et quis innocens eſſe poterit ſi accuſâſſe ſufficit? and ſo diſcharged the party. As for his clemency and charity, which ought to attend the ſword and Scepter of a Soueraigne, ſince the one is Magnum timoris remedium, and the other will be, poſt cineres tributum; Nebridius and Lucillianus are Regiſters of the one, whom notwithſtanding their conſpiracies in fauor of Conſtantius, hee not onely pardoned, but defended with perill of his owne perſon from the furies of his owne fellowers. And for the other, thoſe his letters to Arſacius is a ſure record. Let there bee in the Cities of your charge, many Hoſpitals erected, that the want of the wayfairing may be releeued by our benignitie: and not of them only of our Religion, but of all the reſt: for it ſuites not well with the goodnes of our Gouernment, that when the Iewes permit none of theirs to beg and the wicked Galileans releeue not onely theirs, but ours; that ours ſhould be diſconſolate of other helpe.

Mart. Epig.

(5) Some haue blemiſhed his bounty with the brand of vaine glory: thus did the Antiochians for depreſſing ſo much the reaſonable price of Graine in their Markets, by a profuſe expence of his owne Treaſure, gaining thereby at firſt onely the applauſe of the light multitude, after which he hunted, and drawing on in the end a miſerable dearth, through the licentious exceſſe of their improuidence: which often happeneth.

(6) And as the baniſhment of Palladias into Britain vpon a weake ſuſpition, Taurus to Vircillum, in whom the eye of Iuſtice could find no skarre; and to death Vrſulus, with Pigmeus (the firſt his Treaſurer, that had ſpent with him and on him his owne meanes, when being Cæſar, he had little of his owne: the other the guide of his youth, and to whom he truly ought the greateſt part of his goodneſſe) may iuſtly ſtaine him with lawleſſe ſeuerity, and vngrateful cruelty; ſo may his malicious ſpirit againſt the Chriſtians, (howſoeuer masking in more Art then many that went before him) ſet him vp in the ranke and top of the greateſt Perſecutors. And although there be ſome paſſages in his Gouernment more eaſie then in ſome others that may imply a gentle diſpoſition toward them, (ſometimes taking the gods to witneſſe, that the Galileans (for ſo he named the Chriſtians) ſhould not vndergoe the leaſt of iniury, neither be led to Pagan ſacrifice, or forced to any thing beyond the compaſſe of their owne contents: and that he not onely reuoked the Edict of Conſtantine the Arrian Emperour, whereby thoſe holy men ſtood long exiled: but taking the aduantage of an vprore begun by the Arrians (their Enemies) at Ediſſa, ſeiſed vpon their goods, ſwolne too great in number and fortune by the gracious aſpect of his Predeceſſors, to whom hee diſſembled himſelfe a Chriſtian): yet did he whiles he had in his owne hands the reine of Gouernment, by all his actions and ends, declare himſelf an heauy oppoſite vnto them. Sometimes by allurements to aſſay to corrupt them; ſometimes by a ſubtil ſiding with one faction of the Church, as he did with the Catholikes againſt the Arrians, to counterpoiſe their power, vt ſecurius regnaret, that by ſuch licence of ſedition, Non timeret vnanimantem plebem, he need not feare the power of their vnity, as himſelfe profeſſed.

Hieron: Ruffinus.

(7) From this vnfortunate plot of earthly policie (but with worſe ſucceſſe) he incited the Iewes to reedifie the Temple at Ieruſalem, and renew their Sacrifice, remitting to them their debt of Tribute, and vowing that at his returne from Perſia he would viſit that holy Citie, and (as he ſaith to them) vt vnà vobiſcum in ea Deo optimo gratias agam; well beleeuing that by raiſing ſuch an oppoſite to the Chriſtians, he ſhould ſuppreſſe their increaſe, and annihilate their Prophecie of Ieruſalems deſolatiõ. To repaire theſe curſed walles againſt the prouidence of Diuine Iuſtice, Alipius of Antioch, that had beene Gouernour of Britaine, was ſent: but his indeuour, ſaith Amianus, & the worke of all his Miniſters, was interrupted by fearefull flaming balles of fire, which iſſued from the Earth neere vnto thoſe foũdatiõs, cõſuming very many of the Iewes & workmẽ; by reaſon whereof, this Element ſtill giuing freſh aſſault on thẽ, the place became vnaeceſſible, and the enterpriſe giuen ouer: ſo vaine it is for Man to ſtriue againſt the decreed purpoſe of God. And it is by others affirmed, that at the ſame time an Earthquak ſo ſhooke thoſe Foundatiõs of the temple which were left by Titus vntouched, that one ſtone thereby was not left ſtanding vpon another, but were all laid leuell with the ground: by which miraculous ſights many Iewes were turned to the embracing of the Chriſtian Faith, vpon whoſe garments fell formes of Croſſes, which ſhined as the beames of the Sunne, neither could they by any meanes be waſhed or wiped away. Alipius that had been chiefe in this buſineſſe, was afterward confined into Baniſhment, with the loſſe of his goods, by Valens vpon ſuſpition of Treaſon. And thus farre of Iulians veiled hatred: now of his open actions of deſpigh againſt the Chriſtians.

is ſaid hee diſſembled his Religion) but that he opened the Temples of the Pagans Gods, repaired their Altars; declaring to future ages, the memorie of this his deteſtable act, by minting a Bull prepared for ſacrifice, vpon the Currant money of the State, with this inſcription; Securitas reipublica; as if Romes Empire ſhould loſe her ſecuritie, and the fatall deſtinie of Command, when the Genius of that Citie and the Gods of her foundation ſhould bee forſaken. And where there remained any antique Monument of the Infant Chriſtian Church, or any new erected badge of Religious deuotion, thoſe hee cauſed to bee defaced. Thus did he in Cæſarea Philippi, with that Braſen figure of our Sauiour arraied in a ſhort veſture, and the woman cured of her blodie iſſue, kneeling and eleuating her hands to him; and at whoſe feet in the ſaid Pillar grew a certaine Herbe, in height vnto the Hem of his Garment, which cured all kind of maladies; placing his owne figure, to the intent that it ſhold be worſhipped: but ſuddenly it was with Lightning from Heauen deſtroied, breaking with violent force the Breſt thereof aſunder, and ſtriking the Head faſt into the earth; whoſe Reliques, as Zoſimus ſaith, remained there to be ſeene a long time after, a witneſſe of mans preſumptuous error, and Gods iuſt diſpleaſure. Many lawes he made againgſt them, and manie rights of Subiects hee tooke from them. By Edict he forbad the Chriſtians the publike Schooles & ſtudy of the Arts and Tongues; ieſting away the reaſon of this iniuſtice with ſcoffes, as hee did the reſt; ſaying, that Ariſtotle, Iſocrates, and Plato, (who muſt be their guides in ſuch liberal learnings) adoring Mercurie and the other gods, he held it abſurd that they ſhould reade and learne of their Bookes, that loath and raile at their Religion.

(9) The equitie of this extended power may appeare by Marcellinus cenſure, a man of his owne Religion, who of it ſaith, Inclemens obruendum perenni ſilentio; Let the Edict be dambd to eternall ſilence. When hee ſeized vpon the goods of the Chriſtians, which was often, and vpon weake pretences, he vſed to inuert the Letter of their owne Doctrine, in warrant of his foule act, ſaying that he did it, vt facilius in Regnum cœlorum veniant. When hee had diſabled the Chriſtians of all command, either in the Field or Common-wealth, (as he did Iouinian, Valentinian & Valens, after Emperours) he would ſay, he did it becauſe their Goſpell taketh from them Poteſtatem Gladij. And whereſoeuer any poore Chriſtian implored the hand of Iuſtice againſt wrong and violence, they returned with no better redreſſe, then that it was the rule of their Religion, perferre iniurias, it was the dutie of their Profeſſion to beare all iniuries. And although moſt Authors agree that hee ſtained not his gouernment with the bloud of any Catholike, well knowing that gore of Perſecution is the ſeed of the Goſpell; yet ſome affirme that when Apolloes Oracle, neere Antioch, had loſt his power of anſwere, by the holy preſence of Babillaes bodie (there martyred and intombed,) and that the Chriſtians in remooning it away, ſung ſolemnly the Pſalme, Let all them be confounded which worſhip grauen Images: this Emperour (although the Act was his direction, though not the order) grew ſo inraged, that hee put then many Chriſtians to the ſword.

His prudence.

(10) Of the prudence & learning of this man there be many notable monuments remaining: for in all the courſes of his life he did rather labour to content the parts of his vnderſtanding, then of his ſenſualitie, often being heard to ſay, Turpe eſſet ſapienti, cùm habeat animum, captare laudes ex corpore: and therefore writing to Ecdicius, Prefect of Ægypt, to helpe him to the Bookes of George Biſhop of Alexandria, hee ſaith, Where others delighted in Horſe and Hawkes, I haue beene from my infancie inflamed with the loue of Books. As for his Miſopogon (where playing with his own perſon and beard, he ſharply reprehendeth the Antiochians of their intemperance in frequenting Stage-Plaies; of their impietie, in changing Iupiter and Apollo (gods of their Forefathers, into the Chriſt of the Galileans; and of couetouſneſſe in their Magiſtrates, in ſelling Iuſtice) it is one of the wittieſt Inuectiues extant of thoſe middle times.

Miſopogon vel Antiochenſis.

(12) In the courſe of his Religion hee is by the Writers of his owne affectiõ & time rather reported ſuperſtitious then deuote; and his fancies therein rather to thẽ accounted ridiculous then religious. Such was the exceſſe and waſt of Oxen in his ſacrifices, that it is beleeued if his returne had beene from the Perſicke Expedition, there would haue beene want of them to ſupply his Rites, and therefore they might happily ſay as the white Oxen did of the Emperour Marcus, Si tu viceris, nos perimus. Yet were his rules of order to the Prieſts of his ſuperſtitious zeale, ſuch as may well become the moſt religious Church-man of our age to imitate: for he prohibited thoſe Prieſts from gaze of Stage-Playes, frequenting Tauernes, or exerciſing any foule or illiberall profeſsion, perſwading them to imitate the Chriſtians, whoſe bounty to ſtrangers in diſtreſſe, charity in burying the dead, and whoſe humble manners & ſanctitie of life (though but diſſembled) had ſo much increaſed their Profeſsion.

His Religion.

Marcel. lib. 25.

Ex Iulian Epiſt. ad Pon. Galatie.

(13) His fortitude appeareth in the proceſſe of his Martiall Actions. At three and twenty yeeres hee was made by Conſtantine his nephw Cæſar, matched to his ſiſter Helena, and ſent in perſon to reſtraine thoſe barbarous Nations that had forced in vpon the Roman Limits. But whether this imploiment was grounded vpon the Emperours owne feare to aduenture his perſon againſt theſe Sauages; a deſire to nurture this mere Scholer his brother in law in more princely manners, who then was rude; or to expoſe him (in reſpect of ſome iealouſy in State) to an aſſured perill: it remaineth doubtfull. Onely himſelfe ſaith, that he that beſtowed his Title of Cæſar, libenter dabat; & qui accepit, omninò recuſabat: for in it hee gained nothing but vt occupatior interiret, taking this his Expedition againſt thoſe Inrodes, as a baniſhment into the Hercinian Deſert, vt tanquam venator cum feris bellaret: and beleeuing himſelfe rather thereby called out to an expected death, then intended honour. But this man then neither of opinion or hope, and who ſhould haue ſeemed to haue effected a point of excellent ſeruice, if hee had no more but defended the frontiers, and repelled the Enemies, did by his valour performe no leſſe the deeds of admiration.

His Fortitude.

(14) He ſent to Rome Chonodomarius & Badoncarius, two of their greateſt Kings, as ſpoiles to adorne the Trophey, and attend the triumph of Conſtantius. Hee forced on euery ſide thoſe to feare his power, that had ſo long beene fearefull to the Roman Empire. And had he returned home, borne vp only with the merit of this his ſeruice, and opinion of the world, and not beene blowne beyond the bounds of his old moderation by a new deſire, hee had eſcaped the imputation of ambition and treacherie, and beene eſteemed a iuſt ſucceſſor, againſt whome he is deemed now an vniuſt vſurper. But it may be ſaid that it was a diuine power that inſpired it, and a ſtrong hand that inforced him to it: for from aboue the Porch of his entrance, into one of the regained Cities, the Wreath of Laurell (reſerued an ornament of that place) fell in wonder vpon his head. to affect the Empire, and restore the State. As touching his election, he calleth the gods to witnesse his vnwillingnesse, and the publike protestation he made against it at Paris, when he was there by the tumultuous Army saluted Augustus. And although by the great prouision made by him of Corne from Britannie, to hold a foot the Armie against the plots of Constantius (that grew now enuious of his fortune,) hee may seeme to haue intended the ruine of his Soueraigne, yet doth hee by the gods of his greatest confidence, Iupiter & the Sunne, protest; Quod Constantium occidere nunquam optauit, imò ne id accideret expetauit.

(15) But Constantius ending this quarrell and competition by his death, Iulian, whom a Pithonist had deluded with the hope of Persia, telling him that his fortunes should be as his feature, like Great Alexander, bred in him a thirsty desire after the surname Persicus: whereupon hee prepared an Army for this expedition, and seeking the fauor of his gods the Moone, Fortune, and Mars, embrued their Altars with the Blood of an hundred Buls at once; though many ominous signes, as they were interpreted by his Philosophers and Southsaiers, forbad the same. Such was the great Earthquake happening in Bithynie, that swallowed vp the Citie of Nicomedia. Riuers likewise are said to stand drie, euen in the heart of winter; and Springs forgetting their vsuall boilings, yeelded not foorth their wonted waters: yea and if we will beleeue the reporters; his succesſe was foreshewed by the departure of an Angell, and by a Meteor gliding in the Aire. All which hee sought to preuent, by pacifying his Heathenish gods with multitudes of Sacrifices: and with an Army extended ten miles in length, entred Persia, cutting asunder the Bridges by which hee passed ouer his men, to adde to them more of resolution as their meanes were lesse of returne, refusing all humble submission and composition offred him by their King; and at the place then called Phrygia, ioined Battle against Surena, a great Commander among the Persians, and Merenes, Generall of their Horse, accompanied with two of the Kings sonnes, whose powers not able to resist the Romans, gaue backe and fledde.

(16) Iulian either vpon a vaine confidence, or sudden Alarum, had forgot to arme himself with the corslet or Brigandine; & in following the disarraied flight of the Persians, lift vp his hands in signe of victory: at which very instant a Iauelin strucke thorow his left Arme into the short Ribbs, and stucke in the neather lappet of his Liuer; which whilest he endeuoured to plucke out, did cut the sinewes of his fingers: wherat altogether distracted, he fell forwards vpon his horses maine, and thence was carried vnto his Pauillion. From whose hand this Iauelin came (saith Amianus) God only knoweth. Some report the Caster to haue been a fugitiue Persian: others say that from the hand of one of his owne Souldiers it proceeded: and Calistus one of his owne Guard, that wrote this Battle in Heroicall Verse, affirmeth, that by some wicked Fiend or Diuell this Iauelin run him thorow. Howsouer, there are that report that in pulling out this Launce and casting it into the aire with his bloud, he should vtter this blasphemous speech, and say Thou hast ouercome me, O Galilean. At his setting forth he vowed to his gods a Sacrifice of Christian bloud, if hee returned Conquerour, but he performed it with his owne. His slaine Corpes was carried to Tarsus a City in Cilicia, where with small pompe of Funerall Obsequies it was interred nere to the Cities side; which place himself to that purpose had fromerly assgned: although Nazianzen affirmeth the earth to haue opened, and in a flame of Sulphur to haue sucked vp his body into her Wombe.

Iulian stucke into the body with a Dart.

(17) Thus ended this Emperor, the twenty sixth of Iune, in the two and thirtieth yeere of his age, and three hundred sixty and three of Christs Natiuity, when he had raigned Augustus neere three, and Cæsar full seuen yeeres. Whose wit and eloquence needs no further testimony then the Monuments of his owne Pen; nor his religious zeale more then the Function his youth so worthily performed in the Christian Church. His Imperiall Vertues we see match him in story with Titus, in moderation with Aurelius, and for succesſe in warre, with Traian; three of the most excellent Princes: and his fortune was to see bounded within his sole greatnesse, what the hand of right and sword of tyranny had so late dispersed. But now one Errour, his Apostacie, disroabing him of all his Morall vertues, leaues him an obiect naked to the vulgar eie, but a Monster of men, and marke of infamy. I hold it therefore fitting no lesse the vse, then the iustice of a Story, to doe him (as I haue done) all his right: since in him we learne that all those admirable endowments of Nature, embelished with all the morall and internall graces that Art could adde, are not the base of holinesse, without diuine grace; nor dalliance of Fortune, and fulnesse of Empire (that made this man wanton and forgetfull) is the center of securitie and happinesse without heauenly protection: since from the sense of Sacred Piety hee fell to Pagan Superstition: for many are called, but few are chosen; and in the seat of Presumptuous Maiesty he felt the rod of Diuine reuenge.

FLAVIVS IOVIANVS.

Chapter XLIX.

Fla. Iouianus Emp.

An Do. 364.

THe mindes of the whole Army being much distracted by the death of Iulian; the next day being Iune twenty seuen, they met, and consulted vpon a new Emperour: where for a while two factions were maintained, & with equall deserts argued, till lastly in one accord they both agree vpon * Salustus a man very honourable and wise, but withall aged and weake, and therefore he absolutely refused the election. Iouianus by them then was nominated, in regard of his fathers deserts indifferently commended, saith Amianus: but Rufinus, Theodoret, and Socrates attribute great worths vnto him, and confidently affirme his vnwillingnesse was to accept of that dignity, for that the whole Army had yeelded to Iulianus Idolatrous Edicts, openly professing himself to b:

a Christian, and withall protesting that he would not be a Soueraigne ouer an Ethnicke Empire, vntill by the instance of the Souldiers; which declared themselues likewise to bee Christians, he did accept of the same.

Iouianus his parentage.

(2) His Father was Varonianus, by birth an Hungarian, a Captaine of good note, who not long before had laid downe his charge of warre, and retired into his Country, to a more quiet course of life. Himselfe serued Iulian the Apostata in his Campe; from whence he departed by vertue of his Edict; commanding all Christians out of his pay, among whō * Iouinianus (as wee haue said) chose rather to cast from him his Sword and Girdle, (marks of honour to Military Professors) then to forsake the Ensigne of his Heauenly Chieftaine, and the Badge of his Christian Profession.

* Iouianus his piety.

(3) No sooner was he clad in the Purple Robe, but one Iouianus (a Roman Emsigne-bearer, lately at variance with this new Elected Emperour, then a priuate man) fearing the danger of so powerfull an Enemy stepped now aboue the degree of the common sort, reuolted to the Persians; and hauing good accesse, informed King Sapor of the death of Iulian, (to them till then vnknowne) and disabling Iouianus for an Vnskilfull and Effeminate Captaine, both incouraged the Enemy, and gaue directions how to take the aduantage. The Persian as ready to execute as ioyous to heare, set forward his forces, his Elephants leading the way, whose terrible brayings and fearefull approach much affrighted the Roman Souldiers. A sore battell was fought, and fountaines of bloud drawne from the sides of both parts: wherein, with an infinite number of Persians, Iulianus, Macrobius, & Maximus, three Roman Tribunes, of those Legions that then were the Principall of the whole Army, were slaine: in regard whereof, and especially for want of victuall (whose scarsity then was such, that for one Pecke of Meale, ten peeces of Gold were giuen) Iouianus made Peace with the Persians for thirty yeers, giuing them fiue Prouinces beyond Tigris, some Cities and Forts in Mesopotamia, whereof Nisibis is named for one that had beene the very sinewes and strength of the Confines, euer since the Warres of Mithridates: for which his doings, he is taxed by Eutropius & Amianus (who both liued in his daies) and of most the deed is held very dishonourable to the greatnesse of the Roman Empire: howbeit diuers others excuse him very iustly considering the extreame misery and famine wherin Iulianus left the Army, which was in apparant hazard to be giuen ouer for a prey to the Enemy, to the indangering of the whole Empire, had it not beene thus preuented: and therefore they highly commend him heerein, as the onely Preseruer of the Roman Army.

Socrates Schol. lib.3.cap.20.

(4) Howsoeuer, he is highly commended by Socrates, (the continuer of Eusebius his History) who flourished aboue Twelue hundred yeeres since; for his constant faith grounded vpon the Nicen Creed, and for his Louing Reuerence to the Christian Bishops, recalling from banishment those that Constantius and Iulian had exiled; among whom, Athanasius of Alexandria was one: putting downe the Idolatrous Temples of the Gentiles, and restoring to their Offices both in Court and Campe, those who for their Conscience had been expulsed.

Bishops recalled from banishment.

(5) At his departure from Persia, hee visited the City Tarsus, where he caused the Sepulcher of Iulian (though otherwise he had found him auerse both in Affection, and Religion, yet for that hee was his preceding Emperor) to be richly adorned: and taking Antioch in his way, for many daies together was troubled with some accidents, which that age did take for Ominous signes. For the Statue of Maximianus Cæsar, standing at the entrance into the Kings Palace, let fall the Ball or Globe out of his hand, no force mouing it: horrible sounds and noises were heard within the Consistory: and Blazing-starres appeared at Noone-day.

A blazing starre seene at Noone-day.

Thence therefore in great haste he marched, & at Ancyra, declared his sonne Varronianus his Cæsar, a very Infant, whose Wrawlings and vnwillingnesse to ride in the Imperiall Chariot, portended (saith Amianus) that which after happned. For hasting still towards Constantinople, he came to Dadastana, a place that diuideth Bythynia and Galatia asunder, and there died suddenly of the obstructions and stopping of the Lungs; caused by the dampe of a new mortered Chamber wherin he lay; or (as others write) by coales there set to dry the new seeling, whose vapors hauing no issue, stifled him to death, the seuenteenth day of February, the yeere of the worlds redemption, three hundred sixty foure; after hee had raigned seuen moneths, and twenty two daies, aged thirty three yeeres.

(6) For his personage, he was of goodly presence, both tall and big, his gesture graue, his eyes gray, and countenance pleasant: an affectionate louer & professor he was of the Christian religiō, of indifferēt learning himselfe, but a most honorable imbracer therof in others; very precise & considerate in choosing of Iudges and Magistrates; facile and familiar to his seruitors about him. His Blemishes were these, that hee was a great feeder, and giuen to wine, and somewhat to that other Vice which vsually accompanieth such intemperances.

Flauius Valentinianus, Emp.

Flauius valens; Emp.

An. Do. 364.

REsently vpon the death of Iouianus, by a ſecret whiſpering & running rumor, Equitius, Tribune of the Scutarij, was nominated Emperour, a man naturally rigorous, and rude; and therefore diſliked of the better aduiſed, and no further followed. But frō him, their voices turned to Ianuarius, a kinſman to the laſt deceaſed Iouianus, at that preſent Gouernor of Illyrium. But he alſo reiected, Valentinianus then abſent, was elected at Nice, as a fit and meet perſon for the managing of their Warres, and good of the weale publike.

Amianus Mar. lib 26. cap. 5.

Socrates in eccleſ. hiſt. lib. 4. cap. 1.

(2) His birth was of Pannonia, in the City Cibalas, of meane and poore parentage; the ſonne of Gracian ſpoken of before, who by trade was a Rope-ſeller, but of great ſtrength: and therfore by ſeruice preferred to places of account, and had been made Ruler of Britain. His owne life likewiſe was ſpent in ſeruice of Warre, and was ere-while a Captaine ouer the Targatiers: but Iulian requiring him either to Sacrifice to his Gods, or to leaue his place; he choſe rather to lay aſide his Belt then his Faith and Chriſtianity, as likewiſe Iouianus had done; and ſo for neglecting a little honour then, he had now a farre greater beſtowed on him by the diſpoſer of all Earthly Kingdomes. The Eſtate ſo vrging it, hee made Valens (his Brother) Partner in the Empire, the trumpets euery where ſounding Warres throughout the Roman world. For the Almans inuaded Gaul and Rhetia, the Sarmatians and Quadi made ſpoile of Pannonia: the Picts, Saxons, Scots, and Attacots infeſted the Britaines: the Auſtorians made roades into Africa: the Gothes ranſacked Thracia, and the Perſians entred Armenia. For which cauſe, Valens remained to defend the Eaſt, and Valentinianus tooke his progreſſe into the Weſt, where in three Battles vnder the conduct of Iouianus, hee diſcomfited the Almans: and Valens likewiſe ouercame and beheaded Procopius; whoſe feature we haue here expreſſed, a dangerour Vſurper in the Eaſt.

(3) But in Britaine things proſpered not ſo well: for by the generall bandings of the foreſaid Nations, their old Enemies, the Prouince was ſore diſtreſſed and brought to extreame miſery. For Nectaridius, Admirall of the Britiſh Fleet they ſlew, and Balchobaudes Lord warden of the Marches, by a traine of theſe barbarous people, was forelaid & aſſailed on euery ſide. The intelligence of which occurrences, when it was brought to Rome with great horrour, the Emperor firſt ſent hither Seuerus, Steward of his Houſe; if fortune would happily ſpeed his hand, to redreſſe whatſoeuer had happened amiſſe. But he in ſhort time being called away, had not the hap to ſee the wiſhed ſucceſſe. Thē Iouianus, famous for his Warres in Germany, came into the ſame parts; and ſeeing the puiſſance of the Enemy, meant to craue aid of the Auxiliarie Forces, the vrgent neceſsity requiring ſo much: at laſt, in regard of many (and thoſe fearefull) accidents, which rumor cōtinually reported, touching the ſtate of this Iland, hither was deſigned Theodoſius, a man eſteemed moſt happy, and approued for his Martiall proweſſe, who with a bold reſolution & ſelect power both of Horſe and Foote, ſet forward for Britaine.

went. As for the Tracts of Gaule, the Frankners and Saxons their nere confined neighbours, wherſoeuer they could breake foorth, and make Roades by Sea or Land, made hauocke heere by ſeizing of Booties, firing of Townes, in killing of men and women; and leading away Captiues. To ſtay theſe wofull miſeries, if the Heauens had beene ſo benigne, this valiant Captaine intended a voyage to this * our end of the World: and comming to * Bononia, which lieth diuided from the oppoſite tract of Land by a narrow Channell ebbing and flowing with terible Tides, where the waters are ſeene ſometimes to match the higheſt Mountaine, and againe to ſettle with the leuell of the Plaines, without any harme of Sailers or Paſſage: this Sleue with a gentle courſe hee croſſed, and arriued at * Rutupie, a quiet Roade and Harbour ouer againſt it: from whence after that the Bactauians, the Heruli, Iouij, and Victores (Companies bold and confident in their ſtrengths) were come, he marched towards Lundinium, an ancient City, which poſterities afterwards named Auguſta: and hauing ſeuered his Troopes into ſundry parts, he charged vpon thoſe companies of rouing and robbing enemies, euen when they were heauy laden with Booties and ſpoiles, & were driuing away before them both Men and Women bound for their Captiues, beſides much Cattle, and a great Prey. Theſe hee ſoone diſcomfited, and reſtored to the poore diſtreſſed Tributaries their Liberties and Loſſes, beſtowing ſome ſmall parcels thereof among his weary and well deſeruing Souldiers: and entred the City with exceeding great ioy, in manner of a Petty-triumph, which erewhile was ouer-whelmed with Calamities, but now on the ſudden refreſhed and ſet in perfect ſafety.

(5) Vpon this proſperous ſucceſſe encouraged to greater attempts, he abode yet doubtfull of the future, caſting with himſelfe many proiects, which poiſed Fortunes Scales alike: but laſtly by certaine Captiues and Fugitiues he learned that thoſe Companies of ſundry fierce Nations, ſpread ſo farre & diffuſedly vpon the face of the Prouince, could not be vanquiſhed, vnleſſe it were by ſleights and ſtratagemes. By Edicts therefore he firſt proclaimed impunitie to ſuch as had forſaken their Colours, if they would returne; wherby many which had run to the Enemy, or at their owne pleaſures had beene diſperſed into diuers parts, came in, and by their countenance declared their reſolutions in his behalfe: Notwithſtanding, miſtruſting the euent, and penſiue ſtill with cares, hee thought good to call to his aſſiſtance Ciuilis, a man of great vnderſtanding, quicke ſpirit, and withall an vpright Iuſticer, who was to rule Britaine as Deputie, and likewiſe Dulcitius a Captaine, renowned for his skill and deeds of Armes.

(6) After Conſultation with them, hauing gotten courage, and departing from Auguſta with a power of Souldiers, which in his politicke induſtry he had leuied & trayned to his hand, he brought exceeding great ſuccour euery where vnto the troubled and confuſed ſtate of the Britaines; gaining before hand ſuch places in each part, as might giue aduantage to annoy the barbarous Enemy; and enioyned the Common Souldiers no ſeruice, whereof himſelfe tooke not the Aſſay with a cheerefull heart: in this ſort performing as well the Offices of an Actiue and hardy Souldier, as the carefull charge of a right-noble Generall, he diſcomfited & put to flight diuers Nations, whom inſolent Pride (fed with ſecurity) had incited and ſet on fire, to inuade the Romans Territories; and ſo reſtored wholly vnto their former ſtate the Cities and Caſtles which had ſuſtained many loſſes, and eſtabliſhed a ſure peace for a long time following.

(7) Now there happened whiles he attchieued theſe exploits, a dangerous matter likely to haue broken out into great miſchiefe, had it not been quenched in the beginning of the enterpriſe: for one Valentinus of Valeria Pannonia, a man of a proud ſpirit firſt Deputy Lieutenant and after preſident, for ſome notable offence baniſhed into Britaine, as Frontinus immediately before had beene, as one inpatient of reſt, like ſome noiſome wilde Beaſt, vpon a certaine ſwelling pride, roſe vp in commotion againſt Theodoſius, whom hee perceiued to be the only man able to withſtand his wicked deſignes. Howbeit; caſting about many waies, both cloſely and apparently, as the gale of his vnmeſurable deſire roſe higher, he ſolicited as well the baniſhed perſons as Souldiers, promiſing (as the time would affoord) rewards to allure and draw them on to ſome actuall attempt. Yet when the day came wherein it ſhould haue beene effected, Theodoſius hauing intelligence thereof (ſurprized Valentinus with ſome few of inward complices, and deliuered them vnto Dulcitius, to be put to death accordingly. But in his military skill and policy, (wherein he was reputed to haue exceeded all men liuing in thoſe daies) geſſing at future dangers, hee inhibited all Inquiſitions to be made touching the reſt of the Conſpirators, leſt ſo generall a feare ſurpriſing at once, and ſpread abroad among many, thoſe tempeſtuous troubles of the Prouince, which were now well allaied, ſhould reuiue againe.

(8) Therefore turning himſelfe from this buſineſſe to the reforming of ſuch enormities as were of moſt conſequence, now that all dangers were quite ouer-blowne, he reedified the Cities, repaired the Gariſon Caſtles, and fortified the Frontiers with ſtanding Watches, and ſtrong Fore-fences. And thus hauing recouered the Prouince againe which had yeelded ſubiection to the Enemies, he reduced it vnto the priſtine Eſtate, ſo as by his meanes and motion it had againe a lawfull Gouernour appointed, and alſo named it VALENTIA, in honour of Valentinianus the Emperor.

(9) The Areans, a kind of men (as witneſſeth Amianus) inſtituted by thoſe of ancient times for politicke imploiments, who by little and litle were fallen into diſorders and vices, he remooued from their Stations, as being manifeſtly conuicted, for that (induced with the greatneſſe of rewards receiued or promiſed) they had diuers times diſcouered vnto the Barbarous whatſoeuer was done or debated betwixt the Preſident and his Counſell: for indeed their charge was to runne to and fro by long iournies, to intimate and make knowne vnto the Romans Captaines vpon the Marches: what doings and ſtirrs were among the Neighbour-Nations; whereby they had great opportunities both to know and reueale the ſecrets of the State.

(10) And thus Theodoſius hauing managed moſt excellently theſe affaires, was ſent for to the Emperours Court; who leauing the Prouince ouer-ioied for their Peace, was no leſſe famous for his many important Victories, then was either Furius Camillus, or Papinius Curſor. And being honourably accompanied and attended vnto the Narrow Seas, with the hearty loue and fauour of all men, departed, and with a gentle gale of winde paſſed ouer, and came to the Princes Campe, where (being receiued with ioy and praiſe) he ſucceeded in the roome of Valens Iouinus, who had the conduct of the Horſemen. For theſe his Martiall deeds ſo happily atchieued, in honour of him there was a Statue erected, reſembling a Man of armes on Horſebacke, as by Symmachus may be vnderſtood, thus ſpeaking to his ſonne Theodoſius: The Author of your kindred and ſtocke, Captaine Generall both in Africke and Britaine, was (among other ancient Titles) conſecrated by the moſt honourable Order with ſtatues of Knight-hood. And in his commendations, Claudius with full note thus poetically ſang:

Ille Caledonijs poſuit qui Caſtra pruinis,

Dreadfull ſights, and fearfull Earthquakes. Amian. Marcell. lib.26.cap.14.

(11) Strange and dreadfull were the ſignes that in the third yeere of this Emperour chanced; as Earthquakes, Inundations, and the like; whereof Marcellinus thus reporteth: A litle after the Sunne-riſing (ſaith he) the waighty and ſteddy maſſe of the whole Earthly Globe ſhooke, flaſhes of lightning very thicke and fierce going before: the Sea alſo driuen aſide, and the waues and billowes ſo prepoſterouſly tumbling and retiring back, that the deepe Gulfes being diſcouered and laid empty, a man might haue ſeene ſundry ſorts of ſwimming creatures ſticking in the mudde: Alſo the vaſt Vallies and Rockes, which Nature had ſet farre away vnder the huge Waters, did now behold the Beames of the Sunne; inſomuch that many Ships were bedded faſt in the drie ground, and flocks of people ſtragled at their pleaſure in the ſmalle remaines of water, to take vp Fiſhes as the Sea-ſpoile; when on the ſudden the waues diſdaining to be thus diſpoſſeſſed, returned with ſuch violent beating vpon the Ilands and Promontories, which lay farre into the Sea, as that they ouer flowed, and laid leuell an infinite number of buildings and Cities. And therefore in this furious diſcord of the Elements, the ſurface of the world being couered, repreſented ſtrange and wonderfull ſights. Among which S. Ierome reporteth, that there rained Wooll from Heauen ſo perfect and good, that no better grew vpon the Sheepe, the naturall Producer. But to returne.

Gulfes of the Sea laid bare, and many Cities drowned.

(12) Fraomarius, whom Valentinianus had ordained to be King of the Bucinobantes in Germanie, was made Tribune and Colonell ouer a Regiment of Almains in Britaine, which for number and valour in thoſe daies were renowned; where (no doubt) matter enough was miniſtred for him to worke vpon. But the death of the Emperour preſently following, admits no mention of further diſcourſe which happened in this manner: The Quadi after many moleſtations done to the Roman Legions and their Confederates, ſent their Ambaſſadours vnto him, deſiring pardon for their former faults committed, and an aboliſhment of all remembrances thereof: with whome being in earneſt conference, ſuddenly the bloud guſhed out of his mouth; and being laid vpon his bed, ſhortly after died of an Apoplexie, or rather of the Plague, as the blew Markes appeating vpon his dead body gaue coniecture: Nouember the ſeuenth; of his age fiftie fiue yeeres, hauing raigned eleuen yeeres, eight moneths, and two daies, in the yeere of our Chriſt three hundred ſeuenty fiue.

(13) For preſence, he was Maieſticall, of bodie fat, his complexion faire, his eies gray, and hauing therewith ſomewhat a ſcue caſt, his haire ſhining bright, his ioints ſtrong and well knit: he was a Prince mercifull and louing, and mitigated many Tributes formerly impoſed on the Prouinces: a wiſe Warrior, ſterne in countenance, haſtie of ſpeech, and chaſte of body, a good Iuſticer, & impatient of all delaies. But theſe his Vertues with ſome Vices were accompanied: for he is taxed with enuie and partialitie, in puniſhing ſeuerely the poore Souldier for ſmall offences, but remiſsiue to the faults of their Captaines and Leaders, and that was the cauſe (by Amianus his report) of the troubles in Britaine, the loſſes in Africke, and the waſts in Illyricum.

(14) His Arian brother Valens ſuruiuing him, raigned Emperour in the Eaſt; by whoſe ſufferance the Barbarous Gothes entred Thracia, which preſently proued to be the bane of the Roman World, for that theſe Gothes (a ſtrange and vnknowne People til then) being forced out of a ſecret Nooke in Scythia, by the Hog-Backt Hunnes, ruſhing as an vnreſiſtable Whirle-Winde frō thoſe High Mountaines, infeſted the Coaſts about Danubius, and obtained licence from Valens to paſſe the Riuer Donaw into Thracia, where long in quiet they ſtayed not, but like a violent Floud running with a full current, they ouer-whelmed all before them, ouercomming the Romans in many Battles, and in one ſlew the Emperour Valens, with moſt of his approoued Captaines, and twenty fiue Tribunes that had charge of Regiments, the third part of his Armie hardly eſcaping vnſlaine. Some report that Valens flying the Field, tooke into a houſe neere Adrianople, whither being purſued by the Enemie, and his Hold fired vpon his head, was therein burned to aſhes, after he had ſate Emperour fourteene yeeres.

Gracianus & Valentinianus Emp.

Amianus Mar. lib. 27. cap. 5. Gracian and Valentinian Emp.

Lib. 30. cap. 12.

Gracian louing to Valentinian.

Iustina mother of young Valentinian.

Socrates eccles. hist. lib. 4. cap. 25.

Valentinianus marrieth Iustina, by whom he had young Valentinian

Gracianus, the Eldest Sonne of Valentinianus, by his Empresse Seuera, was made his fathers Collegue in the Empire in the fourth yeere of his Raigne: notwithstanding six daies after his death, his second Sonne Valentinian, a Childe of Foure yeeres old, by the aduice of the Counsell and generall consent of the Camp, was also stiled and proclaimed Emperor. These Brethren liued in much loue, and ruled in the West, as their vncle Valens did in the East, of whom wee last spake. And albeit Gracian had cause of displeasure, that this his younger Brother was thus aduanced without his allowance; yet he as a Prince kind and naturall, regarded his Brother exceedingly, and brought him vp in all tender affection, forgetting the wrong offered vnto himselfe and his owne Mother for Valentinians mothers sake.

(2) The Mother of this Valentinian was Iustina, a damsell of an admirable feature and exceeding beautie, surpassing all other women so farre, that the Empresse her selfe fell in loue with her, and vsually conuersed with her familiarly as her equall, imparting her most priuate secrets vnto her as her trustie Counseller, and often bathing together in the same Bath. Neither was her ardent affection contained within the measure of Womanish modestie, but that she refrained not in the hearing of the Emperour (her Husband) to extoll her incomparable beautie, preferring her far aboue any creature in the World. Whereupon Valentinian so farre affected this Lady, as that he tooke her to his Wife; by whom he had this young Valentinian, and also three Daughters, notwithstanding Seuera was yet liuing.

(3) The stormes of the Gothes as a violent tempest beating still against the Shores of the Romane Prouinces, caused Gracian to beare Sayle toward the safest Harbour, and to commit the guidance of his shippe to the most assured Pilot: their forces being so great, and their outrages so terrible, that hee thought it best not to aduenture his owne person, but to imploy some other approoued Captaine. For which exploit, none was held more sufficient then Theodosius, the Sonne of that Theodosius who was so famous for his British Warres, and whose life was taken away by Valens the Easterne Emperour. Him he made first Captaine Generall of the Roman Empire, and immediatly vpon his first seruice against the Gothes, his Fellow Emperor and Augustus, allotting him those parts in the East, that his vncle Valens lately had enioyed.

Theodosius, Captaine generall of the Roman Empire, and fellow Emperor.

(4) In many Battles, fought to the last drop of bloud, this worthy Generall ouercame the Gothes, so that their King Athanarius was lastly inforced to sue for his Peace, which vpon honourable compositions was graunted, and himselfe in most princely manner entertained by Theodosius in the Imperiall Citie Constantinople; where falling sick after three moneths, he died, and was both much lamented, and sumptuously buried by the Emperor. These reports caused Sapor, the most puissant King of Persia, to submit himselfe vnto Theodosius, and by his Ambassadors, attending his Court, obtained his Amity. Thus gloriously raigning and perfect peace established, he ordained his young sonne Arcadius his Fellow Emperor in the East.

(5) But the affaires in the Westerne Empire proceeded nothing so fortunately: for Gracian a meeke and soft spirited man, ballanced with Theodosius, was held without regard; and Valentinian by his Prefect Probus, held both Rome and Italy at his deuotion; onely Gallia obeyed Gracian. For Clemens Maximus borne in Spaine, but descended lineally from Constantine the Great, by his affability and liberall carriage, had won the affections of the Britaines to side with him; a man no doubt, both Valiant and Wise, had he held his alleagiance to his Soueraigne Lord. But the time fitting his purposes, when the Scots & Picts with their wonted inroades sore indamaged the Prouince, he set himselfe for their deliuerance, and therein sped so well, that the Souldiers by cõstraint (as Orosius saith) forced him to assume the Imperiall Stile and Purple Robe. And so so hasting into Gallia, with all the flower and strength well neer of the Britaines forces, arriued in the mouth of Rhene, vnto whom also the Germans Army ioyned, and now accounting himself an absolute Monarch, admitted Victor his sonne, then Cæsar, to be partner of his Empire, whose Stamp therefore with his fathers we haue annexed.

(6) Thus Maximus establishing his throne at Triers, Spread his wings (saith Gyldas) the one into Spaine, the other into Italy, and with the terror of his Name, leuied Tributes and Pensions for Souldiers pay, of the most fell and sauage Germans.

Against him Gracianus made his power, but after fiue daies skirmishings was forsaken of his own Souldiers, and so put to flight. And now deiected and destitute of meanes to maintaine his quarrell, hee sent Ambrose (a great Doctor of the Church) his Ambassador vnto Maximus, to intreate for Peace, which in outward shew was grãted, but was farre otherwise intended, as the sequell proued. For seeking his death, he did shortly after effect it in this wise: He caused Letters, and reports to be giuen vnto Gracian, that his Empresse was in iourny to visit him, and withall sent forth a Carroche stuffed with Souldiers, and with them a desperate Captaine named Andragathius. Gracian greatly reioycing for his Wiues approch, prepared himselfe to meet Her accordingly, and opening the Litter, thinking to embrace his Empresse, was by these Ruffins treacherously murthered neere vnto Lyons, when he had raigned fifteene yeeres, and liued twentie nine. Valentinian with his Mother Iustina, fearing the like conspiracies, became supplicants vnto Theodosius in the East against Maximus.

(7) He therefore preparing his forces, marched as farre as Aquileia in Lombardie, where Maximus remained both confident and secure. For hauing fortified the straits of the Mountaines with sufficient Garrisons, and dammed the Hauens with strength of Ships, himselfe and assisters with great boldnesse proceeded against Theodosius, and gaue him a battle before the Citie Syscia in Pannonia, and againe most valiantly receiued him in another, vnder the leading of his brother Marcellus; but in both of them was ouercome. From this last, he secretly retired vnto Aquileia, where of his owne Souldiers he was betraied, and deliuered to Theodosius his pursuer; and by him to the Executioner to be beheaded: of which his vnfortunate, but deserued end, the famous Bishop Martinus Turonensis being in Britaine, did foretell him long before. Andragathius also, the Murtherer of Gracian, whose state was now desperate, cast himselfe headlong into the Sea, and made an end of his wicked life. Victor the sonne of Maximus, made his Cæsar in France, as we haue said, was defeated, taken Prisoner & slaine. This Victory was held so worthy and memorable, that the Romans from thence forward solemnized that day euery yeere as festiuall, saith Procopius.

Andragathius drowned himselfe.

(8) But these Britaines that had assisted Maximus, as by Writers is recorded, did forcibly inuade Armorica, and there planted themselues: From whence (saith Beda, the Britaines first arriued into this Iland. But surely himselfe is either greatly mistaken, or else we mistake him altogether; and that rather, for that by Cæsar those Coasts that lie vpon the Sea shoars, are called Armorica, and there the Celtes seated, being the Originall of our Inhabitants, as is holden; and so from thẽce they might spread themselues further into these British Ilands, lõg before it receiued the name of Little Britaine. The like troubles fell to other Prouinces at the same time, by the intestine warres of the Empire: for the Gaules were molested by the Frankes; Spaine by the Sueuians; and Africk by the Vandals: the East parts by the Heruli, Ostroges, and Hunnes; Italy by the Lombards, and shortly after by the Gothes.

Beda Hist. Angliæ lib. 1. cap. 1.

(9) These troubles in the Prouinces, caused the Emperours to call home their Armies, with Aides of their Allies, & all too little to support their own declining Estates, which now beganne to end of it selfe, and these Emperors raignes to be cut off by their vntimely deaths.

But to returne into the path of our History, from whence (by the intangled occasions of these foure Emperours raigning together) we haue wandred; let vs remember what occurrents happened vpon the death of Maximus the Tyrant, and hasten to end the greatnesse of the Empire, which in most Prouinces began to end of it selfe. For Valentinian being rid of his feares, vnto which he had beene subiect; and Theodosius of his Collegue, vnto whom hee was enforced; great hope was conceiued of a florishing Estate, but it brought foorth onely the remaines of their downefall: for the one returning to Constantinople in great Triumph, liued not long after; and the other left peaceably in the Westerne world, was (as you shall heare) soone made away by Conspiracie.

(10) Valentinian remaining at Vienna in France, free from Hostile Enemies, retained in his Court those that sought his life, whereof Arbogastes, a Captaine of a haughty stomacke, politicke, aduenturous, and of great power, but withall of a base parentage, a stranger and an Infidell, was one; Eugenius a Grammarian, but now bearing Armes, and of great account, was another. These corrupting his Chamberlaines, compounded for his death, which they as wickedly performed, by strangling him in his bedde, giuing it forth that the Emperour had hanged himselfe; which was so confidently auouched, that Prosperus in his Addition to Eusebius writing his death, saith, that it was acted by himselfe, after hee had liued twenty six, and raigned sixteene yeeres, being strangled in the yeere of Grace three hundred nynty foure.

CHAPTER LII.

Flau. Theodosius Emp.

An. Do. 379

WE haue declared in the life of the laſt preceding Emperour, the Birth and Fortunes, Warres and Victories of this moſt worthie Theodoſius, vntill the death of Maximus the Britaine, (for ſo moſt writers terme him:) and now onely remaine his latter Acts in Warre and Peace to bee further related.

(2) This Emperour returning from Aquileia in Lombardie vnto Conſtantinople in the Eaſt, long time there ſtaied not, but was drawne againe into the weſt both to reuenge the death of Valentinian his Fellow-Emperour ſo trecherouſly ſtrangled, and alſo to oppoſe the proceedings of Eugenius, whoſe Coine wee haue heere expreſſed, being one of the Murderers then vſurping that portion of the Empire, and ſided by Arbogaſtes the other,

Theodoſius goeth againſt Arbogaſtes and Eugenius.

Eugenius vſurper.

(3) Theodoſius marching with his forces towards the Confines of Italie, found the paſſages ſtopped at the foote of the Alps, and his Enemies powers farre ſurmounting his: Therefore a while to deliberate on theſe buſineſſes, hee pitched his Tents, and their ſtaied. In the meane time Eugenius and Arbogaſtes his oppoſites had forelaid the country, and hemmed him about in ſuch a ſtrait, that no victuals could bee brought vnto his Campe.

(4) No meanes being now left, but either to cleere the paſſages, or bee ouerthrowne, hee firſt became ſupplicant with Faſtings and Teares vnto his God, whom he knew to be the God of Hoſts, and whom euer he had ſerued, and whoſe aid had hitherto neuer failed him: whereupon boldly incouraging his men, he accepted of the Field. But the Battle furiouſly begunne, fell ſo ſore againſt him, that ten thouſand of his Souldiers were preſently ſlaine; and the reſt deſpairing, ready to flie, himſelfe at that inſtant had beene ſurprized, had not God turned the heart of Arbitio, a Captaine of his Enemies, ſuddenly to come to his ſide, and to reſcue him. Theodoſius much daunted by theſe vnfortunate beginnings, yet conceiued better hopes of the following ſucceſſe, truſting to the vprightneſſe of his Cauſe, and the help of his God, which ſtill he implored, till the Heauens were propitious to his earneſt deſires.

Theodoſius praieth to God for victorie.

Sabellic. Ennead. 7. lib. 9.

(5) For ſuddenly a violent tempeſt aroſe; and a raging winde ruſhed ſo extreamely on the faces of his Enemies, that they were in no wiſe able to withſtand it, the power thereof beating back againe their darts into their owne ſides; whereas the arrowes ſhot from the Emperors part, were therby forced with double ſtrength to pierce through the Rebels Iron plates, whereby a moſt glorious victorie was obtained; and Eugenius taken, who lay grouelling at the Emperours feet, deploring his eſtate, and crauing his pardon; but euen as hee kneeled with cries and teares, the Souldiers ſtanding by ſtrucke off his Head. And Arbogaſtes the Author of theſe euiles by flight eſcaping, two daies after ran himſelfe vpon his Sword, and ſo reuenged on himſefe his owne wicked actions. This victory was atchiued the ſixth of September, in the yeere of grace three hundred ninety ſix, by Socrates account: and was ſo famous, that beſides the Records of Chriſtian Hiſtorians, Claudius a Heathen Poet thus eternizeth the fame in his Heroick Poeme.

(6) Theodoſius thus deliuered, repaired vnto Millan, where, worne with yeeres and trauels, ſhortly after he ſickened vnto death. And ſending for his Son Honorius, made him Emperour of the Weſt, and to Arcadius gaue the Eaſt, wherein hee had before made him his Cæſar. The Prouince of Africa he aſſigned to the gouernement of one Gyldus in his Sonnes behalfe, and in the Non-age of Arcadius appointed Rufinus for Conſtantinople, and Stilicho Tutor to yong Honorius in Italie, three moſt worthy men vndoubtedly, had the greatneſſe of their ſpirits beene contained within the liſts of their truſt and places.

Theodoſius dieth.

Honorius and Arcadius made Emperours

Gildus Gouernor of Africa.

Rufinus Gouernour of Conſtantinople.

Stilicho Gouernour of Italie.

(7) This laſt named Flauius Stilicho, famous for a long time, and an inward companion with Theodoſius, had been imploied in the Britaines warres againſt the inroades of the Scots, Vandales, and Picts; and therein had borne himſelfe with fortunate ſucceſſe, as the Poet Claudian implieth, where he bringeth in Britaine thus ſpeaking:

Stilicho ſomtimes imploied in the Britiſh Warres.

Me quoq; vicinis pereuntem Gentibus, inquit,
Muniuit Stilicho, totam quum Scotus Hibernem
Mouit, & infeſto ſpumauit remige Thetis.
Illius effectum curis, ne bella timerem
Scotica, nec Pictum tremerem; ne littore toto
Proſpicerem dubijs venientem Saxona ventis.

And I, ſaith ſhe, that ready was by bordering foes to periſh,
When Scots did cauſe the Iriſh ſtirres, then Stilicho did me cheriſh.

Stilicho commended by Claudian for his ſeruice in Britaine.

When

When Seas did foame with strokes of Oares, that beat the billowes backe,
His force effecting with his cares,
preuented still my wracke:
He bade me feare no forraine powers, that Scots or Picts could make,
Nor of the Saxons that on Seas, vncertaine courses take.

So that being by him freed from those many dangers, and all her enemies ouerthrowne, shee singeth her security by the same Poet thus:

——Domito quid Saxone Thetis
Mitior aut fracto secura Britanna Picto?

My Seas, though rough, are calm'd, sith Saxons conquer'd are,
And I securely rest,
now Picts are queld in warre.

But this her ioy, through the Treasons of these three Gouernours, was soone turned into laments and teares, and the whole Empires glory brought to a fatall period as presently it will appeare.

Theodosius his vertues

(8) This Theodosius for his Princely parts, by all writers is ranked among the very best of all the Emperours: And as he is likened to Traian for his feature and personage, so may he be compared in wisedome to Marcus Aurelius: In temperance with Antoninus Pius: For his Christian profession and deuotion, with Constantine the Great: and for his mekenes, equall to any: Whereof among many other, we haue one example very remarkeable; vpon an offence cõmitted by the Inhabitants of Thessalonica, hee commanded most seuere punishment to bee inflicted, which was so vnaduisedly executed, that as well the innocent, as the offenders were inuolued therein. He then comming to Millan, would haue entred the Church to haue communicated with other Christians in their sacred deuotions; which Ambrose, the great Doctor, and Bishop of that Sea (though otherwise a man of admirable mildnesse) resisted and forbad, in which estate the Emperour stood for eight moneths continuance: and then with great humility & submission, acknowledging his offence, was absolued, and againe receiued into the congregation. For preuenting of the like rash offences by him committed, he then enacted a Lawe, that thirty daies should passe betwixt the sentence of death, and the execution of the Malefactor: And to suppresse his hasty choller (whereunto he was much subiect) his vsuall manner was to recite the Greeke Alphabet, before hee vttered any speech sauoring of that humour.

Theodosius vpon his submission, absolued by the Church.

Theodosius his Art to suppresse anger.

(9) He died Ianuary the seuenteenth, the yeere of the worlds happines three hundred ninety fiue: when he had raigned seuenteene yeares, & liued sixty; as Aurelius Victor writeth, with whom he ends his History. His first wife was Flacillia, a religious Lady, the mother of Arcadius and Honorius; by his second wife hee had a daughter named Placidia Galla, first married vnto Athaulpus King of the Gothes, and after his death vnto Constantine, whom Honourius her brother made Augustus and his fellow Emperour:

ATall was the Act of Theodosius, in his Election of the three foresaid Protectors, whose greatnes carried with a glutted prosperity, grew to a surfet after his death in their ambitious thoughts, and was the downefall of the now aged and drouping Empire: first Gildus in Africa, not contented with the title of Comes or Earle, cast off all subiection, and as an absolute Lord, acknowledged neither Arcadius, nor Honorius for his soueraigne.

(2) Against these proceedings, his owne brother Mastelzerius opposed himselfe. and both in words and acts assayed to set him in his wonted place of obediẽce, which by no other means could be brought to passe, but by assistance sent him from Honorius.

Mastelzerius ouercommeth his brother Gildus with which, though much too weake, he marched against the Emperours Enemy, and as Paulus Orosius writeth, more by force of praiers to God, then power of men, in his encounter preuailed, and beheaded Gildus for his Treason. But himselfe becomming mighty, and forgetting that which in others hee remembred, himselfe vsurped the command of Africa against Honorius, casting off all subiectiue obedience, and as a free Prince ruled the Prouince: The Souldiours that had lately assisted the Emperours cause, now well perceiuing his aime leuelled at the Crowne, thought best to cut the string before he looosed the shaft, and made him shorter by the head.

(3) Ruffinus in Constantinople as boldly bare himselfe, thinking Arcadius both too weake and yong to sound the depth of his designes, whose thoughts did also worke vpon conceited Soueraignety: he therefore secretly sollicited the Gothes to warre vpon the Empire, that so Arcadius might either be slaine or intrapped

But theſe things thus dangerouſly complotted by Ruffinus, were as politically preuented by the Emperor, although a Child: for before the Seed of this Treaſon could bring forth either Bud or Blade, it was diſcouered, and the Author ſlaine by an Italian Band, his head (which as ſome affirme, firſt tooke breath in Britaine) was aduanced ouer a Gate in Conſtantinople.

(4) Thus Peace obtained by the deaths of theſe two Traitors, the Third ſtood vp with more danger in the Weſt: for Stilicho, Tutor to yong Honorius, thought it not ſufficient honour for him to haue his Daughter an Empreſſe by the Marriage of his Ward; but ſet at hazard (for himſelfe and ſon) his owne Conſcience, both their Liues, and the fatall ruine of the Now-declining Empire. For firſt ſowing ſeditions amongſt the Lieutenants of the Prouinces, picked alſo quarrels in the Emperors Court, Caſhiering with diſgraces thoſe Gothes that had ſerued with good proofe of their fidelity aboue twenty yeeres, ſince their entertainment by Theodoſius. Theſe to reuenge their wrongs, choſe for their Chieftaine a valiant Gothe named Alaricus, which ſhortly proued the Scourge of Rome: with whom ioyned the Vandals, Alanes, and Sueuians, who ioyntly with great fury beganne to warre in Anſtria & Hungarie, increaſing their Powers with ſuch multitudes, that as Paulus Oroſius, an Author of that time ſaith; The World was amazed and ſtood in feare. For vnto theſe Colonies reſorted two hundred thouſand Gothes, more, vnder the leading of Radagaſius their King, who together with vnited forces, ſubdued Thracia, Hungary, Auſtrich, Sclauonia, and Dalmatia, & ſpoiled al in ſuch manner, that it ſeemed Diuels and not Men had paſſed that way, as Saint Ierome (who liued at that time) expreſſeth: Theſe brute Beaſts (ſaith he) ſuffered by the wrath of God in this warre, haue laid Cities waſte, ſlaine the People, and left the very Fields bare and deſolate, whereof the Prouinces of Thracia, and Sclauonia, with the Country wherein my ſelfe was borne, beare too true, but lamentable Records.

(3) The Roman Empire thus daily declining, and theſe fierce nations making hauock where they came, the Armies in Britain were put in great feare, leſt the Flames of their Neighbours fire might Flaſh out, and take hold of them alſo. Therefore prouidently to preuent that danger, they elected one Marcus their Lieutenant for Emperor, yeelding him their obedience ſome ſhort time, and then finding his defects, immediatly murthered him.

The features and Imperiall Title ſtamped on the Romiſh Mony of theſe two vſurpers, (according to the vſuall manner of the like in Eſtate) we finde not, neither ſtands it with credit of our Hiſtory to faine them at pleaſure: therefore til time bring them forth from the Caues of obſcurity, we haue allowed them place only by theſe circles inſerted, that others may ſupply what preſently we want, and accompliſh by pencile, what we cannot by Preſſe.

(6) Yet time to Conſtantine hath bin more fauorable in preſeruing his remẽbrance by his minted Moneys, which here with his Story we preſent to ſight. At the fall of theſe former, no better at all then a Common Souldier, but vpon confidence onely conceiued of his Name, was made Emperor, who with more reſpect of honour, and liking of his aduancers, bare himſelfe better then the others had done. For putting to Sea, and landing at Bologne, he eaſily induced the Romans forces as farre as the Alps to ſide with him: Valentia in France hee manfully defended: the Rhine, which long had been neglected, hee fortified with Garriſons: vpon the Alps as well as vpon the Maritime Coaſts, where paſſages were frequented, he built Fortreſſes: Spaine likewiſe he held vnder the hand of Conſtans his Sonne, whom of a Monke hee had made Auguſtus, & by whoſe valour ſubdued al from the Pyrenean Mountaines to the Ocean. Whoſe Moneys wanting to expreſſe his Image & Stile, we haue alſo ſupplied with another Blanke.

(7) Conſtantine proſpering as wee haue ſaid, ſent Letters of excuſe vnto Honorius, affirming conſtantly that he was compelled by the Souldiers to do what he did: whereby he ſo pleaſed the Emperor, that commending his Valor, & holding him fit, he ſent him of free gift a Purple Robe. Wherupon their new-growne blade began to bud faire, and at Arles planted his Imperiall Seate, commanding the City to be called Conſtantina from him, and ordained that the Aſſemblies of the affaires of Seuen Prouinces ſhould be therein held. But this his Sunſhine of proſperity was ſoone ouercaſt with the Clouds of aduerſe fortunes, and his Crowne & Life laid together in the duſt. For in Spain againſt him was arreared Maximus a Vaſſall, whoſe Generall Geroncius intercepting Conſtans, (his Sonne and Cæſar) at Vienna in France, ſlew him: and Conſtantine himſelf within the walles of Arles, beſieged for Foure Moneths, after the Raigne of Foure Yeeres, laid aſide his Purple Robe, and entred the Church in Order of Prieſthood, and ſurrendring the City with his Stile Imperiall, was laſtly led into Italy, and there beheaded.

(8) From that time Britaine renewed her obedience to Honorius, and the Prouince a while was refreſhed by the Wiſedome and Prowеſſe of Victorinus her Lieutenant, who often repreſſed the incurſions of the

(9) But Rome at this time being sore afflicted, and by Alaricus with his Gothes and Vandals presently sacked, Honorius sent for victorinus with his Army out of Britaine, to the rescue of the Citie, as Claudian signifieth, when he reckoneth vp among other Aides, the British Legion sent thither: whereof the Scots and Picts had soone notice, and (according to their wonted manner) with fire & sword molested their neighbours.

Victorinus leaueth Britaine.

(10) The Britains therfore resolutely engaging themselues into dangers, tooke Armes, and freed their Cities and States from those Barbarous People: by whose example, the rest of their Nation in Armorica, with the Prouinces of Gaulois, deliuered themselues also from their oppressions, and all of them cast out the Roman Presidents; settling a forme of Commonwealth to their owne liking. But these our Britaines growing too weake to withstand the continuall inroades of their Northerne Enemies, humbly besought Honorius for succour; whose returne of comforts consisted only in words, exhorting them by Letters, to stand vpon their owne Guard. But they knowing it was not words, which must helpe them, againe deplored their miseries, & so obtained of him the assistance of one Legion, which in their aid droue backe those Assailants into their owne Marches, and fortified againe the Wall betwixt the Frith of Edenburgh vnto Cluid: so then departing, left the Britaines to defend themselues; who now, besides the Common Enemies so often mentioned, were much molested, and their Faith corrupted by one Pelagius, by birth a Britaine, by profession a Monk, & by leaud doctrine an Heretik, who was brought vp in the famous Monastery of Bangor in Wales; who had also trauel'd Italy, Sicilia, & Egypt for the study of learning, and grew into great fauour with Paulinus Bishop of Nola, and with S. Augustine, also, till his Heretical Assertions, which had been by him and his disciple Celestius (a Scot secretly taught, and by S. Ierome discouered) were afterwards condemned by Innocentius the first, Bishop of Rome. But the Arch-heretick returning into Britaine, & began againe obstinately to maintan the same, together with Agricola, one who spread the venome of that Heresie into Forraine parts: whose doctrines were, 1. That Man, without the grace of God, was able to fulfill all the Commandements. 2. That man in himselfe had Freewill. 3. That the Grace of God was giuen vnto vs according to our merits. 4. That the Iust haue no sinne. 5. That Children are free from Originall sinne 6. That Adam should haue died, though he had not sinned. And therein also one Timothy most impiously disputed against the Diuine and Humane Natures of Christ. Notwithstanding at the same time flourished Fastidius, a most learned British Bishop, and Chrysanthus also the Deputy or vicegerent of Britaine, who with great honor gouerned the affaires of the Church and Common-wealth, and was afterwards (as elswhere we haue shewed) made Bishop at Constantinople of the Nouatians against his will.

(11) Thus were the affaires of this Land managed vnder these Brethren Emperours: the elder of which Arcadius, died in peace at Constantinople, leauing his sonne Theodosius, a childe of eight yeeres, to the succession of the Empire, and to the tuition of Hisdigerdus King of Persia; a matter which seemed at first very dangerous, but prooued at the last very profitable. He raigned thirteene yeers, and died the first of May, the one and thirtieth of his age, the yeere of Christs birth foure hundred and ten. At which time one Iouinus, of an obscure beginning, had raised some Tumults in Gallia, stiled himselfe Emperour, vsurped the Purple Robe, and stamped his Coines with the Title of victory, as is seene in one which we heere present.

THEO-

THEODOSIVS 2. VALENTINIAN 3.

CHAPTER LIV.

Theodosius 2. Emp. East.

Valentinian 3 Emp. West.

GReat haue beene the Warres and ſtrange the Alterations, which both here at home, and through the world abroad, haue chanced vnto States, ſince the firſt attempts of Iulius Cæſar; vnto theſe preſent Emperors, Theodoſius the ſecond; and Valentinian the third, his Aſſociate; whoſe Liues and Raignes, did conclude the Succeſſions of the Romiſh Monarchs within this Iland of Great Britaine, and threw downe their Triumphall Arches, in many other Prouinces, which for long time had been obſequious to Romes ſoueraigne Command. So vncertaine is the Glory of this World, and her Seeming Strength ſo liable to Mutability, that the Powers and Periods thereof, held in His hand that holdeth the Vniuerſall Ball, are ſuddenly turned from their high-mounted ſite and beauty of the Sun, vnto the Down-fall and darke ſide of the Globe; and either fall againe into the ſmall Circuit of their firſt compaſſe, after they haue expired their Number, Waight, and Meaſure: or elſe with Daniels Image are vtterly extinct and blowne away, as the chaffe from the Summer flower.

Theodoſius & Valentinian the laſt Roman Monarks in Britaine.

Dan. 2. 35.

(2) The continuance of whoſe Eſtates; ſeeme they neuer ſo Great and Durable in Power, Circuit, Defence, and Multitude, hath ſeldome extended much the limit of Fiue hundred yeeres, but that their high and mounted Flames, fall in the aſhes of their owne conſuming decaies, or els hath receiued ſome other alteration of Empires encreaſe, as many learned Writers haue obſerued in moſt Comon-welths. So was it in the State eſtabliſhed by God himſelfe among his Peculiar People. As for the Promiſe to Abraham, made of Chriſt the Bleſſed Seed and Life of Man (where ceaſed the Worlds formerly-vſed computation from the Ages of Men) vnto the Law deliuered vpon Mount Sinai, declaring condẽnation and death, were foure hundred & thirty yeeres: from Iſraels departure out of Egypt, when their Common-wealth beganne to be ruled by Iudges; and Gods ſeruice celebrated in the Tabernacle vnder Curtaines, vnto the Building of their Glorious Temple erected by King Salomon, were yeres foure hundred and eighty. From the Annointing of Dauid, the firſt King, ſet vpon Iudahs Throne, vnto the death of Zedechiah the laſt King thereof, ſlaine by Nebuchadnezer, and that Holy Temple conſumed by fire, were yeeres foure hundred & ſeuenty. And other Politike Eſtates haue ſtood much vpon the like Space of time. For the Kingdome of Athens ſet vp by Cecrops the firſt King thereof, vnto Codrus the laſt, when they changed their Monarchie to a Democracie, is ſaid to haue continued foure hundred and ninety yeeres. The Lacedemonians State from Lycurgus their Law-giuer, vnto Alexander the Great, that ouerthrew it, flouriſhed the ſpace of foure hundred ninety one yeeres. From the expulſion of Romes Kings vnder Tarquinius vnto the affected Empire in Iulius Cæſar, were foure hundred ninety & nine yeers. And omitting many others, to come to our ſelues; from Cæſars firſt Inuaſion of Britaine, vnto the daies of this Valentinian the third, wherein the Romans did quite abandon it, were fiue hundred yeeres. From the Saxons intruſions and diuiſion of this Realme, into an Heptarchie vnder their Gouernment; vntill the vnited Monarchie made by King Egbert, in the yeere eight hundred and nineteene, were yeeres foure hundred ſixty nine. But from thence, vntill their iſſue failed in King Edward Confeſſor, were yeres onely two hundred forty ſeuen. And from the Normans Conqueſt, vnto the death of that moſt ſacred Soueraigne of eternall memory, Queene Elizabeth, when began againe the name of GREAT BRITAINE; and the vnion of the whole Iland to be brought into one entire Monarchie by the rightfull Succeſſion and thrice-happy entrance of our moſt gracious King IAMES, are yeeres fiue hundred thirty ſix. But of theſe three laſt, we are to ſpeake hereafter and now returne to finiſh vp the falling Eſtate of the Romans Greatneſſe.

The Roman Monarchies continuance.

(3) Theodoſius the ſonne of Arcadius beganne his Empire in the yeere of the worlds ſaluation foure hundred and eight, and was Gouerned with a ſpeciall protection by the Perſian King during his Minoritie, vnder the charge of Antigonus an excellent man. But now growne to yeeres, & ſome variance happening betwixt him & his Tutor, he was left to the diſpoſe of himſelfe: and his vncle Honorius leauing at his death great troubles vnquenched in the Weſt, the mightieſt Potentates aſſaied to make themſelues Emperours ouer ſeuerall Dominions, and from the richneſſe of the Imperiall Diademe, each one ſought to plucke a Iewell to beautifie his own Crowne. So the Barbarous Nations out of this one Monarchie began the foundations of many ſucceeding Kingdomes. For in Spaine the Vandalis, Sueuians, and Alanes, not contented with their portion there aſsigned, betooke themſelues to Armes. The Frankes and Burgundians, which had ben driuen out of France, reſolued againe to returne. The Gothes, that were Lords of Barcelona, Narbona, and Toloſa, did as the reſt. The Hunnes entred Hungarie. Iohn the Tyrant held Rome: and in Africa, Boniface became a Newter: Theſe ſtirres mooued Theodoſius to nominate nominate Valentinian his kinsman Emperour in the West; whose raigne and affaires (so farre as they touch Britaine) we will follow, being the last of the Romane Emperours that held out the succession of our British Monarkes.

Valentinian elected Emperour in the West.

His descent. In Chap. 52. sect. 8.

(4) This Valentinian was the sonne of Constantine, made Augustus, as is said, and of Placidia Galla daughter to the first Theodosius Emperour: which Lady in the sacking of Rome by Alaricus the Gothe, was taken prisoner, and by him giuen in marriage to his neere kinsman Athaulphus, who afterwards was king of that Nation; and by her sweete demeanour, and prudent meanes, a Peace was concluded betwixt her Husband and her Brother, but with such dislikes to the Gothes, that they presently killed him, and raised one Wallia for their King; who likewise comming to composition with Honorius, deliuered Placidia according to Couenants, whom the Emperour her Brother bestowed in Mariage vpon Constantine his Generall, in regard of his good seruice and Victories by him atchieued.

Placidia Galla her care of Valentinian her sonne.

(5) Shee, with yong Valentinian new made Emperour, being sent into Italie, selected the best approued Captaines to secure her sonnes Estate; whereof Aspar was one, that in Rome slew Iohn the Vsurper, who had there made himselfe Emperour, stamping this his face and stile vpon the currant Money of the State, and by his Tyrannies held his fortunes for fiue yeeres continuance.

Aspar and Aetius chosen by her.

Iohn Vsurper.

Aetius likewise, that had beene Gouernor of Spaine was imployed into Gallia, where the Frankes and Burgundians (vnder the conduct of Clodius their second King) sought to establish (as shortly they did) their Kingdome in that Countrey, giuing it the name of France, according to their owne, by which name they were neuer knowne to Caesar, Strabo, Pliny, Tacitus, Mela, nor Ptolemy; whereby the great blast of their Antiquitie is shewed to be but a puffe of winde.

France not knowne to Caesar by that name.

(6) At this time the Britaines were againe sore oppressed by the Scots and Picts, who hauing notice that the Aides sent by Honorius were returned, passed ouer the water in their Boates at both the ends of the Wall, and inuaded the Prouince with such force, that they bare downe all before them. The Britaines in this lamentable plight, sent their Ambassadours to Rome, with their Garments rent, and dust vpon their heads, vnto Valentinian the Third, bewailing their most miserable Estates, and crauing his help. The Emperour mooued to remorse, sent a Regiment of Souldiers into Britaine, vnder the Command of Gallio of Rauenna, a most valiant man, who hauing put backe the Enemie with the assistance of the Ilanders, gaue some small comforts to the distressed Britaines. But the Burgundians passing the Rhene, and threatning to waste Italy, Aetius was compelled to recall Gallio with his Legion, to secure the Country about Paris, whilest himselfe with his, followed the dangerous Enemie.

Britaines sore oppressed with the Scots and Picts.

Britaines sorrowfull Ambassage to Valentinian.

Britaines obtaine some small succour.

Gallio sent to aid them.

Burgundians threaten Italie.

Gallio recalled, and the Britaines quite forsaken of the Romans.

(7) He now ready to depart for France, told the Britaines that it was not for the Romans to take so long and painfull Iournies, neither at that time especially when their own Empire was in danger to be ouer-ran. Therefore he willed them thenceforth to stand vpon their Guard and to prouide for their owne safeties: and to that end, in regard of their good seruices done to the Romans, he taught them the vse of their Armour and weapons, as also to strengthen their Fortification, and Wall of Turfe, which now they began to build with firme Stone, laid eight foot in thicknesse, and twelue foot in height. This wall (saith Gildas) they drew in a straight line (at the publike charges of the State) from East to West, and from Sea to Sea, planting Bulwarkes, and raising Turrets, with conuenient spaces distant one from another; which gaue a faire and farre prospect into the Sea. And so the Romans gaue a finall Farewell, meaning neuer to returne againe; and burying part of their Treasures heere in the Earth, whereof much hath beene found, and more is still sought, left Britaine about the yeere of Christ fiue hundred, after the first inuasion thereof made vnder the conduct of Iulius Cajar.

The time of the Roman finall forsaking of their temporal iurisdiction in Britaine

(8) This vnfortunate Emperour Valentinian lost not only Britaine, but suffered also Africa, France, and Spaine to be plucked from his Empire: and the weakenesse of the Romans power (whose strength consisted most in Forraine Aides, (as Tacitus saith) was left vnable to defend it selfe when they had bereft this Prouince of all the Flower and Choice of Men, as Gildas in that age complained, saying; Britaine is despoiled of all her armed men, with her militarie forces: her Rulers (cruell though they were) are wasted, her Garrisons withdrawn, and defences laid open, and an exceeding great number of her stout couragious Souldiers taken from her, to serue the Romans in their warre. With which his sayings the Roman Writers themselues agree, and record the Musters and great multitudes of Britaines that haue beene transported by them out of this Iland: as when Trebellius Maximus with his British Forces made strong the Faction against Otho in Germanie: and then also Honorius Flaccus brought thence eight thousand chosen Souldiers to vphold Vitellius in his cause.

Clodius Albinus banding against Seuerus the Emperour, tooke out of Britain the flower of their cheualry vnder whose banner most of them perished, when in the Fields of France, and neere vnto Lyons, they spent their blood in his cause; whereby the sinewes of their owne Countries defence was sore weakened, and laid open to Forraine Inuaders. Constantine the Great also (as Malmesbury noteth) carried hence a great power of British Souldiers with him in his warres, by whose puissance (as he saith) he obtained Triumphant Victories, and the Empire of the whole World: and after assigned them that part of Gallia to inhabit, which was called Armorica, lying westward vpon the Sea Coasts, where they seating themselues, their posteritie was increased, and continueth a Mightie People euen vnto this day.

Constantine transported a great power of Britaines.

(9) This Countrey afterwards (being conquered by Maximus, and his reconciled Enemie Conan Meriadoc, Lord of Denbigh land, by the prowesse of those British Souldiers whom hence hee carried in his quarrell against Valentinian the Emperour) was receiued in free gift of Conan, after the slaughter of Iubates the King, and the name therof changed to Little Britaine, as being a Colonie or Daughter of this our Iland. The Prouince is large, pleasant, and fruitfull, and containeth in her Circuit nine Bishops Seas, whereof three are called Cornouaille vnto this day, which are Leonensis, S. Paul, and Tregniers: the other six are Dole, Rhenes, S. Malo, Nanetensis, Vannes, and Brien, whose language differeth from their Neighbours the French, & retaineth as yet the British Dialect. I omit to speake of those other Numbers of men sent for out of this Kingdome by the said Conan, whereof our British Historians make mention; besides the sending of Vrsula with Eleuen thousand Virgins to be matched in mariage with these their Country-men, all of them perishing by Sea or by Sword, but none of them returning hither againe; wherby the bane of the Land presently followed, her hopes being cut off, and depriued of wonted Posterities.

Armorica changed to the name of Little Britaine.

It containeth nine Bishops Seas.

Great numbers of Britaines sent to Conan.

A great multitude of Virgins sent out of Britain to Armorica.

(10) This Conquest and Plantation in Armorica, Matthew of Westminster accounteth to haue happned in the yeere of Christ three hundred ninety two. And these Souldiers thus withdrawne, are so recorded by Henry of Huntington his ancient; and Ninus also long before both, reporteth that Maximus gaue ma-

Thése (saith hee) are the Britaines in Armorica, who neuer returned to this day, in regarde whereof Britaine was Conquered by Strange Nations. With whom agreeth Gerualius a Monke of Canterburie, Iohn Anglicus, Ranulphus of Chester, and others. Thither also in the downefall and desperat Estate of the Britaines, many of them fled from the rage of their Enemies, as hee that was borne in Armorica, and liued neerest to that age, euen the writer of the Life of S. Wingualoe the Confessor, doth sufficiently proue. An of-spring (saith he) of the Britaines embarked in Flotes, arriued in this Land, on this side the British Sea: what time as the Barbarous Nation of the Saxons, fierce in Armes, and vnciuill in manners, possessed their Natiue and Mother Soyle, &c.

(11) And lastly, in the cause of that other Constantine, who was elected only for his Name, most of the Flower and Strength of the Britaines were transported into Gallia and Spaine, where in his variable fortunes many of them perished. And Malmesbury writing of these times, saith, that the Romans had emptied Britaine of all her Flower and Chiualry of Warre, leauing now in her Countries but Halfe-barbarous men, and in her Cities only Epicures, vnfit for seruice. In confirmation whereof, the most learned Cambden out of Antike Inscriptions, and the Booke named Noticia Prouinciarum, hath obserued, that these Companies vnder written serued the Romans in their Warres, & were dispersed here and there in their Prouinces, which also were from time to time euermore supplied out of Britaine.

(12) No meruaile is it then if Britaine lay weake; being thus continually exhausted of her strengths, which these approued Records make so apparant, as we neede not alleage the doubtfull story of Irpus of Norway, for the depopulation of the Island, who is said by subtlety vnder pretence of Kindred, and Honour to be atchieued, to haue gotten an infinite number of Britaines to follow him in his enterprise, which neuer returned againe. or the booke Triades mentioned by the Author of the Reformed History of Great Britaine, that bringeth an Army hence, consisting in number of one and twenty thousand men, into Aquitaine and Gaul: which, as he saith, was the ayde mentioned by Cæsar, that out of Britaine assisted the Gaules against him. Which may partly seem to be gathered from Cæsar himself, as hath been said: where he affirmeth, that the Britaines and Gaules were gouerned vnder the same King: and is further confirmed by the fashion and Inscriptions of Antique Coines, which wee haue seene stamped in Gold, the Forme round, and Shield-like: Imbossed outward in the Face, and Hollow in the Reuerse; a Forme vnfallible to be of the Britaines Coines, and the word Comes inscribed vpon the Imbossed side, we imagine to be the same Gouernor of Artoys in Gallia, whom Cæsar mentioneth.

(13) Thus then was Britaine first made weak by the Romanes exhaustings, and then quite abandoned of their helpe, and left as a tree in the Wildernesse, to lose her faire leaues by the continuall blasts of these sharp Northren windes, whose beauty before had bin as the Cedars of Libanon, or like vnto those in the Garden of God. Britaine abandoned of the Roman Garriſons.

THE Britaines thus abandoned of all the Romane Garriſons, and emptied of ſtrengths that ſhould haue ſupported her now down-falling-eſtate, lay proſtrate to confuſion and miſerable calamities; no leſſe burdened with the tumultuous vproares of her owne great men, who ſtroue for the ſupreme Gouernment, then of the Barbarous Nations which with continuall incurſions made ſpoile where they came. Theſe times (ſaith Ninius) were full of feares, and were prolonged with forty yeeres afflictions: wherein Vortigern then King was troubled with the violence of the Romans, the dreads of the Picts and Scots, and the oppoſitions of Aurelius Ambroſius, who ſuruiuing his ſlaine Parents, that had worne the Imperiall purple Robe, ſought their reuenge vpon their wicked Murderer: beſides the Intruſions of the Germane Saxons, called in for Friends, but proued indeed the greateſt Enemies. During the conflict of theſe tempeſtuous ſtormes, ſome ſmall comforts were miniſtred vnto the Britaines by Biſhop German his preſence, who from France aſſiſted them againſt the Pelagian Hereſies, and the perilous aſſaults of the Scots and Picts, who in diuers skirmiſhes ouercame them.

(2) Theſe dolorous times of Britaines deſtruction, Gildas the mournefull Hiſtorian, who liued not long after, doth declare. As ſoone as the Romans (ſaith hee) *had left Britaine, and were returning vnto their home, forthwith hideous multitudes of Scots and Picts came ſwarming out of their Carroghes, (whe rein they paſſed the * Scitick Vale) like whole Armies of duskiſh vermine, which at high noone, when the Sunne is in his greateſt heat, began to crawle foorth of their narrow holes an infinite number of hideous* Scots and Picts; which two kinds of People, though in conditions ſomewhat different, yet they conſorted too well in greedie deſire of bloud-ſhed: and hauing intelligence, the aſſociates of Britaine were now returned with vtter diſclaime of further aſſiſtance; with more confident boldneſſe then euer before, they ſeize all the Northerne and vttermoſt part of the Iland, as if it had beene their own inheritance, euen as farre as to the Wall. Againſt theſe attempts there were ranged in the high Forts along the Wall, Garriſons of Souldiers, but ſuch as were both ſlothfull, and alſo vnſeruiceable for Martiall Affaires: which white-liuered Lozels with quaking hearts ſate ſtill warding day and night, till their ioints were as benummed and ſtupid as the ſtones whereon they ſate: inſomuch as the naked Enemies did with long hooked Engines plucke from off the wall thoſe miſerable Warders, daſhing their bodies againſt the ground. This good yet they got by their vntimely deaths, that being thus ſuddenly diſpatched out of the world, they eſcaped the imminent lamentable calamities that their brethren and children ſhortly felt. To bee ſhort, hauing abandoned their Cities & this high defenſiue Wall, once more they tooke themſelues to flight, and were diſperſed in a more deſperate manner then euer before. For the enemie was more hot in purſuit, and more cruell in the ſlaughter, the wofull Inhabitants being by their Enemies maſſacred, and rent in peeces like Lambs in the hands of bloudy Butchers, or in the iawes of cruell and ſauage Beaſts. In theſe moſt miſerable times, (neceſſitie ſo compelling) the poore diſtreſſed people forbare not to rob each other of that ſuſtenance, which could helpe them but for a very ſmall ſeaſon: and ſo their hoſtile oppreſſions were increaſed by their domeſticke vexations, for that the whole Country by theſe continuall direptions, was vtterly depriued of the ſtaffe of foode, hauing nothing left to prolong their life, but that only what they got in hunting. Wherupon, about the thirtie nine yeere of Theodoſius, and of Chriſt foure hundred fortie ſix, the diſtreſſed Remaines of the downe-caſt Britaines addreſſed their miſsiue Letters to Aetius, whom Gildas caleth Agitius, Preſident of Gallia, in moſt lamentable manner, and thus inſcribed.

afflicted by famine and mortalitie, which at this present extreamely rageth in our Land. And putting him in mind that it much importeth the Maiesty of the Roman Empire to protect and succour their Prouince, seeing it had now stood vpon the point of fiue hundred yeers vnder their obedience, whose strength of Souldiers taken frō thence to serue their Emperors in their Wars else-where, was now decaied, and their wealths wasted by maintaining their many Legions in their own Land and abroad: All this notwithstanding the Romans either would not, or could not relieue, hauing enough to doe to vphold their owne; but returned them againe with heauy hearts into the hands of their most cruell Enemies, who now knowing themselues free from the Romans interceptions, as a violent floud brake thorow the Prouince, and bare downe all before them; the Inhabitants flying like chased Deere, some taking ouer Seas into Britane in France; some to South-wales, North-wales, Cornwall, and parts of Deuonshire, leauing the best of the Land to the will of their Persecutors, and much of their Treasures hid in the ground, which neuer after they enioyed.

(4) But the greeuous Famine still increasing, though it had this woful issue with some, that it made them yeeld themselues into the Enemies bloudy hands (onely in hope to gaine a little sustenance of food for the present,) and for many yeeres after left lamentable tokens (saith Beda) of great desolations wroght by that dearth: yet with those other which were of more noble and resolute spirits it produced a better effect; insomuch as frō out of the Mountaines, Caues, & thicke woodes, they assailed their enemies, reposing their trust not in Man, but in God, whose help is then most at hand, when mans help faileth. These in many skirmishes gaue them the ouerthrow with much slaughter, and that for many yeeres together, when they made their incursions for booties and spoile, which caused these Rauening Irish to returne home; and the Picts awhile rested from further molestation. Notwithstanding the Britaines returned not from their owne wickednesse, growing strong now daily represing the Enemie, but stronger in their owne sinnes and ciuill dissensions. By meanes whereof, though a surcease of Hostile Warres was imbraced, and the skarres of famine cleerly skinned vp, yet another sore as dangerous as either, secretly bred, & shortly brake forth. For the Land being free from the Enemies wastes, yeelded such plenty and abundance of all things, as the like before no age had seene; and therewithall such riot and excesse, that the peoples sins grew to a plētiful haruest, as by the words of Gyldas is apparant.

Beda bist. Ang. lib. 1. cap. 14.

(5) Certainly it is heard (saith he) that there is such fornication, as the like is not among the Gentiles. Truth with the maintainers thereof is hated: Lies with the Forgers thereof highly esteemed. Euill is entertained for good, leaudnesse respected more then vprightnesse, darknesse desired before the bright Sunne, and Satan accepted for an Angle of light: Kings then were annointed, not according to Gods liking, but such as excelled others in crueltie; and as cruelly againe by their anointers were they murdered, not for any demerit, but that they might aduance others more sauage then the former. If he were milde, or inclining to truth, the darts of hatred were on euery side leuelled against him, as the onely Subuerter of the Britaines Estate. What was pleasing or displeasing to God, was all one with them, sauing that the better things commonly wroght most discontent: so that rightly the saying of the Prophet, which was denounced vnto the people in old time, might be applied to our Country: Yee lawlesse and corrupt children haue forsaken the Lord, and prouoked vnto wrath the holy one of Israel. Why should ye be smitten any more, still multiplying iniquitie? Euery head is sicke, and euery heart is heauy: from the sole of the foot vnto the crowne of the head, there is nothing sound therein. Thus did they all things that were contrary to their safety, as if that medicine which was bestowed by that truest Physitian of all, was needlesse for the world. And not onely the prophaner sort did this, but also the selected flocke of the Lord, and the Shepheards thereof, who ought to haue giuen example to the whole people. To speake of drunkennesse, numbers of them lay senseless and weltring in wine, swelling with pride, contention, and griping enuie, putting no difference in iudgement betweene good and euill: insomuch that it seemeth, contempt was powred forth both vpon Princes and people: and all of them seduced by vanities, wandred in errors and by-paths, not led in the right way. When God therefore was minded to purge his Familie, and to recure them thus infected with the corruptions of sinnes, by heare-say only of Tribulation, the winged flight of an often-tried rumor pierced the attentiue eares of all men, giuing notice of their ancient Enemies, ready to arriue, and fully minded to destroy them vtterly, and to inhabit (as earst they did) the whole Countrey from one end to another. Yet all this could not reclaime them, but like vnto mad horses, which taking the bit fast betwixt their teeth, runne away with their Riders, so these leauing the way that leadeth (narrow though it bee) vnto saluation, ran at randome in the wide way of all wickednesse, which leadeth directly to death. Whiles therefore (as Solomon saith) the stubborne seruant will not bee amended with words, he is scourged for a foole, and feeleth not the whip: for loe, a pestilent contagion fell heauily vpon this foolish people, which (though the enemies sword was gone) in short space destroied such multitudes of them, that the liuing were not able to bury the dead. Neither yet also were they thereby bettered, that the saying of the Prophet Esay in them might be fulfilled: God called them to mourning, to baldnesse, and sacke-cloth: but behold, they fell to killing of calues, and to slaying of Rammes; loe, they went to eating and drinking, and said withall, Let vs eat and drinke, for to morrow wee shall die. And indeed the time now drew nere, wherein their iniquities (like as those in times past of the Amorites) should come to the fulnesse. And euen at that instant the like measure beganne to bee heaped vpon the Britaines.

Britaines iniquitie.

(6) For the common enemie now inuading the Southerne parts, was entred as farre as Stamford vpon the Riuer Welland; whom to resist, the Britaines assembled together, and hauing experience what ciuill iarres had formerly done, they iointly vnite their meanes and powers, and with one consent elect a King to manage these affaires, which was Vortigerne, by birth extracted from the British Line, nobly descended, had not his many vices blemished the same. The British Historie saith, that hee was Earle of Cornwall, and of great command in the daies of Constantine their King, whose simplicitie hee much abused, and whom lastly hee caused to be murdered by the Guard of his Person, the Scots and Picts by him so placed, and to that end instigated: whom neuertheless with death hee seuerely punished, to auoid further suspition. In whose reuenge, these fierce Nations so assaulted his Dominions with rape and spoile, that hee was forced for further assistance to send for these Saxons to his aid. Whether thus, or otherwise, most true it is, the Saxons were sent for, and of hoped Friends, became the tried Enemies to the Britaines and their Estates, as out of Gildas their Historian wee shall anon declare.

(7) The occasion and manner of this their inuiting and comming, is set downe by a Countryman of their owne Witichindus, a Writer of good antiquity, who thus relateth the circumstance thereof. Britaine (saith he) by Vespasian the Emperour, long since being reduced among the Roman Prouinces, and held in their subiection, stood them in no small stead: but their Legions abandoned; and destinie (as it seemeth) *determining the downefall, became soone assaulted by their neighbour Nations the Northerne Borderers. For the people of Rome after that the Emperor * Martiall was slaine by his Souldiers, being tired out with forraine wars, were not able to assist their friends with supply of accustomed aides. And yet had they built a mighty peece of worke for the defence of the Country, reaching betweene the confines from Sea to Sea, where it was thought that the Enemies would assaile the Inhabitants left in the Land. But no difficulty it was for them so fiercely bent, and euer ready to make war (especially where they dealt with a Nation feebled and left vnable to make resistance) to destroy the* the laid worke. Therefore hearing of the worthy and fortunate exploits atchieued by the Saxons, they sent an humble Embassage to require their aid, and these hauing audience, spake as followeth.

Saxons great Warriours and fortunate.

" Most noble Saxons, the poore and distressed
" *Brets, outworn & tired by the many incursions of " their enemies, hearing the fame of those victories
" which you haue most valiantly obtaind, haue sent " vs Suppliants vnto you, craving that you would " not deny them your helpe and succour. A large " and spacious Land they haue, plentifull and abun" dant in all things, which we yeeld wholly to be at " your deuotion and command. Hitherto wee haue
" liued freely vnder the patronage and protection of " the Romans, next vnto whom wee know not any " more powerfull then your selues, & therefore we " seek for refuge vnder the wings of your valour. So " that we may by your puissance be superiour of our " enemies, whatsoeuer seruice you shal impose vpon
" vs, that will we willingly abide.

* Britaines. The Britaines Ambassage and speech to the Saxons.

To this petition the Peeres and Nobles of the Saxons briefly made answer in this wise.

" Know yee that the Saxons will be fast friends
" vnto the Brets, and ready at all times both to " assist them in their necessity, and also to procure
" their wealth: with ioy therefore returne yee Am" bassadors, and with this wished-for tidings make " your Country-men glad. Hereupon (according to promise) an army was sent into Britain, & ioifully receiued, which in short time freed the Land frō the spoiling enemies, & recouered the country vnto the behoof of the Inhabitants.

The Saxons answere to the Petition of the Britaines.

(8) But how true this last clause is, may appeare out of the ancient Gildas, who thus recordeth it: To represse (saith hee) many Inuasions of those their ancient enemies, which with cruell slaughters and booties continually afflicted them, the Britaines fell to consult vpon some conuenient course therein to be taken. Lastly all the Counsellers, together with the proud Tyrant, being blinded in iudgement, deuised such a protection, as in the end proued their Countries destruction; namely, that those fierce Saxons, a people sauage and of hatefull name, odious both to God and man, should be let into this Iland, as it were wolues into sheepe-folds, to repulse (forsooth) the Northerne Nations: then which proiect doubtlesse nothing was euer more pernicious and vnhappie vnto this Land. O senses sensles and plunged into deepest mists of errour! desperate dulnesse, and blinde blockishnesse of minde! Those who in absence were feared more then death, now of their owne accord are inuited by these Princes of Ægypt (if I may so say, thus sottishly counselling their Pharao) to come and rest with them vnder one roofe. Presently out of the Denne of that barbarous Lioness rushed footh a kennell of her whelpes, in three long vessels, called in their Language Cyula, carried vnder full saile, and with ominous presages fore-prophecying that for 300 yeeres they should possesse that Land vnto which they then directed their course, and for halfe of that space, (viz. one hundred and fiftie yeeres) they should waste and depopulate the same. These being put on shore first in the East part of the Iland, and that by Commandement of this vnfortunate Tyrant, there set fast their terrible pawes, pretending to the Ilanders, defense of their Country, but more truly intending the destruction of them. The foresaid Lioness finding that her first troupe of whelpes sped so well, sends againe a greater Rabble of the same Litter, which heere arriued in Flotes, bringing with them some other Associates of bastardly & vnnoble brood. And these beginnings, the slips of iniquitie, and the roots of bitternesse, (an accursed plantation well befitting our demerits) haue sprung vp, and put forth in our soile their haughty boughs and spreading branches. This barbarous Nation thus admitted, professing themselues our Souldiers, and such as would endure all hazards (so they fained) in defence for their good Hosts, first they craued supplie of victuals only; which being giuen them, for some time stopped (as we may say) the Dogs mouth: howbeit, afterward they complaine that their wages was not bountifully enough paid, deuising of purpose colourable occasions of quarrell, and threatning that vnlesse they might haue more munificent entertainment, they would with the breach of couenant spoile and waste the whole Iland. And without further delay, they second these threats with deeds (for our Sinnes, the cause of deserued reuenge, were still nourished) and the fire kindled Eastward, was set a flaming by these sacrilegious men from Sea to Sea, ceasing not to consume all the Cities and Countries bordering thereabout, vntill such time as burning welneere all the Inland Soile of the Iland, it licked (as it were) with the red tongue of the flame the very Westerne Ocean it selfe. In this violent inuasion, comparable to that of the Assirians against the Land of Israel in old times, is historically fulfilled also in vs, that which the Prophet by way of sorrowfull lamentation vttereth: They haue set fire vpon thy holy places, and haue burned the dwelling place of thy Name, euen vnto the ground. And againe: O God the Heathen are come into thine heritage, thy holy Temple haue they defiled: for all the Fortifications demolished with their Engines, and the Inhabitants together with the Bishops of the Church, and also the Priests and people, with glittering swords & crackling flames, were all at once laid along vpon the ground, yea and (which was a most lamentable spectacle) the stately Turrets, high mounted Walles, and the sacred Altars, lay all tumbling together (all purpled with the broken and bloudy Quarters and goared Carcases, mixed as in a horrible wine-presse. Neither were there any other Sepulchers abroad, saue the ruines of buildings, and the bowels of wilde beasts and birds.

(9) During this most wofull, desperate, and tempestuous season (saith the mournfull Historian) some poore Remaines of Britains being found in the Mountaines, were slaine by whole heapes: others pined by famine, came and yeelded themselues vnto their enemies, vpon composition to serue them as Bond-slaues for euer, so they might not bee slaughtered out of hand: which granted, was reputed a most high and especiall grace. Others went ouer Seas into Strange Lands, singing vnder their spread Sailes with a lamentable and mourning note, that of the Psalmist: Thou hast giuen vs, O Lord, as Sheepe to bee deuoured, and hast scattered vs among the Heathen. Yet others remained still in their owne Countrey (albeit in fearfull estate, and continually suspecting hazard) committing their liues and safety to the high steepe Hilles, to craggy Mountaines naturally intrenched, to thick growne Woods and Forrests, yea and to the Rockes of the Sea.

(10) Thus was Britaine brought to the period of her glory, and the people miserably subiected to a forraine Nation, about the yere from Christs Natiuity 473. and after the Romans last farewell, 28. In which time you see they were most cruelly pursued with all calamities of warre, and lastly betrayed by them in whom so much trust was reposed, as mournfull Gildas hath ruefully declared.

THE ROYALL STEMME OF THE SAXONS, FROM PRINCE VVODEN AND HIS WIFE FRIA; BRANCHED VNTO THEM THAT FIRST LAYDE THE HEPTARCHIE OF GREAT BRITAINE.

BEfore wee enter into the diſcourſe of thoſe SAXONS, that by ſubtilty firſt ſought, and by ſtrength at laſt obtained the faire inheritance of great Britains Crowne, let vs firſt ſhew from what ancient Stem theſe ſeuen faire branches tooke ſappe of growth or beginning: that ſo the eye may be led, and the minde delight, to view, & to reade the maners of them, that ſince Noah, Gomer, and Iauan, are of ſureſt record, to be our knowne parents. And from this tree-like body behold the boughes that grew & aſpired to the hight of their owne wiſhed glory: laying the foundation of their ſeuen kingdoms in Great Britains Iland; which no ſooner was enioyed, but each of them ſought by his owne, to ouerſhaddow the next, vntill Fortune & warre brought all into one. And by the ſucceſſors of that one, the Crowne is ſtill worne, for fame and continuance far fairer then any. Theſe Saxons thus branched, by Florentius monke of Worceſter, is brought from Prince Woden their deified Mars, and from Fria his princeſſe, by them adored for the goddes Venus: and that with no litle imaginations of both their great powers. I need not to commend the credite of this monke, ſeeing Bale in his Centuries, 66. hath done it before me; and time the touch-ſtone of truth hath ſet him ſo neere vnto their tymes, that his life might well touch the liues of ſome of theſe Saxons: for he wrote in the dayes of king Henry the firſt, and died in the yere of grace a thouſand one hundred & nineteene; being the firſt recorder of our Normane Stories, and the director of all after-followers. See therefore from him (if you pleaſe) theſe SAXONS deſcents: and from him, and others their originalls, maners, religions, lawes and names: reſeruing the credit thereof vnto them; but the errors and paynes to our ſelfe.

THE SAXONS ORIGINALL.

CHAPTER II.

AS times decaied Ruines haue ſtopped the Paſſage of thoſe ſmal Springs, iſſued from the firſt fountatne of Nations beginnings, and haue diuerted their ſtreames far from any ſure Courſe, or certaine known Heads; ſo the originall parent, place, and name of our Engliſh Saxons, haue bin writtē with a pen of ſlight touch vpon the leaues of obliuion, or elſe recorded in thoſe obſcure Roules, that as yet ly bound vp in the Office of times forgetfulneſſe: whereby it reſts doubtfull from what root theſe branches firſt ſprang; ſome bringing them from Aſia, ſome from Africa, ſome from Macedon, ſome from Denmarke, and ſome without all likelyhood from Britaine it ſelfe.

Saxons, the vncertainty from whence they came.

Occa Scarlenſis a Friſlander borne, affirmeth theſe Saxons to come of Saxo a Prince of India, who with his two brethren were baniſhed by lot to ſeeke their deſtinies abroad, their owne Countries being peſtered with ouer many people at home. Theſe (ſaith he) following Alexander the Great into Greece, became Progenitors to their Countries, that frō them receiued their of-ſpring and names: as that from Friſo the eldeſt, his Friſlanders defended; from Saxo the ſecond the Saxons vpon the Riuer Albis, and from Bruno the yongeſt, the inhabitants of the Dukedome of Brunſwic. And of this opinion alſo Sufridus Petri ſeemeth to be. Crantzius doth deriue them from the Catti in Germany and the Phrygians a Region in Aſia; to omit others, who would bring them from Saxo the brother of Vandale.

(2) F. Albinus a learned Author, doth thinke the Saxons to bee deſcended from Sacæ, a people in Aſia, and that afterward in proceſſe of time they came to be called Saxons; as if it were written Sax-ſons, as much to ſay as The ſonnes of the Sacæ. To this opinion Maſter Henry Ferrers, a Gentleman of ancient deſcent, great reading, and a iudicious Antiquary agreeth; whoſe iudgement for my particular, I haue alwaies honoured, and from the Progeny of his Engliſh Monarchs haue taken my principall proceeding in theſe Saxon Succeſſors.

(3) As touching the ancient place of their aboad, Ptolomy the Alexandrian placeth the people Saſones in the Inner Scythia, betwixt the Moũtaines Alani & Tapuri; & Amianus Marcellinus ſiteth the Sacæ (no doubt the very ſame) a fierce and ſauage Nation, to inhabit ouergrowne places, commodious onely for cattell, at the foote of the Mountaines Aſcanimia & Comedus, neere vnto which the Citie Alexandria, Tribatra and Drepſa were adioyning, and are ſo ſet by Ptolemie. Neither is it leſſe probable that our Saxons deſcended from theſe Sacæ in Aſia, then the Germans from thoſe Germans in Perſia, of whom Herodotus writeth. And Ioſeph Scaliger, a renowned Author, ſheweth, that theſe words fader, mo. der, brader, dutcher, band, and ſuch like, are at this day found in the Perſian tōgue in the ſame ſenſe, as we vſe Father, Mother, Brother, Daughter, and Bound, &c. a great inducement (as ſome thinke) for the Saxons originall from thoſe parts; though in my opinion the Latine, Pater, Mater, Frater, haue no leſſe affinitie of ſound, and in all likelihood were the Primitiues to theſe of ours. Of theſe Saca Strabo writeth that they made inuaſions into Countries lying farre off, as namely Armenia, where they left the memory of their ſucceſſe in a part of that Country, by calling it Sacacena, after their owne name.

In which place they were firſt knowne by the name of the Saxons. And here alſo they among themſelues beganne firſt to be diſtinguiſhed into other Tribes, as Holt-Saxons (for ſo Verſtegan, out of their old Chronicle, ſaith they were called) for their keeping in the Woods; but more properly (wee may ſay) into Saxons, Angles, and Iutes. From hence afterwards they departed, and paſſing ouer the Riuer Elbe, diuided themſelues into two Companies; whereof the one taking into the vpper parts of Germany, by little and little intruded themſelues into the ancient Seat of the Suenians, which now of them is called Weſtphalia and Saxony: and the other incroched vpon Friſeland and Holland (then called Batauia) with the reſt of thoſe Countries that lie along the German Seas.

(5) The time wherein theſe Saxons ſhould thus infeſt Germany, by Occa Scarlenſis verdict, is as ancient as great Alexander: others account it long after, in the raigne of Tiberius. But before Ptolomy we finde them not mentioned by any Author, who flouriſhed in the dayes of Antoninus Pius, about the yeere from Chriſts Natiuity 140. And moſt certaine it is by Eutropius and Beda, that before the yeere three hundred, when Diocleſian ſwaied the Roman Scepter, the Saxons out of Cimbrica Cherſoneſus ſore offended the coaſts of Britaine and France, with their many piracies, and were fearfull euen to the Romans themſelues. Theſe multiplying in number and ſtrength, ſeated in the Maritime tract of Iutland, Sleſwick, Holſatia, Ditmarſe, Breme, Oldenburgh, all Frieſland and Holland: and indeed, according to the Teſtimonie of Fabius Quæſtor, wholy all the Sea coaſts from the riuer Rhene vnto the Citie Donia, which now is commonly called the Denmarc; and with him Henry of Erfurd affirmeth Saxon-land to ſtretch from the Riuer Albis vnto the Rhene; the bounds of no one people of all the Germans extending any way ſo far, ſaith he.

Iuſtus Lipſius and Engelhuſius deriuation of the Name Saxon.

(8) Iuſtus Lipſius coniecture reth, and Engelhuſius affirmeth (as Verſtegan ſaith) that the name Saxon, tooke the appellation from the Faſhion of the Weapon that vſuallie they wore; which was a Crooked Bowing Sword, ſomewhat like vnto a Sithe, with the edge on the contrarie ſide, called by the Netherlanders, a Saiſen, and by themſelues Seaxen; and the ſhorter of like faſhion for hand-weapons, Seaxes; ſuch as were thoſe that were hid vnder their Garmēts in the Maſſacre of the Britiſh Nobilitie vpon Salisbury Plaine, when Hengiſt gaue the watch-word, Nem eour Seaxes, that is, Take your Swords: three of which kniues Argent, in a Field Gules, were born by Erkenwyne King of the Eaſt-Saxons, vpon his ſhield of Armes, as ſome of our Heralds haue imblazed. And that their Name was ſo giuen them from their Weapons, ſome allege their accuſtomed maner in wearing thereof, which vſually was to truſſe the ſame ouerthwart their backes whē they went foorth to battle; whereby notice was taken, and that name attributed vnto them, as the like hath been vpon like occaſion vnto others: for ſo in Aſia the Scythians were named for their skil in ſhooting; in France the Picards for their long Pikes vſed in fight; and in Ireland the Galloglaſſes, which bare the Pollax as their principall weapon: and of latter times, vpon leſſe occaſions haue Surnames growne both to particular men, as alſo to whole Societies; which may appeare in ſuch as hauing vowed their voiage and ſeruice for Ieruſalem, wore continually vpon their backes a red Croſſe, whereby the name Croſſe-back, or in old Engliſh, Crouch-back, was to them attributed: in which ranke, Edmund Earle of Lancaſter (ſecond ſonne to King Henry the third) was a principall, and thereby got that name, which he could not claw off from his back euer ſince. So likewiſe theſe men who entred that Religion of Monaſticall life, wore vſually vpon the outſide of their Garments the ſigne of a Croſſe, whereby that Order was diſtinguiſhed and noted from others by the name of Crouched or Croſſed Friers. But whence or howſoeuer the name aroſe, among all the Germans there were none in reputation for militarie deedes comparable vnto theſe Saxons: neither had any aduentured by Sea and Land, ſo farre to purchaſe renowne and praiſe, or perhaps (and that more likely) to ſupply their owne wants, ranging often from place to place, as men alwaies ready to enter any action: and in Germanie to this day a great Dukedome retaineth from them the name of Saxonie.

(10) The Angles (by Fabius Queſtor Ethelwardus an ancient Writer, and a Noble Perſon of the Saxons Royall Bloud; are brough from Ould Anglia, a Portion lying betwixt the Countries of the Saxons and the Giots, as he writeth them, whoſe chiefe Towne was by them called Sleſwick, and of the Danes, Haithby: but (more particularly) it lay betwixt the City Flemburge amd the Riuer Sly, which Country by Albertus Crantzius is called Anglia. From hence (ſaith Henricus Rantzouius) the Saxons, who were alſo called the Angle-Saxons, went to aid the Britaines. And at this day there is a little Prouince in the Kingdome of Dania, named Angell, beneath the Citty Flemburge, which Lindebergus calleth Little Anglia. Their ſite notwithſtanding is placed by moſt Authours in Weſtphalia, where the Cittie Engern ſtandeth, and were Tacitus & Potolomy rangeth them among the Sueuians; which in their times might very well be. But the moſt glorious remembrance of that their name hath beene for theſe many ages in this Kingdome of England: though Saxo Grammaticus (as erſt we touched, Lib. 5. Cap. 2) will needes haue Anglia named from Angul the ſun of Humblus, and Giantlike brother of Danus the firſt King of Denmarke. But Albertus Crantzius being offended at his folly, telles him that England had the name of Britaine many hundred yeeres after that Angul was dead. Others there are that deriue the name England from the manner of this Ilands ſituation, being narrow in the Weſt and North, for that Eng in the ancient Teutonick Toung, as well as in the moderne, doth ſignifie Narrow, Strait, or a Nooke; and to that purpoſe doe produce this verſe of a Portugals alluſion.

CHAPTER III.

THeſe Germans, and among them the Catti and Sueuians, our Anceſtors (according to Albertus Crantzius) were a people (ſaith Tacitus) well ſet, ſterne of countenance, tall of ſtature, gray eied, and of a firie aſpect, and their haire yellow. Vnto whom, Witichindus the Monke addeth and ſaith, that They were faire of complexion, cheerefull of countenance, very comely of ſtature, and their limbes to their bodies well proportioned; bold of courage, hardy in fight, and very ambitious of glory: for which parts (ſaith he) the Franks had them in great admiration, and wondred at their new and ſtrange attire, their armour and their buſhie lockes of haire, that from their heads ouer-ſpred their ſhoulders; but aboue all, at their conſtant reſolution and valiant courage. Their heads and beards they ſuffer (ſaith Tacitus) to grow at length, and neuer put off that vowed ornament and bond of valour, vntill they haue ſlaine an enemie: but then vpon blood and ſpoile, they vncouer their forehead, and ſay they haue paied backe the price of their birth, and thinke themſelues worthy of their Country and parents. Their curled locks (ſaith he) they bind vp in knots, and ſtanding on end, tie it in the crowne onely, that is the harmleſſe care they haue of beautie, to ſeeme more terrible to the Enemy. And by Sidonius Apollinaris his teſtimony, they vſed to ſhaue off the haire of their heads, reſeruing onely a tuft in the crowne, about which they wore a hoope or plate of copper, which cauſed the haire to ſtand vpright, as by theſe his verſes appeareth.

They neuer weigh Anchour vpon the enemies Coaſts, but with a reſolution againe to returne: and their manner is to kill euery tenth Captaine with a lingring and dolorous torment: for to ſuch Vowes they binde themſelues, and with ſuch ſacrifices they diſcharge their Vowes againe, being indeed not ſo much purified by ſuch Sacrifices, as polluted with Sacrilege: and the bloudy and abominable Murderers thinke it a religious thing, rather to torment a Priſoner vnto death, then to ſet him free for a Ranſome.*

The Man and Womans attire differd in nothing, saith he, sauing that the women vse linnen Garments trimmed and interlaced with purple, and without sleeues, their armes bare, and bosomes naked and vncouered. Yet Paulus Diaconus speaking of the Longobards, comparing them to the Saxons, saith that there Cassockes were large and worne loose, most of linnen, trimmed and set out with very broad Gards or welts purfleet, and embrodered with sundry colours, and the richer sort with Pearles: their haire bound vp in a copper hoope, stood in tufts vpon the crowne, the rest curled and falling downe vpon their shoulders: their beards they kept still vncut, till they had killed an enemie; and for another note of ignominie, they wore an Iron Ring, as a signe of bondage, till they had cast it from them by the Conquest of a Man. Great Kniues, or rather broad bending Swords, they trussed vpon little Shields thwart their backes, from which (as we shewed) Engelhusius auoucheth they had their appellation. Hee that abandoned or lost this shield in battle (saith Tacitus) was debarred from their publike Sacrifices and Assemblies, the greatest disgrace that could be; for very shame and griefe whereof, many, many times hanged themselues. And vpon these Shields their manner was to lift vp their new elected Generall, and with acclamations so to carrie him thorow their Campe.

(4) For Warres, the Germans by Tacitus are reputed the best, who for two hundred and ten yeeres held tack with the Romans. Not the Samnites (saith he) not the Carthaginians, not the Spaniards, or the Gallois, no not the Parthians haue so much troubled vs: for what can the East obiect against vs, sauing the death of Crassus, when he had defeated Pacorus, before trodden downe by Ventidius? But the Germans hauing either slaine or taken Carbo, and Cassius, and Scaurus Aurelius, and Seruilius Cepio, and M. They are very sensible, wise, and considerate in their seruice, in preferring choice Captaines, in following their Leaders, in obseruing their rankes, in taking the aduantage and benefit of the day, and intrenching in the night, holding Fortune euer doubtfull, but valour alwaies certaine. Their weapons, as testifieth Ioannes Pomarius, were long Speares, broad Swords, and the Crosbow: these they held in such esteeme, that with a horse furnished, Shield, Sword, and Lance, their Virgins were receiued in mariage, accounting them for the greatest bonds, and the very Patron-Gods of Matrimony: which custome might well bee taken from their neighbours the ancient Saracens, whose Maidens vsually presented to their husbands a Tent and a Speare, in way of Dowrie at the entrance of their Nuptials. Their Ceremonies in marying. Tacitus.

A People (saith Tacitus) whom thou canst not so easily perswade to manure the ground, as to prouoke the Enemie, and aduenture wounds, holding small esteeme of that which is gotten by the sweat of their browes; when it might haue been obtained by the expence of their bloud. A strange diuersitie (saith he) that the same men should so much loue sloth, and hate quietnesse. It is with them a great shame for their Prince to be ouercome in Valour; but for any one to returne aliue from that Battell wherein the Prince is slaine, a perpetuall infamie and reproach. And that their resolutions were euer noble, and their corage not daunted in distresse or bondage, it well appeared by a whole band of them taken by Symachus, and designed for the Romans pastime of Sword-plaiers, who the same morning that this spectacle was expected, strãgled themselues rather then they would incurre such infamie and baseneſſe, as to make others pastime with the ignominious vsage of their owne persons.

Saxons their resolute courages.

(6) Their Lawes were seuere, and vices not laughed at, and good Customes of greater authority among them, then elsewhere were good Lawes; no temporising for fauour, nor vsury for gaine; but bounteous in hospitality, and liberall in gifts, accounting both due to be giuen and receiued, yea and that without thankes: no Nation freer from adulterie, or punishing that sinne more seuerely. For the woman offending, hauing first her haire cut off, was turned starke naked out of her Husbands house, and that in presence of her owne kindred; thence she was scourged with whips thorow the Towne, without regard of birth, beauty, age or wealth, and neuer after could finde another Husband. Those that were vnnaturally leaud of their bodies, their manner was to drowne them in filthy mud, and to couer them with hurdles. Yea and greater punishments then these the Pagan-Saxons executed vpon such offenders, as by the Epistle of Boniface an English-man, Arch-bishop of Magunce, which he wrote vnto Ethelbald King of the Mercians, in reproouing his adulterous life, is manifest. For (saith hee) in the ancient Country of the Saxons (where there was no knowledg of God) if either a Maid in her fathers house, or one hauing a husband, became a whore, shee should bee strangled with her owne hands closed to her mouth, and the Corrupter should bee hanged vpon the Pit wherein she was buried. If shee were not so vsed, then her Garments being cut away downe from the Girdle-steed, the chaste Matrons did scourge and whip her, and did pricke her with kniues, and so was she sent from Towne to Towne, where other fresh and new scourges did meet and torment her vnto death.

And their seuere Lawes a long time remaining in the daies of Christianitie, declare with what rigour (without regard of person) they both examined and punished this offence: whereof that of Queene Emma, the mother of King Edward the Confessor, is a sufficient example, who being accused for incontinencie of body with Alwin Bishop of Wincheſter, was enioined to passe ouer nine Plough share Irons glowing red hot, she being blind-fold and bare-footed; by which triall shee is said to haue acquited her selfe, insomuch that hauing passed them all before shee knew it, cried and said; O good Lord, when shall I come to the place of my purgation? This punishment beginning in these Pagans, and continuing vnto the yeere 750. Stephen the Second, and most pontificall Pope of Rome, did vtterlie abolish, as too seuere and ouer-rigorous for Christians to vndergoe.

The Virgins of these Saxons were neuer to bee married but once, that they might haue no other thoghts, nor further desire but in case of matrimony: neither had the men pluralitie, excepting great Personages, and they sued vnto in regard of procreation; for to be without Children, was to be without reputation. So that the testimonie of Saluianus, which liued among them, fitteth well our purpose, saying; Though the Saxons are outragious in cruelty, yet for chastity they are to be honoured.

(10) For the generall gouernment of their Countrie they ordained twelue Noblemen choſen from among others, for their worthines and ſufficiency: Theſe in the time of peace rode their ſeueral circuits to ſee iuſtice and good cuſtomes obſerued, and they often of courſe at appointed times met together, to conſult and giue order in publike affaires: but euer in time of warre one of theſe twelue was choſen to be King, and ſo to remaine ſo long onely as the warres laſted: and that being ended, his name and dignitie of King alſo ceaſed, becomming againe as before. And this cuſtome continued among them, vntil their wars with the Emperour Charles the Great: at which time Wittekind, one of the twelue aforeſaid, a Nobleman of Angria in Weſtphalia, bore ouer the reſt the name and authoritie of King; and he being afterward, by means of the ſaid Emperour, conuerted to the faith of Chriſt, had by him his mutable Title of King turned into the enduring ſtile & honour of Duke: & the eleuen others were in like manner by the ſaid Emperour aduanced to the honourable Titles of Earles and Lords, with eſtabliſhment for the continuall remaining of theſe Titles and Dignities vnto them and their heires. THE SAXON SA RRIVALL INTO BRITAIE VNDER THE CONDVCT OF HENGIST AND HORSA.

CHAPTER IV.

An. Do. 450.

WHen the ſtate of Britaine was miſerably torne by the calamities of ciuill Diſſenſions, Famine, death, and Robberies, the Romanes returned, their owne Strength decaied, and their Afflictions daily augemented by their wonted Enemies the Scots and Picts; no hope was left to their deſpairing hearts, that of themſelues they were able to defend themſelues: and therefore (as wee haue ſhewed) they called to their aid the Saxons, a Nation fierce and valorous, who to the number of nine thouſand, vnder the conduct of Hengiſt and Horſa, two brethren, entred Britaine at Ebsfleet in the Ile of Thanet, in the raigne of Theodoſius the ſecond, and of Valentinian the third, Emperors of the Eaſt and Weſt, about the yeere of Grace 450. Receiued they were with great ioy as Angels from Heauen, and ſaluted with ſongs after the accuſtomed manner of the Britaines, who appointed them the Iland Thanet for their habitation.

(2) Theſe Saxons in ſhort time made proofe of their Manhood. For ouercomming the Enemie eueu in Scotland it ſelfe, ſeated themſelues in ſome part thereof; ſo that their Conqueſt ſeemed abſolute, and the Britaines freed from their former aſſaults. Peace thus ſetled, and the Inhabitants freed, a friendly Compoſition was made betwixt theſe Nations, wherein the Saxons vndertooke to maintaine the Field, and the Britain to ſuſtaine the Charge. In which league they aboad ſome certaine time, ſaith Witichindus, making vſe in a ciuill ſort of the Brets friendſhip: but ſo ſoone as they perceiued the Country large, the ſoile fertile, and the hands of the Inhabitants ſlow to practiſe feates of Armes: and further conſidering with themſelues, that themſelues and the greateſt part of the Saxons had no certaine place of aboad, they found fault with their pay and want of victuals, making that their quarrell, as both too meane, and too litle for their high deſerts; threatning withall, as vnkind Gheſts, that ſhortly they would reckon without their Hoſts: and thereupon ſending ouer for more of their Nation, entred peace with the Scots & Picts, who altogether roſe againſt the poore Brets.

(3) And Hengiſt, that by the gift of Vortigern had got the whole poſſeſsion of Kent, ſent for more ſupply of Saxons vnto his ayde, pretending imployments of their ſeruice in other parts, but indeede to make ſtrong his owne deſignes: and theſe ſwarming daily ouer into Britaine, got the ſtrength of munition and command of military affaires without impeach: For the King holding himſelfe now ſure from all interceptions, gaue his immoderate ſenſes ſcope to nouriſh more freely their ſenſuall pleaſures, and committed more audaciouſly thoſe vices, vnto which his owne corrupt nature was naturally addicted: This Hengiſt ſoone perceiued, and to adde more matter fit for flame, fed ſtill the humors of this vicious King, outwardly ſhewing his care and readineſſe for the Lands defence, his counſell and loue to the Nobles in eſtate, and his courteous carriage to the Commons in generall; but to the King an ouerſeeing diligence, & ſeruile obedience: by all which, ere it was long, he gaue fire to the traine, that blew vp the foundations of the Britiſh policie.

Hengiſt had the whole poſſeſſion of Kent.

(4) For feaſting the King in the Caſtel of Tonnge commanded his daughter, a Lady of paſsing beautie, to attend the banquet, whoſe excellent feature and ſeemely behauiour, blew the ſparks of deſire ſo right into Vortigerns wanton eie, that they preſently kindled a flame in his laſciuious heart: for in the midſt of his cups, Rowena (ſo was the damoſell called) with a low reuerence and pleaſing grace, ſaluted the King with a cup of gold full of ſweet wine, incharming it with theſe words in her language; Waes heal hlaford Cyning, which is in Engliſh, Be of health Lord King: he demãding the meaning, would be taught to anſwer to her owne vnderſtanding, & ſaid, Dpine heal, that is, Drinke health; whereof when he had pledged her, (as we ſpeake) this bowle infected his ſenſes with no leſſe ſottiſhneſſe, then that of Belus is ſaid to doe Dido when Cupid plaid the childe Aſcanius betwixt Æneas and her; and brought more bale to the Land, then afterwards did that which was preſented to King Iohn at Swinſted Abbey by Symon the poiſoning Monk: for notwithſtanding that hee had a Queene then liuing, (himſelfe not young, hauing ſonnes at mans eſtate, in profeſſion a Chriſtian, whoſe Religion alloweth neither polygamie nor adulterie) did importunate Hengiſt that Rowena might be his wife: which at firſt with ſome ſhew of excuſe and vnworthineſſe of perſon, was denied, but laſtly conſented vnto, and the Nuptials performed. And now Fortune caſting occaſion daily into Hengiſts lap, he gaue his aſpiring thoughts no reſt, till hee had got the Crowne from Vortigerns head, and ſeized all vnder the Saxons power.

But hee ſtill continuing in his laſciuious and careleſſe idleneſſe, was laſtly taught by wofull experience, what miſery wilfull raſhneſſe and neglected gouernmēt do bring: for the Britaines his ſubiects no longer would be thus abuſed, to ſee themſelues wouen into greater danger by ſhew of defence, then they formerly had bene by the hoſtility of the enemy; but forthwith diſclaimed their obedience to the king, when he had raigned the ſpace of ſix yeeres, and choſe for their Gouernor his ſonne young Vortimer.

The principall cauſe of the Britaines miſeries.

(14) Vortigern thus diſpoſſeſſed, for his further ſecuritie betooke himſelfe into wales, where among thoſe vaſt Mountaines hee built a ſtrong Caſtle; of whoſe foundation, Merlin the Welſh Wizard, with the future ſucceſſe that ſhould afterward follow the Britaines hath by way of prophecie vainly ſpoken. This Caſtle moſt of our Writers haue ſaid to be in South-Wales, vpon a rockie and ſolitarie mountaine called Breigh, or after others Cloaric, in the weſt of that Prouince, not farre from Radnor, and neere vnto the Riuer Gnaua: but the inhabitants of Northwales report (by the reports of their anceſtors) that in old Bethkelert was that Caſtle, which Vortigern built, and is yet called Embris, from Merlin Embris, as they affirme. And ſurely (beſides the craggie and ſolitarineſſe of the place, which ſeemed to me rather an entrance into the ſhaddow of death, then to be the palace or Court of a King) the Riuer Llynterrenny mooueth much; by which Fauſtus his ſonne, begotten of his owne daughter Rowena, is ſaid to ſpend his life in continuall praiers.

(15) But whileſt Vortigern was buſied in building this Caſtle; and the Saxons making ſpoiles whereſoeuer they came, the Britaines vnder the conduct of Aurelius Ambroſius, began to receiue ſome breath of hopes, and to ſhew themſelues out of their Caues. This Ambroſius (ſaith Beda) was a gentle natured man, which only of all the bloud of the Romans remained then aliue, his parents being ſlaine, which had borne the name of the king of the Country. Hee with his brother Vter, commonly called Pendragon, returning out of Britain Armorica, where they had remained from the Tyrannie of Vortigerne, landed at Totneſſe in the Weſt of this Iland; vnto whom reſorted great Troopes of Britaines.

His firſt Expedition was againſt Vortigern the ſcourge of his Country, and murderer of his King: whoſe Caſtle ſtraightwaies hee beſieged, and by the iuſt reuenging hand of God, wilde fire conſumed, wherein thoſe adulterous and inceſtuous perſons were burned to aſhes.

(16) Next, following the common Enemie, hee gaue battle to the Saxons on the North of Humber at a place called Maesbell, wherein Hengiſt was diſcomfited, and in flight taken by Earle Edoll of Gloceſter, and beheaded at Conningsborow, ſaith he of Monmouth. Howbeit, Matthew of Weſtminſter maketh him fight another battle vpon the Riuer Dun, in Anno 489. wherein, ſaith, he, Hengiſt was taken. And Polydore ſaith, that in the ſame battle Hengiſt at the firſt onſet was ſlaine, with many of his Germans: the fame of whoſe victory (ſaith he) is had in memory with the Inhabitants of thoſe parts euen vnto this day. Yet Gildas, Beda, and Ethelward, Writers, of thoſe ancient times, & two of them Saxons, mention not the death of Hengiſt, neither this great victory of the Britaines. And Marianus the Scottiſh Monk ſeemeth to affirme the contrarie, where hee ſaith, that Hengiſt raigned thirty foure yeres in great glory; and died peaceably, leauing his ſonne Eske to ſucceed him in the Kingdome of Kent. With whom alſo Florianus the Monke of Worceſter agreeth. Howſoeuer, ſure it is, had not the diuine power of God otherwiſe determined, the waining eſtate of Britaine doubtleſſe had recouered her former ſtrength; both by the praiers of Biſhop German, the proweſſe of this laſt ſpoken of Ambroſius, the valorous attempts of Vter Pendragon, and the worthy induſtries of the Chriſtian King Arthur. The famous reſiſtances of this laſt mentioned Arthur, the Monke of Monmouth with ſuch fables hath augmented; that his Acts and Trauels may be compared to thoſe of Hercules, or with the Conqueſts of Ceſar himſelfe; inſomuch that he hath beene accounted and ranged in the catalogue of the worlds nine Worthies. And ſurely (by the teſtimonie of Malmsbury) hee was a Prince of great worth, & did often aduenture with his ſmall power to meet the Saxons in the face and in Field.

But the Britaines ſtrength daily decreaſing, and new ſupplies of theſe Saxons daily arriuing, brought the one in deſpaire to enioy their owne right, and the other to triumph in their intruſions of wrongs. For continually incroaching forward, and inlarging their limits whereſoeuer they came, droue the inhabitants before them from their wonted poſſeſsions, & ſeated themſelues in the ſouthern and beſt part of the Land, laying the ſtones (as it were) of thoſe foundations, whereupon in ſhort time they raiſed their moſt glorious buldings.

(17) For euery ſeuerall Captaine or Commander accounting that part his owne, wherin he firſt entred or made conqueſt of, with full reſolution determined to keepe what he had got, (as an abſolute King) commanded his Prouince, wherby the Land became burdened with ſeuen of them at the firſt: as Hengiſt of Kent; Ella, of thoſe parts now called Suſſex and Surrey; Cherdik of the Weſt; Erchenwin, of the Eaſt; Ida of the North, Crida, of the Middle land: & Vffa, the parts now Middelſex and Eſſex: which Kingdomes thus begunne and erected, ſtood not long vnſhaken by ciuill diſſenſions amongſt themſelues, each King enuying his equals greatneſſe, and ſeeking to inlarge his own Dominions vpon the next. In which Combuſtions, few or none of them came to the graue in due time, but were either ſlaine in warres, or treacherouſly murdered in peace, or elſe inforced to ſheare himſelf a Monke, and reſigne his Crowne to another. To ſpeake of all theſe together, I hold would bring too great a confuſion to our Hiſtory, and needleſſe ſurcharge to the Readers memory: To auoid which, I will briefly ſet down the Conqueſts, Circuits, Acts, and deſcents, that in euery ſeuerall Kingdome happened while they ſtood in their Heptarchie, before they were vnited to an abſolute Monarchie; and then (according to my prefixed purpoſe) continue the ſucceſſion of GREAT BRITAINES Monarches.

The Saxons often at diſſenſion among themſelues.

(18) For albeit the Land was diuided into 7. ſeuerall Kingdomes, and each of them carrying a ſouereigne command within his owne limits; yet one of them euer ſeemed to be ſupreme of the reſt; & that Prince who had the greateſt power or ſucceſſe in his warres was euer accounted and called The King of the Engliſh men, as Venerable Beda in the fifth Chapter of his ſecond Booke, and Hiſtory of England, euer termeth them.

The mightieſt of the Saxon Kings alwaies King of the Engliſhmen.

(19) Such therefore as held the reſt vnder either by Armes or alliance, in amity or ſubiection, ſwaied the whole Monarchy, and were acknowledged as Suprems in power ouer the reſt; which ſucceeded not euer in the ſame Family, neither continued in one and the ſame Kingdome without reuerſement, but were carried vpon the Flouds and Ebbes of variable ſucceſſe, or as deſtiny pleaſed to alter the chãce: wherof each of them (ſauing the Eaſt-Saxons only) did attaine to the height of that gouernment, as to the hauen of their wiſhed deſires. See therefore (if you pleaſe) a generall view of the whole, and afterwards the ſeuerall Hiſtories of euery Kingdome apart, before wee enter into the Succeſſion of the Engliſh-Saxons Monarches.

Only the Eaſt-Saxons intruded not on their neighbours dominions.

THE GENEALOGIES ROYALL OF THE SAXONS KINGS OF KENT, FROM HENGIST, their first: with the Successions, Raigns, Issues, and Acts, of all their Kings, vnto BALDRED the last: subdued by King EGBERT the West-Saxon Monarch.

CHAPTER V.

FROM Hengist the first Conqueror, and Ethelbert the first Christian King, the kingdome of Kent hath preheminence aboue the rest of that Heptarchie. For, Hengist for valor, policy, & strength, was the fore-leader of those that laid their Estates here in Great Britaines Island, and with such happy successe, so planted the Tree, as from the same Stem, many fayre Sciens daily yet spring. And good Ethelbert laid the foundation of Gods Church, so deepe in this Realme, as the gates of hell shall neuer preuaile against it, though his owne foundations laid of his first Church, hath felt the waight of a ruinating hand; when with Axes and Hammers (in the dayes of king Henry the eight) both that, and many such Sanctuaries, were broken and beaten downe, with a more rash, then Godly zeale; and those Oratories for assemblies, made now the seates of prophane merchantdizing, and Altars of prayers, the Tables for Mammon, and money changers; if not to more vile and base vses. But leauing to mention what may not be remedied; behold in this Tree, the boughes that branched from Hengist the Roote, wherein obserue, their matches or marriages are made knowne by the sculpture of an hand in hand, and the coat-armes of the parties empaled; though therein we rather follow the allowance of the later, then vrge them from antiquity it selfe. But from the best approued Authors we continue such Kings as ruled in Kent, in a continued succession; and that broken off, wee there breake the Bough, and thence name them for Kings, but of an vncertaine succession, as by the three last in this stemme, is euidently seene.

THE KINGDOME OF KENT.

CHAPTER V.

1. An. Do. 554. Kent in the daies of Iulius Cæsar the seate of four Kings.

KEnt, the first Dominion of the Saxons Heptarchie, was formerly in the daies of Iulius Cæsar, the Seat of foure seuerall petty Kings; yet neuer called a Kingdome before that Hengist the first Saxon Captaine, in fauour of his Daughter Rowena, got it by the gift of king Vortegern, about the yeere of Grace 454. and in the seuenth yeere after his first arriuage heere, he first laid the foundation of those fortunes which the Saxons his Nation in this land afterwards attained vnto: for hauing possessed the same with Victory and wealth the space of thirty one yeeres, (some adde three more) he left it in peace to his sonne Eskes and the rest of the Iland so weakened by his meanes, that others of his Nation were shortly planted in other parts thereof. It contained the Continent that lieth betwixt our East-Ocean and the Riuer Thames, being bounded vpon the West with Sussex and Surrey.

Hengist his raigne and death. Of Hengist see more in the succession of the English Monarchy, cap. 12.

2. An. Do. 488. Petrus Albinus. Eske the second King of Kent. Retained prisoner in Yorke.

ESke, the second King of Kent, is reported to bee the second sonne of King Hengist, who accompanying his father into this Iland, made proofe of his great valour in all his Battles fought against the Britaines, and in one of them (as Geffry of Monmouth reporteth) being taken prisoner, was for a time retained in Yorke, but thence escaping, hee aided his father in the Battle of Crekynford; and after his decease, succeeded him in the kingdome of Kent, from whom those inhabitants (saith Beda) were called Eskings, amongst whom he peaceably raigned about twenty yeeres, and died in the yeere of our Lord 512.

His raigne and death. Beda hist. eccles. Ang. lib. 2. cap. 5.

3. An. Do. 512. Octa his raigne.

OCta the sonne of Eske, began his raigne ouer his Fathers Dominions, the yeere of Christs Incarnation 512. and raigned twenty two yeeres, without mention of any memorable Act.

4. An. Do. 532. Florent. Wigorn. Imerik the sonne of Eske. Imerik his children.

IMerik, the sonne of Eske, and the fourth King of Kent, raigned twenty fiue yeeres, saith Stowe; twentie nine, saith Sauil, in his Table collected from our English writters. Hee had issue, Ethelbert the first christian King of Kent, and a daughter named Rikell, married to Sledda the second King of the East-Saxons, the mother of Sebert and Segebald.

5. An. Do. 561 Ethelbert the son of Imerik.

EThelbert, the sonne of Imerik, in the yeere of grace 561. succeeded him in the Kingdome of Kent. who by reason of his young yeers, was sore molested by his neighbour Princes, that sought to inlarge their Prouinces vpon his: for now the Saxons hauing made full Conquest of the Britaines, fell at variance among themselues, taking all occasions to supplant each other, as Conquerours commonly can endure no equals, and prosperity euer is looked at with an enuious eie; whereupon Cheulin King of the west-Saxons, proud of his victorious successes ouer the Britaines, began to disdaine all amity with his owne neighbour Saxons, inuaded the Teritories of this young Prince; and in a set Battle slew Oslaue and Cnebban, two of his Dukes, discomfited the King, and wonne the day. This field was fought at VViphandun, in the yeere of our Redemption, 567. and is noted to be the first Battle betwixt the Saxons themselues since their first entrance into Britaine.

Cheulin inuadeth his Territories.

But young Ethelbert growne vnto yeeres, repaired his losses with the inlargement of his kingdome to the bankes of Humber, and was the fift Monarch of the Englishmen, as after we shall heare. His first Wife was Berta, the daughter of Chilperik, King of France, by whom he had Edbald, Ethelburg, and Edburg: a second Wife he had vnworthy of name, for her incestuous and abominable act, in matching her selfe in marriage with her Husbands Sonne, A sinne (saith the Apostle) not to be named among the Gentiles. Of this King, as also of all the rest that attained vnto the glorie, to bee enstiled (per excellentiam) the Soueraigne Kings of the Englishmen, I purpose to bee sparing in their particular kingdomes, and to reserue the larger relation of their Acts, Matches, Issues, and continuance, to the times of their seueral Monarchies, whereby a more historicall course may be carried, through the successions of the English-Saxons Monarches, and a needlesse repetition of the same things auoided, which otherwise of necessitie would follow. Hee raigned in great glory fifty six yeeres, and was the First Saxon King that receiued and established the Gospell. He died the foure & twentieth day of Februarie, the yeere of Christ 616 after he had raigned 56. yeres, and was buried at Canterbury, with this inscription vpon his Tombe:

Ethelbert the fifth Monarch of the Englishmen. His first wife and children by her. In the life of Saint Vvereburg. His second wife.

6. An. Do. 617. Beda hist. eccles. Ang. lib. 2. cap. 5. Edbald, his father dead, refused the doctrine of Christ. He married his Mother in law.

EDbald, the sonne of King Ethelbert, in the yeere of Christ 617. assumed the Gouernment of Kent, who no sooner, saith Beda, had gotten from vnder the awe of his father, but hee refused to entertaine the Doctrine of Christ, and so polluted himselfe with the foule sinne of fornication, as that hee married his Mother in Law, the late Wife to his owne Father:

which two hainous faults gaue his subiects both occasion and impunity to returne to their former idolatry, who vnder his father, for fauour, or for feare, had yeelded to the Lawes of the Christiã Faith. But the scourge of God & vengeance from Heauen wanted not to the punishment of this vnfaithfull King: for he was plagued for a season with often phrensie of minde, and raging fury of an vncleane Spirit; but by Laurence Archbishop of Canterbury, he was at length conuerted from his Idolatry and incestuous Matrimony, and being baptized, indeauored to maintaine the state of the Gospel. He married Emme, the daughter of Theobert, King of Austrasie, now Lorrayne, by whom he had issue a Daughter named Enswith, who died a Virgin at Fulkestone, a Religious House in Kent of her Fathers foundation; and two Sonnes, whereof Ermenred the elder died before his Father, and left issue Dompnena, who was married to a Mercian Prince; Ermenberg that died a vailed Virgin, Ermengith a mẽtion; Ethelred and Ethelbert, both murthered by their Cosin-german, King Egbert. His yonger Sonne was Ercombert that succeeded him in the kingdome. This Edbald built a Chappell within the Monastery of Saint Peter and Paul at Canterbury, in honour of Mary the blessed Mother of God, endowing that Church with sufficient maintenance; wherein, after the continuance of twenty foure yeeres raigne, hee was buried neere to King Ethelbert his Father, Anno 640.

7. An. Do. 641

Ercombert, the Son of Edbald by Emme his Wife, succeeded his Father in the kingdome of Kent, in the yeere of grace 641. He was a vertuous, religious, and Christian King: for the Temples of the Heathen Idols he suppressed, and commanded the fast of Lent to bee obserued. His Wife was Sexburg, the daughter of Anna King of the East-Angles, by whom hee had issue Egbert and Lothair, both Kings of Kent after him; Ermenhild, Wife to Wolfere King of Mercia, and Erkengode a professed Nun in the Monastery of Saint Brigets in France, where she died, and was interred in the Church of Saint Stephen. In his daies the state of the Church growing to a wel setled forme of gouernment, the Prouince of Kent was deuided into Parishes by Honorius the Archbishop, as testifie the Records of Christ-Church in Canterbury. This King hauing raigned twenty foure yeeres and odde moneths, died in the yeere of our Lord 664.

8 An. Do. 695.

Egbert, the elder Sonne of King Ercombert, in the nonage of his yong Nephewes, Ethelred & Ethelbert, (the sons of his Vncle Ermenred) obtained the Rule of Kent, and had not their murther much blemished his peaceable Gouernment, hee might well haue held place with the worthiest of those Kings: but thirsting after an absolute soueraignty, and fearing lest his owne power should diminish by their growths & rightfull successions, he set his minde on that bloudy, traiterous, and vnnaturall attempt, and with the assistance of one Thurne, found fit place and opportunitie to worke that diuelliish designe, casting their bodies into a Riuer, that so their Murthers might not bee knowne. But God (saith Malmesbury) that searcheth the heart, reueiled the act by casting vp their bodies on the shore, to the open view of the next Inhabitants, who with great reuerence there buried them, and built a small Chappel ouer their Monument, whose bones afterwards were remoued, and new interred in the abbey of Ramsey in Huntshire. The Lady Dompnena their Sister, and next Heire to the Crowne, that was married to Merwald, a Prince of West-Mercia, and borne him foure Children, founded the Abbey of Minster in Kent: Wherein, saith Stowe, she became the first Abbesse her selfe, and Mildrith her daughter succeeded her therein, saith Capgraue. This King in great quietnesse raigned nine yeeres, and died in the yeere of grace 673. in the moneth of Iuly: leauing issue Edrik and Wigtred, both Kings of Kent, succeeding after Lothaire.

Lothaire the brother of Egbert, by strong hand obtained the gouernment of Kent. For notwithstanding Egbert left issue Edrik and Wigtred, (as is said) yet Lothaire taking the aduantage of their minorities, and the example of his brothers intrusions, made himselfe King against his, as he had done against the Sonnes of Ermenbert, but did not enioy the same with the like peace as he had done. For not onely Ethelred the Mercian warred strongly against him, but also Edrik, by the assistance of the South-Saxons cõtinually sought to recouer his right, whereby the peace of the Kentish was much molested: and lastly, in a bloudy battell was Lothaire shot thorow with a dart, whereof he died vnder his Chirurgeons hand, the fifth day of February, in the yeere of Christ 685. after hee had raigned eleuen yeeres and seuen moneths. The punishment of the Murther committed by his brother Egbert, was on him repaid, saith Malmsbury, who derided and made iests at the laments for young Ethelred and Ethelbert, that were by the people held and accounted Martyrs. His body was buried with his Predecessors, Kings of Kent, in the Monastery of S. Peter and Paule in Canterbury, Anno 685.

Edrik, the Sonne of King Egbert, hauing slaine his Vncle Lothaire in battle, succeeded him in the kingdome of Kent, wherein he sate onely two yeeres, and those in continuall warres with his subiects; in which ciuill broiles lastly hee was slaine, leauing the Kentish kingdome so torne with dissentions, that it became a prey to many Vsurpers, and gaue occasion to Ceadwalla the West-Saxon, to seeke the annexion thereof to his owne Kingdome; who with his brother Mollo entred Kent, and with fire and sword made waste where they came. To meet these, the Kentish assembled, and getting the aduantage, burned Mollo to death: in whose reuenge Ceadwalla persisted, and wasted the most part of the Prouince before he departed: so that after for six yeeres continuance no King raigned in Kent, but the Country lay exposed to the tyrannies of oppressors.

He entred his kingdome the yeere of mans Redemption 693. the eleuenth of Nouember, and two hundred and fiue yeeres, after the death of Hengist the first Saxon. With him raigned one Swebharde, as Beda declareth: but without mention from whom, or vpon what occasion. He founded the Priorie of *S. Edbert, the first Sonne of Withred, succeeded his Father in his kingdome, vertues, & valours, whereby a peaceable gouernment is allotted him by al writers of these affaires, for the continuance of twentie three yeeres, without relation of any notable accident peculiar to himself and kingdome: besides the appearances of two fearefull Comets, in Anno 729. and fourth of his raigne; the one arising immediately before the Sun in the morning, and the other shewing his fiery beames presently vpon the Suns set, both of them striking their gleames into the North, and by West, foreshewing (it may be) the scourge & desolation that the Pagens intended, who were at that instant entred into France and Spaine.

14. Alrik the last of lineall succession.

Alrick, the third Sonne of King withred, by the death of his brother Ethelbert, obtained the kingdome of Kent, the yere of Christs Incarnatiō 760. no other glory attending his affaires (saith Malsmesbury) besides his vnfortunate fight at Otteford against Offa King of the Mercians, wherein it seemed some honor (though with his ouerthrow) to withstand so puissant and impugnable an enemie. He is the last King of Kent that held the scepter in a lineall successiō: the rest that followed, both got and enoied it by tyranny and vsurpation. This King is said to raigne thirty foure yeeres, and to die in the yeere of grace, seuen hundred ninety three.

15. An. Do. 794.

Ethelbert, surnamed Pren, vsurped the Title and Authority ouer the Kentish Dominions, when that Prouince was sore oppressed with the inuasion of the Mercian Kenulfe, whose warres against Kent, by succession from Offa, were continued with such rigour and valor, that the Country lay desolate where he had bin, and the people distressed whither he came. This Pren, Kenulfe tooke prisoner, and led away with him into Mercia: but at the dedicatiō of a church that he had then founded at winchcombe, in presence of ten Dukes & thirteene Bishops, he released him at the High Altar, without either intreatie or ransome of redemption. The king returning againe into Kent, could not there be receiued; his place either being supplied by another, or himselfe so disliked, as not worthy any longer to raign: & hauing had experiēce of the worlds mutabilities, is left againe to his priuate fortunes, from whence hee had stepped, hauing held his estate but forthree yeeres continuance.

His imprisonment.

His releasment.

Cuthred, saith Malmesbury, was made King of Kent by Kenulfe King of Mercia, when he had ouercome and captiuated Ethelbert: notwithstanding hee is accounted for an Vsurper, and bare the title of King the tearme of eight yeres, without any other act worthy of remembrance, inheriting his predecessors euil happe and calamity, through factions and ciuill discords. An. Do. 797.

Baldred, after the death of this Cuthred, tooke vpon him the princely dignity of Kent, about the yeere of Christs Natiuity 805. But now the heauenly prouidence determining to bring againe together that which the Saxons had diuided, raised from exile little Egbert, to make him the Great Monarch of the English-men. His first wars were against Bernulfe King of Mercia, and his second against this Baldred, King of Kent, whom in battle he vanquished, and forced him out of his kingdome, after hee had sate on that Princelie Throne the space of eighteene yeeres. This Baldred is said to haue fled ouer Thames, and to leaue Kent to the will of his Conquerour, whither againe he neuer returned, neither yet was heard of after his ouerthrow. This Kingdome then that was erected by Hengist, the yeere of mans happinesse 455. continued her gouernment 372. and ended her glory in the yeere 827. being made a Prouince vnto the West-Saxons. But doubtlesse there are many opinions of this mans first entrance and new erected estate: for some (as Sir Henry Sauile in his Table) set it in the second yeere of Hengists first arriuall, Anno 452. Others in the second of Aurelius, and no lesse then thirty yeeres after that, Anno 482. Harrison will haue it forty three yeeres after the Saxons first entrance, and fourth yeere after King Hengist his death, Anno 492. And M. Ferrers in his Succession of the English Monarches, placeth it in the three and twentith yeere of King Hengists Kingdome, and in the fifth after his owne arriuall, the yeere of our Redemption 488. Of such vncertainty is the beginning of this South-Saxons kingdome, whose Continuance and Successions are nothing clearer; insomuch that Malmesburie making seueral chapters vpon the other six, omitteth only this of the South-Saxons: and therefore as wee finde them, let vs haue leaue to relate them, and for the present to leaue Ella as hee was King, till wee come to a fit place where more shal be spoken of him as he was Monarch; whose raigne is set by Stow to be 36. yers; by Sir Henry Sauile, 24. and by *M. CHAPTER VII.

THe-weſt Saxons kingdome, containing the weſt of the Iland, vnto the Lizards point, and lands end in Cornwall, was firſt erected by Cherdik a valiant captaine, that led his Saxons in the conqueſt of that prouince: and euer bare as hard a hand ouer the ouerborne Britaines, as did any of thoſe intruders, that had ſeated themſelues in others mens rights. Three of whoſe kings ſo caried themſelues among the other Saxons, as they by amity, or awe, loue, or conſtraint, won, and wore the Emperiall crowne of the whole; till by the death of the one brother, and youth of the other, Kent againe got it, & others from them, till Egbert the ſeuenteenth king of this kingdom ioyned all into one. The ſtem of the whole, from Cherdik, to Egbert, is here brãched, whoſe ſap of growth from them in many of our Engliſh honorable families, hath fairely budded euen vnto this day: and I pray may ſo bud for euer; that the land may be bleſſed in our Kings the ſons of theſe Nobles, & happy in our Princes, that eat for ſtrength and not for appetite, Eccleſ. 10.17. Many of theſe weſt Saxons firſt conuerts, may be liuing examples to their folowing poſterities, in ſhewing their faiths by their workes, & in building of Oratories for Gods diuine ſeruice, as king Ine did Glaſtenbury, king *Kenwulfe S. The time when Cherdike entred into Britaine.

THis Cherdik is said to haue brought a second supply of Saxons forces into Britaine, in the yeere of our Lord 495. and fifth of King Ella, and seuenth of the Monarchie of great Hengist, his landing being at a place on that occasion called Cherdike-shore, who with his sonne Kenrike, was encountred by the Britaines, vnder the conduct of Natanleod a British Prince, (whose Country was then called after his name) whom he slew in Battell, with fiue thousand of his Britaines: the fortune of which field gaue resolutions and hopes of better successe: it was fought neere vnto a Brooke vpon that euent called Cherdikes-ford, now by contraction Chard-ford. Heerupon establishing his new erected Kingdome, (which contained Cornwall, Deuonshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Wiltshire, Hantshiere, and Barkshiere,) he inlarged the same with the conquest of the Ile of Wight, the gouernment whereof was by him giuen to Stuffe and Withgar his Nephewes; which latter slew the Britains there inhabiting, and named the place of his victory VVithgarbirg, assuming the name of King, and was buried at his City Withgar, in the same Ile. About seuen yeeres after Cherdikes entrance, Porth a Saxon with his two Sonnes, Megla and Beda, landed in the West, at the place from him called Portsmouth, whose aid with Kent and Sussex, assisted Cherdike in his Conquests. His raigne is set to be thirty three yeeres, and his death in the yeere of grace fiue hundred thirtie fiue, hauing had two sonnes, Kenrik and Chelwolf, the one of which died before his Father; and the other succeeded him in his Kingdome. Chelwolfe had issue Cuthgils, whose sonne was Kenfridd, and his sonne Kensy, the Father of King Kentwin, who was the Successor of king Kenwalke, and predecessor of king Kentwin, in the kingdome of the West-Saxons.

KEnrik, the eldest Sonne of King Cherdike; hauing formerly made proofe of his prowesse in the assistance of his Father, was after his death also very fortunate in obtaining two victories ouer the Britaines; the one at Searesberige, and the other at Beranbrig; whose raigne beginning Anno 534. continued twenty six yeers; ending in the yeere of our Redemption, fiue hundred sixty. He had issue three Sonnes, of which Cheaulin the eldest succeeded him in his kingdome; Cuthwolfe the second assisted his Brother in his Warres, and was partaker with him of his victories, who died Anno 672. leauing issue one onely Sonne, named Chell, or Cearlike, who proued nothing so vertuous and dutifull a subiect as his father had beene: for he rose in rebellion against his Vncle, and by strong hand expelled him his kingdome.

His issue, Cheaulin, Cuthwolfe, and Cuth.

Cearlike the son of Cuthwolfe, rebelleth against his vncle.

The third Sonne of king Kenrike was Cuth, famous in his issue, though mentionlesse for action in himselfe: for he had three sonnes, of which Chelwolfe the eldest, was king of the West-Saxōs, (as shal be declared) Chell the second, was father to Kingils the sixt (and first Christian king of the West-Saxons, and Grandfather to Kenwall and Kenwin, the seuenth and ninth kings of that kingdome, and Ched the youngest, was father of Kenbert, Grandfather to Chedwall the most renowned king of the West-Saxons, of whom we are presently to speake, and of them all in the succession of the English Saxons Monarchs: and now to returne againe to the issue of king Kenrik.

Chedwall, the most renowned King of the VVest-Saxons.

CHeaulin his first sonne, entred vpon the gouernment ouer the West-Saxons An. 561. & euen at the first began to disturb the quiet peace of his neighbor Prouinces, taking aduantage at the young yeeres of Ethelbert (who was made King of Kent in the same yere that Cheaulin, was made king of west-Saxons) whō he discomfited; & slew his two Captains, Duk Oslaue & Duke Cnebba, at Wibbandune, as we haue said. Other Victories he obtained ouer the Britaines, both at Bedford, Deorham, Gloceſter, Cirenceſter, and Bathanceſter. But the fortunes of warres being alwaies variable, at length his succesſe altered, and at Wannes ditche in Wiltshire he was ouerthrowne, & dispossessed of his kingdome by Cealrik his brother Cuthwolfs son, when he had raigned thirty three yeres. He had issue, Cuth and Cuthwin: the former serued valiātly in the wars vnder his father at Wimbledon in Surrey, where king Ethelbert, of Kent was chased, aud his souldiers slaine: and with the like valour and victory he fought at Fethanleygh against the Britaines, notwithstanding that therein he lost his life, the yere of our Lord 585. and the fiue and twentieth of his fathers raigne. Cuthwin his younger brother suruiued his father, but succeeded not in his kingdome, being then (by reason of his young yeres) vnable to recouer his right. He had two sons, Kenbald and Cuth; the later of which was father to Chelwald, whose son Kenred had issue, Ine the eleuenth King of the West-Saxons, and Ingils his brother, whose sonne was Eoppa the father of Eafa, whose son was Alkenmud, the father of Egbert the eighteenth king of the VVest-Saxons, who reduced the Saxons diuided Heptarchie into an absolute Monarchie.

Kenwald refuſeth the Chriſtian faith.

KEnwald, whom Beda caleth Senwalch, ſucceeded his Father Kingils in the kingdome of the weſt-Saxons. His beginnings by Matthew VVeſtminſter are compared to be with the worſt, and his endings with the beſt of thoſe kings. At his firſt entrance he fought with victory againſt the Britaines at Pennum, whereof he became moſt inſolent, and refuſed not onely to receiue the Chriſtian Faith, but alſo put from him his lawfull wife Sexburg, the ſiſter of Penda King of Mercia, whereby hee became hatefull to his owne Subiects, and ſore aſſaulted by the Mercian King, who followed the reuenge ſo farre, that he forced Kenwald out of his kingdome, who being driuen to extremity ſought ſuccour at the mercy of Anna the Chriſtian King of the Eaſt Angels, where he was both courteouſlie entertained, and at laſt (wonne to the Chriſtian Faith) was baptized by Biſhop Fœlix, whereupon he did recall his wife, according to preſcript of Chriſtianity, and recouered againe his former Maieſty, which he much aduanced by his pious workes. He founded the Cathedrall of Wincheſter, and the Abby of Malmeſburie, & when he had raigned thirty one yeeres, gaue place vnto nature in the yeere 673. leauing no iſſue of his body to ſucceede him: whereupon Segburg his wife tooke vpon her the gouernment of the Weſt-Saxons, the ſame yeere that Lothair was made King of Kent, ſhee being a woman of great ſpirit and vnderſtanding, and ſufficiently worthy to haue managed the Kingdome, had ſhe not beene preuented by death or rather (as ſome write) by a religious deuotion, that the affaires of this preſent life might not hinder her zealous meditations of the future: in deſire whereof ſhe abandoned her Regencie, and built a houſe of deuotion in the Ile of Shepey, wherein herſelfe became a Voweſſe, and afterward was elected the Abbeſſe of Elie.

He was the ſonne of Kenſy, the ſonne of Kenfrid, the ſonne of Cuthgils, the ſonne of Chelwolfe, the ſonne of Cherdik, the firſt King of that Prouince: his raigne laſted but two yeeres, in which time he fought a great Battle with VVulfere King of the Mercians, at the place then called Bidanheaford, and wherein many of the Saxons on both ſides periſhed, leauing neither iſſue to ſucceede him, nor other matters to be ſpokē of him, though (as it ſeemeth) hee had diſpoſſeſſed Kenwin, who had more right to the Crowne then himſelf; or (as Beda and Malmesbury auerre) he raigned with him the ſpace of two yeeres, and Kenwin alone for ſeuen yeeres more.

KEnwin the brother of Kenwald, and ſonne to King Kingils, in the yeere 677, became the ninth King of the weſt-Saxons, and raigned the ſpace of nine yeeres. Hee was a great ſcourge vnto the weake and ouer-borne Britaines, making Conqueſts of their poſſeſsions, and forcing them euen to the Sea-ſhoare, being a people allotted vnto miſery, and by theſe ſtrangers purſued ſo vehemētly, that laſtly they were driuen into the weſt-Angle of this Iland, and their liues defended and maintained among thoſe waſte Mountaines and hard Rockes, which therein were more propitious and gentle then the ſtony hearts of their Oppreſſors.

CEadwalla a valiant young man, and of the bloud-Royall of the Geniſſes, ſaith Beda, being baniſhed from his Country through the enuy of others. who maligned him only for his vertues and worthineſſe, ſucceeded Kenwin his kinſman in the kingdome of the weſt-Saxons, and with greater glory raigned then any other in that Prouince before him had done. He was the ſonne of Kenbert, whoſe father was Ched, the ſecond Soune of Cuth; and Cuth was the third Sonne of Kenrik, who was the eldeſt Sonne of Cherdik, that laid the firſt ſtone of this kingdomes foundation. His firſt brunt of furie was againſt Edilwach, King of the South-Saxons, whom in field he ſlew: and in another battell Berthun, that had made himſelfe King of that State. The Ile of wight alſo he almoſt quite waſted: and though he were vnbaptized, yet did he binde himſelfe by vow to giue the fourth part of the ſpoile vnto Gods vſe, and performed it accordingly vnto Biſhop Wilfrid, who with Bernewine and Hildila conuerted the people from their Idolatrous ſuperſtition, vnto the true ſeruice of Chriſt, it beeing the laſt part of the Saxons poſſeſſions that was turned from their Pagan manners. Of which his ſpecious deuotion, Malmerburie giueth this cenſure: Although wee praiſe his affection, (ſaith he) yet allow wee not the example; for it is written, that who ſo offereth vnto God the goods of the poore, doeth as it were ſacrifice the ſonne in the ſight of the Father. Kent alſo with greeuous warres hee twice afflicted, and therein ſpilt ſo much Chriſtian blood, that nature her ſelfe was therein offended, and hee at laſt as much lamented: in repentance whereof, after hee had raigned in great ſtoutnes the ſpace of two yeres, in a zealous deuotion went to Rome, where of Pope Sergius he was baptized vpon Eaſter Euen (ſaith Beda, the yeere of our Redemption 689.) by the name of Peter, and wearing as yet the white Robes of innocencie, put (as the rite then was) vpon him at his lauer of Baptiſme, fell ſicke, and the twentieth day of April following died, hauing had neither wife nor child that we reade of. He was buried in Saint Peters Church in Rome, vnder a faire Monument, with this inſcription thereon ingrauen: Heere Ceadwell, otherwiſe named Peter, King of the weſt-Saxons, is buried, who died the twentieth of Aprill, in the ſecond Indiction, and liued thirty yeeres or therabouts, when that noble and mighty Prince Iuſtinian was Emperour of Rome, and had raigned foure yeeres in the Empire; and Sergius a true patterne of the Apoſtles, had ſate two yeeres in Peters Seat. What hath beene written of this Ceadwall, King of the VVeſt-Saxons, by Beda the Saxon and his followers, hath beene attributed to Cadwalader King of the Britaines, by Geffery of Monmouth the Britaine; Iohn Caſtor and More, affirming him to be the ſame man, and that vpon the admonition of an Angel hee went to Rome, tooke pennance of Pope Sergius, there died in the twelfth Kalends of May, and was there buried with the ſame Epitaph, and after the ſame manner. But the Writer of the Hiſtory of Cambria, of Cadwaladers going to Rome, and the other appendances, ſeemeth to be doubtfull, and ſaith that it differed from the aſſertion of Bernardus Guidonius, the neereneſſe of the names being the very cauſe of the like relations, and confidently affirmeth that it was Edwall the ſonne of Cadwalader, who in ſuch deuotion went to Rome, and there made ſuch a religions end, about the yeere of our Lord 720.

Brithric, lineally descended from Cherdik the first King of the West-Saxons, a man of a soft and quiet disposition, succeeded Kenwulfe in that Principalitie; in the yeere of Christs Incarnation 784. He married Ethelburga, the daughter of great Offa the Mercian King, by whose power he expelled Egbert that ruled a Lordship in his Prouince vnder him, whose fame increasing through his feates of wars, drawe many iealousies into King Brithrics head, and the more by the instigatiō of Ethelburga his Queene, who bearing her selfe great, because of her parentage, practised the downfall and destruction of them whom she hated, and by her suggestions this Egbert was banished on suspition of conspiracy. It afterward chanced, that shee preparing poison to make an end of one of the Kings Minions, wrought therby (though vnwittingly) the Kings death: for he by tasting the confection ended his life, after hee had raigned the space of sixteene yeres. Wherein, she fearing the iust reuenge of his subiects, fled into France, & by Charles then King, was so courteously entertained, as that for her great beauty there was offred her the choice of him or his sonne. But she in her youthfull and lustfull humor, choosing the sonne, was debarred from both, and thrust into a Monastery, in the habit (not the affection of a Nunne:) where not long after she abused her body by committing of adultery, and was shortly expelled, & in beggerly misery ended her life, as by manie that so saw her, we haue heard it reported, saith Asserius mine Author. For this her most hainous crime, whereby was wrought the death of her Husband, the West-Saxons ordained a Law, to the great preiudice of all their Queenes succeeding; That none of them should haue either title, maiesty or place of roialty; which was seuerely executed for many yeeres after.

In the daies of this Brithrike, many prodigies appeared, and more perhaps then will be beleeued. For it is reported, that in his third yeere a showre of bloud rained from heauen, and bloudy crosses fell vpon mens garments as they walked abroade. And in his tenth yeere were seene fiery Dragons flying in the ayre. Which wonders, some tooke to be presages of the miseries following, both by the Inuasions of the Pagan Danes, that in these times were first seene to arriue in this Iland, and the extreme Famine that afterwards happened: howsoeuer, sure it is that the Heptarchy now beganne to set, and the rising Monarchy to appeare in the west, by King Egbert, whose acts & issue shall be further rehearsed, when wee shall come to the time of his succession among the English Monarches.

THE EAST-SAXONS KINGDOME, THE CIRCVIT, SVCCESSIONS OF THEIR KINGS, THEIR ISSVES, AND KINGDOMES CONTINVANCE.

CHAPTER VIII.

THis kingdome of the East-Saxons, though one of the least in circuit & power, yet in conuersion from paganisme, & imbracing Christian Religion, were with the first: and out-went many others in their religious zeale. For Sebert King of this kingdome, assisted by his vncle Ethelbert King of Kent (the first Christian King of all the Saxons) for the honor and seruice of God, built a Monastery in London, dedicating it vnto his Apostle S. Paule: And another at Westminster, vnto his othes Apostle S. Peter, both which had beene the Idolatrous temples of the heathen Idoles, Diana and Apollo. And in the like pious zeale, many of his successors laid the foundations of many Oratories vnto Gods vse, and became themselues votaries therein. Such were king Sebba, who abandoning the vaine pleasures of this life made himselfe a Monke in the foresaid Monastery. And king Sigherd his successor, following him in the like deuotion, tooke the rules of holy religion, and in the same Monastery likewise, in holy contemplations spent the rest of his life. In the like deuoted zeale Offa king of this Prouince, laid downe the Scepter of his kingdome, and as a Pilgrime trauailed to Rome, where in steed of the Crown, he put on the the Cowle and entred a monasticall life, wherein he spent his time in holy meditations to the day of his death. Neither were these kings so zealous alone, but that their Queenes likewise abandoning the glory of this world, tooke vpon them the mantles & veiles of holy votaries, and were great instigators of others vnto the like. For so did the Queene and wife of king Sebba (whose name I finde not recorded by any:) Osith, the Queene and wife of king Sighere, euen in the life-time of her husband, became Abbesse of Berking neer London, for which, (though contrary to the precept of the Apostle) shee obtained the name of a Saint. And Kinesswith the wife of king Offa, made herselfe a Nunne in the Abbey of Kinesburgh, whereof her husbands sister was Abbesse. The time of whose ignorances howsoeuer these brighter dayes doe condemne, yet by them we may learne to adde deeds vnto knowledge, lest knowing, and not doing, we be beaten with many stripes. 1. The Kings thereof claime their descent from Prince Woden, not as all the rest of the Saxon Kings, but onely by a collaterall line; & Erchenwine became the first King, which neuertheless he held as Feodarie to the Kings of Kent. For which cause, it seemeth that Malmsbury mentioneth him not in the Catalogue of those Kings, but maketh his sonne Sledda the first, and tenth in descent from Woden.

3. An.Do.596. Sebert the time when he began to raigne.

Sebert the ſonne of Sledda and of Queene Ricula, beganne his Raigne in the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation 596. and in the thirty ſixth yeere of the raigne of King Ethelbert of Kent, his mothers brother, at that time Monarch of the Engliſh-men, who in Seberts chiefe citie London, a Princely Mart Towne, (ſaith Beda) of many people arriuing thither both by ſea and land; new built a Church, making it the Cathedrall of Biſhop Miletus, and ſo wrought with King Sebert, that hee conuerted him to Chriſtianity; and aſsiſted him in that Foundation, where formerly (ſay ſome) had ſtood the Temple of Diana. This Church theſe new Conuerts and Saxon kings, either new reared or inlarged for the honour and ſeruice of God, and dedicated vnder the name of Saint Paule: which worke Ethelbert further confirmed with ſufficient maintainance, as by this his Charter is ſeene, containing theſe words: Æthelbert Rex, Deo inſpirante, pro anima ſua remedio, dedit Epiſcopo Mileto terram quæ appellatur Tillingham, ad Monaſterium ſiue Solatium ſcilicet S. Pauli. Et ego Rex Æthelbert ita firmiter concedo tibi Præſuli Mileto poteſtatem eius habendi & poſſidendi, vt in perpetuum in Monaſterij vtilitate permaneat, &c. And that this was the Temple of Diana, ſome haue further confirmed vnto vs by the incredible number of Oxe-heads there digged vp in the daies of King Edward the Firſt, when the eaſt-end of that Church was enlarged; which were ſuppoſed to be of thoſe Beaſts that were there ſacrificed to this Goddeſſe Diana. Theſe Kings likewiſe founded the Church of S. Peter in the Weſt of London, at a place called Thorney, where ſomtimes ſtood the Temple of Apollo, as Sulcardus affirmeth; which being ouerthrowne by an Earth-quake, King Lucius new built for the celebration of Gods ſeruice; and that againe being decaied, thoſe Kings reſtored it vnto a greater beauty, where Sebert, after thirteene yeeres raigne; (as ſome write) with Æthelgoda his Queene were buried: whoſe bodies in the daies of Richard the Second (ſaith Walſingh.) were tranſlated from the old Church to the new, and there interred. He had iſſue by the ſaid Queene, Sered, Seward, and Sigebert, whoſe liues and deaths were as followeth, 4 Three Kings ioyntly ſway the Kingdome.

Sered, Seward, and Sigebert, the ſons of King Sebert, raigned as it ſemeth, together in the Kingdome of the Eaſt-Saxons; all three wicked irreligious men, and deadly enemies to the Chriſtian Profeſſion. Theſe contumeliouſly preſuming to the Lords Table, and holy Sacrament of his Body and Bloud, were prohibited by Biſhop Miletus, becauſe they were Idolaters and vnbaptized: which repulſe they tooke ſo offenſiuely, that they expulſed Miletus, who therupon fled into France. But their impietie was not long vnrewarded; for fighting againſt Kingils, and Quincelinus his ſonne, (Kings of the Weſt-Saxons) were by them ouercome: and in battle ſlaine about the yeere of Grace 623. as by the learned Sir Henry Sauile is calculated, whoſe account for theſe times I altogether follow.

Sigebert the little, the ſonne of Seward, the ſecond ſonne of King Sebert, entred his raigne ouer the kingdome of the Eaſt-Saxons, the yeere of Chriſt 623 of whoſe affaires, little mater is left for vs to relate, ſauing that hee hauing both a Brother and a Sonne, yet his Kingdome was ſucceeded by neither, but by one Sigibert, his Coſen German once remooued.

This Sigibert reduced againe his Prouince vn to the embracing of the Chriſtian Faith, (being daily inſtigated thereunto by Oſwie King of Northumberland, and receiued Baptiſme himſelfe at the hands of Biſhop Finnan, at the place called The Wall) procured vertuous Cedda to be his aſsiſter for the plantation of the Goſpell in his kingdome. Hee was murdered by two of his kinſmen, who, as Beda ſaith, were Brethren, no other cauſe mouing them, but his ouer much lenitie and clemency. He raigned by the foreſaid account, ſixteene yeeres, leauing iſſue a young ſonne named Selred, that ſucceeded Seofrid in that kingdome.

Sighere, the ſonne of Sigebert the little, entred his raigne ouer the kingdome of the Eaſt-Saxons, the yeere of our Lord 664. and was the eighth king of that Prouince, in part wherof Sebba his nephew raigned, with better commendations then Sighere at his beginning had done; for Beda reporteth, that vpon a great mortality and plague, to appeaſe the wrath of his Gods, Sighere became an Apoſtata, and forſooke the faith of Chriſt, wheras Sebba continued conſtant with thoſe in that Prouince vnder his Iuriſdiction: yet by the diligent care of Wulfere king of the Mercians, Sighere and his people were reclaimed, throwing downe the Temples and Altars erected to Idolatrie, and opening againe the Chriſtian Churches for the Saints aſſemblies, that ſo (ſaith hee) they might rather die in hope of the Reſurrection, then wallow in ſinne, and liue in Idolatrie. His wife was Oſwith the daughter of Edelfrith, king of Northumberland, whom Capgraue maketh a Saint, and Abbeſſe of Berking neere London, euen in the daies of her husband.

Pauls* in London; as Radulphus de Diceto, with others affirme. Wherein this penitent King liuing a while in faſting and praiers, died the yeere of Chriſt 693. whoſe body was intombed in a Coffin of Gray Marble, the couer copped, and as yet ſtanding in the North wall of the Chancell of the ſame Church.

But ſurely howſoeuer this tombe was then ſet on this Monkiſh tenter, it is now ſince ſhrunke againe in the ſtanding, and exceeds not in meaſure fiue foot in length. He both enlarged with buildings, and inriched with lands the goodly and beautifull Church of weſtminſter; but after he had ruled eight yeres, being moued with a ſuppoſed religious deuotion, hee abandoned Kineſwith his wife (the daughter of Penda the Mercian King) his lands, kinne, and Country, and with Kenred king of Mercia, and Edwine Biſhop of Worceſter, went to Rome, where he was ſhorne a Monke, and in that habit died, leauing his Coſen Selred to ſucceed in his kingdome. CHAPTER IX.

THE ancient inhabitants (as Xiphilinus out of Dio reporteth) inhabiting on each side of the wale, nere the Meata, who in their reuolt against the Romans, called to their ayde the Caledonians; which forced Seuerus the Emperor himselfe into Britaine. By Ptolomy they are caled Ottadini, which Cambden thinketh might well be from Attatini, and that deriued from the British word Vchtine, which signifieth aboue Tine, or on the other side of Tine, according to the site of the Country. And in the change of the name by the Saxons, the site of that Country was the cause, for it lying vpon the north of the riuer Humber, they named Noppan humber-londe, rightly contracted into North-humber-lande, and of three, one word is now made. What gouernmẽt they had, before the Romans obtained it, or what Gouerner vnder thẽ, but such as all other parts of the Iland (besides their Prefects or Lieutenants) is vncertaine; yet certaine it is, when the Saxons had got it, the Country was diuided into two Prouinces, and those called Deira, and Bernicia, which Ella and Ida two famous Captaines among them first possest, and changed the title therof from a Dukedome vnto a Kingdome, inlarging their coasts vpon the south of Humber, and their successors vpon their fellow Kings; whose stemlike draught annexed, both in the mariages, issues, & collateralls, are therein branched as farre as any warrantable records affordeth. And as plenteous of Saints (if Nunnes be Saints, and those sanctified that through blinde zeale, leaue their duties vndischarged, to liue idle without all imploiments) as any other of those Kings that put off their crownes, to weare a Monkes Cowle. For so did two Kings of this kingdome, foure Queenes, and fiue of their children, besides others that vowed their pilgrimages to Rome. And King Oswald so zealous, that himselfe was the interpretor of Bishop Aidans sermons vnto his people; and the people so desirous of Christianity, as that aboue ten thousand men, besides women and children, were in one day baptized in the riuer Swale, by Paulinus the first Arch-Bishop of Yorke.

This Kingdome at first deuided into two Prouinces Diera and Bernitia, was gouerned by Kings, sometimes seuerally & sometimes ioyntly till lastly they fell both into one & by ye Saxons was made their Kingdome of Northumb.

Northumberland how diuided at first.

THis Kingdome of Northumberland consisted at first of two distinct Prouinces: whereof the one was called Deira, and the other Bernicia; and were gouerned sometimes by their Kings seuerally, and sometimes vnder one, as successe of warre, or other casualties incident did afford. The royall descents of whose Kings are brought by Florentius both from the Fourth and Fifth Sonnes of Prince Woden, after this manner. Ella, vnder whom the Kingdome of Deira beganne, was the sonne of Iffi, who was the sonne of Wuskfrea, the sonne of Wilgils, the sonne of Westorwalchna, the sonne of Seomel, the sonne of Suearta, the sonne of Sapugell, the sonne of Seabalb, the sonne of Siggeot, the sonne of Suebdeg, the sonne of Siggar, the sonn of Weadeg, the fourth sonne of Woden. And the descent of Ida, the raiser of the Bernicians kingdome, is brought from Bealdeag the fifth sonne of Woden; for Bealdeag was father to Brand, whose sonnes were Beorn and Freodegar, the latter of which twaine was the progenitour of Cherdik the first West-Saxon King: and his brother Beorn begat another Beorn also, and hee Wegbrand the father of Ingebrand, whose sonne was Alusa, the father of Angengeal, and this mans sonne Ingengat, the father of Æthelbright, whose sonne Oesa begat Eoppa the father of this Ida, the first King of Bernicia.

The Prouince diuided into two Kingdomes. Deira & Bernicia

These Saxon Captaines Ella and Ida, about sixty yeeres after the death of king Hengist, changed the title of this Prouince from a Dukedome to a kingdome. For Hengist hauing giuen the possession of those North parts vnto Otho his Brother, and to Ebusain his sonne, their Successors held it, with many hostile irruptions the space of 99. yeeres. But now the Britaines subiected, and no resistance made, those Captaines diuide the Prouince into two parts, intituling either by the name of a Kingdome; the first Deira, was possessed by Ella, which stretched from Tyne, to the Riuer Humber; and the second Bernicia, enioyed by Ida, whose Continent lay betwixt the Tyne and the Frith of Edenborough. These together contained the Counties of Westmerland, Cumberland, Northumberland, Yorkeshire, Lancaster, and Durham: and was bounded on the West with the Irish Seas, on the North with the Wall of Seuerus, on the East with the German Ocean, and on the South with the Riuers Mersey and Humber. Ida, saith Malmesbury, raigned fourteene yeeres: and Ella by Mathew of Westminster, is said to succeed him for thirty yeeres. The issue of Ida legitimate, as Huntingto recordeth, were Adda, Bealric, Thedrik, Ethelrik, Osmer, and Theodred; illegitimate, Oga, Ecca, Oswald, Ailrik, Sogoe, and Sogother. These (saith Matthew of Westminster) arriued at Flemisburke with 40. Ships, and assisted their Father in manie of his enterprises. The issue of Ella, by Florentius his record, were Acca, Wife of Ethelfrid, King of Bernicia, and mother to the most Christian Oswald, Monarch of the Englishmen, and Edwine the Monarch and first Christian King of Northumberland. Ida is said to beginne his raigne Anno 547. 7. An Do. 593. Beda hist. eccles. Angl. lib. 1. cap. 33 Ethelfrid very thirsty of fame.

Ethelfrid, a man very valiant, and thirsty for renowne, succeeded his father in the Northumbrians kingdome. Him Beda compares to king Saul in Israel, excepting onely in the knowledge of Gods true Religion: to whom (saith he) might be applied the saying of Iacob touching Beniamin, that like a rauening Wolfe he deuoured his prey in the morning, and diuided the spoile thereof in the euening. For he made greater Conquests ouer the daily afflicted Britaines, then all the kings of the Angles had done; and peopling their possessions with his Saxons, held the right owners vnder subiection and tribute. This his prosperitie Edanaden king of the Scots greatly enuied, & attempting to croppe it, and to plant himselfe vpon the roote of like honour, hee assembled a great and strong Army against him, and at the place called Degsaston strooke battle with him, wherein notwithstanding he was ouerthrowne, and his Scots discomfited, yet with such losse to King Ethelfrid, that Theobald his brother, with the part of the Army whereof he was Generall, were all vanquished and destroied. This battle went so sore against the Scottish Britaines, that (saith Beda) no King of that Nation durst attempt to meet the English in the Field for a long time after. And the fortune of the day did so much augment both his fame, and also his haughty spirit, that presently he re-enforced his power against the Britaines, that were at * Cairlegion, where of them hee made a most lamentable slaughter, and that not onely of the Souldiert prepared for fight, but also of those religious and harmlesse Monkes, there assembled for praier.

These Monks were of the Monastery of Bangor in Northwales, famous for antiquity, forme of discipline, and spacious circuit. It was situated in the fruitful valley now called the English Mailor; and vpon the Bankes of the Riuer Dee, where it exteuded it selfe as in the circuit of a walled Citie, containing within it the quantity of a mile and halfe of ground: two of whose Gates may at this day easily be discerned; the one of them called Port Hogen, lying by North; and the other Port Calais, situate on the South; the Riuer Dee hauing now changed his Channell, runneth thorow the middest betwixt both the Gates, which stand asunder fiue hundred paces. This Monasterie, saith Clariualentius, was the Mother of al others in the World; who in memory of the * Seuen Churches of Asia, did distribute into seuen portions their Monks, euery one numbering three hundred soules, and al of them (as Beda saith) liuing by the labour of their own hands. Many of these assembling at Cair-legion, to assist their Brethren Britaines with their supplications vnto God against this Ethelfrid, surnamed the Wilde, & his fierce Souldiers the Infidell Saxons; with three daies fasts spent their time in continuall praiers. But King Ethelfrid beholding their maner, demanded the cause: and understanding that they called for assistance of their God against him and his Army, set first vpon their Guarder Brockmal, a man of Armes, who to saue his owne life, left all theirs to the sword, wherin perished one thousand and two hundred Christian Monks, besides the discomfiture of the Britaines Host. Many of these were interred in their owne Monasteries, whose bodies, saith Leyland, haue beene found in the memory of man, in the rotten weedes wherein they were slaine. But as his fame increased daily abroad, so were his feares augmented continually at home. For Edwin the sonne of Ella, and third King of Deira, a gallant young Prince; and newly seated in his fathers Kingdome, wrought many suspicions in Ethelfrids head; and though he was brother to his Wife Acca, yet the neerenesse of that alliance, no whit diminished his zealous conceits, whom therfore by priuy conspiracies and apparant pursuits hee to daily EDwine thus raised by the helpe of King Redwald, returned to his Country, and was of the Inhabitants made king of Northumberland, and afterward Monarch of the Englishmen; as in their succession shall be declared. Beda (somewhat too much addicted to fabulous miracles) of him reporteth this story: That whilest hee lay banished in king Redwalds Court, Ethelfrid instigated his receiuer, by promises to take away his life: or if he refused, threatned him warres: for feare whereof, Redwald, partly inclining to this wicked purpose, reuealed the same to the queene his wife; which a friend of Edwine hearing, told him of his danger, and wished him to flie. Edwine thus perplexed with troubled thoughts in the dead of the night, sate solitary vnder a tree in dumps, musing what was best to be done; to suspect and flie from Redwald, that had honoured him so much, he held it a wrong; and to thinke himselfe safe in other Prouinces against so powerfull pursuers, he thought it was vaine. Thus distracted in casting what way might be safest, suddenly approached a man vnto him, vtterly vnknowne, who after salutation, demaunded the cause why hee sate at so vnseasonable a time, in so vncouth a place, and pensiue manner? Edwine thinking him to be his death's-man, resolutely answered; It nothing concerned him at all, either to aske, or to know his estate. Oh Edwine (said he) thinke not but that I know thy sorrow, and the cause of thy sitting thus vpon that stone; thy death is pretended, and euen at hand: but what wouldest thou giue to rid thee of that danger and to make king Redwald thy assured preseruer? Any thing, quoth Edwine, which is in my power. But what shall be his reward (said the other) that shall set thee vpon the throne of thy kingdome, and that with such glory, as none of thy Progenitors euer attained vnto? I would bee thankfull to that man, said Edwine, in all things, and at all times, as reason required, and of right I ought. But tell me Edwine, said he, what if the same man shew thee a more safe way to preserue the life of thy soule, then either thou at this present knowest, or any of thy Parents euer heard of, wilt thou consent and imbrace his counsell? Yea, said Edwine, God forbid that I should not bee ruled by him, that thus should free me from this present danger, set me vpon the throne of a kingdome, and after these great fauours, should also teach me the way to an eternall life. Vpon this answere, laying his right hand on Edwines head, he said vnto him; When these things shall in order come to passe, then call to minde this time, and what thou hast promised, and so vanished from his presence. The young Prince thus left betwixt hope and despaire, his friend that had forewarned him of his death: came hastily to him with a more cheerful countenance, Come in Edwine (quoth he) and surcease thy cares, for the queene hath not onely changed Redwalds mind to saue thy life, but he also hath granted to maintaine thy right against Ethelfrid thine enemy. Which shortly he did, and slew him as we haue said.

But because we shall haue occasion to speake of this Edwine as he was Monarch of the Englishmen, we will reserue his Acts, Issues, and Raigne, to be further related in the course of his Succession. He was slaine in battell against Cadwall king of the Britaines and Penda king of the Mercians, when he had prosperously raigned seuenteene yeeres, the twelfth of October; Anno 633. and was buried in Saint Peters Church at Streanshall, after called Withby. Yet this their Apostasie (saith Beda) remained not long vnpunished: *For Cadwalader King of the Britaines, with wicked force, but with worthy vengeance, slew them both the next Sommer ensuing. Osrike vnprepared, and his whole Army penned in the Suburbs of their owne City, he miserably slew; and possessing the Prouince of the Northumbrians, not as a King or Conqueror, but rather like an outragious Tyrant, destroied and rent in tragicall manner, all things before him. EGfrid, the eldest sonne of King Oswy by Queene Eanfled, had beene Hostage in the kingdome of Mercia, and after his father was made King of Northumberland, in the yeere of Christ 671. Hee warred, but with great losse, against Ethelred King of Mercia, neere vnto the Riuer of Trent, wherein his younger brother Elfwyne was vnfortunately slaine, to the great griefe of both the Kings, the one being his owne brother, and the other his brother in law by marriage: whereupon a peace and reconciliation was made. But Egfred being by nature of a disquiet disposition, inuaded the Irish, and destroied those harmelesse and silly people, which (as Beda saith) had beene great friends to the English. Their resistance consisted chiefly in curses and imprecations for reuenge, which though they could not open heauen, yet (saith hee) it is to be beleeued, that for their cause he was cut off the next yeere ensuing by the Picts or Red-shankes, against whom he prepared, contrary to the aduice of his Counsell, and by them was slaine among the strait and waste mountaines, 20. Maij, the yeere of mans felicity 685. and of his age forty, after he had raigned fifteene yeeres. His wife was Etheldred the daughter of Anna King of the East-Angles: shee was both Widow and Virgin; first maried to Tonbert a Noble man that ruled the Giruij, a people inhabiting the fenny Countries of Norfolke, Lincolne, Huntington, and Cambridge-shieres; and after him also in virginity continued twelue yeeres with her husband King Egfrid, contrary ro his minde, and the Apostles precept, that forbibdeth such defrauding either in man or woman, except it be with consent for a time, and to the preparatiō of praier; affirming elswhere, that Mariage is honourable, and the bed thereof vndefiled, wherein the woman doth redeeme her transgression, through faith, loue, holinesse, and modesty, by bearing of children. This notwithstanding. she obtained licence to depart his Court, and got her to Coldingham Abby, where shee was professed a Nunne vnder Ebba the daughter of King Ethelfrld. Then went shee to Ely, and new built a Monastery, whereof she was made Abbesse, and wherein with great reuerence shee was intombed: whose vertues and remembrance remained to posterities by the name of *S. The firſt Saxon King of this kingdome was Crida, the eleuenth in deſcent from Prince Woden: and the laſt in a lineall ſucceſſion from him, was Ceolwulfe, the fifteenth king of that kingdome, beſides fiue other collateralls, that by intruſion put on the Crowne. Their iſſues were many,as in the ſtemme annexed is to be ſeene, and therein their matches or mariages, their Armes or Atchiuements, as the ancient haue deliuered,and the modern haue receiued, are according inſculpted frō the authority of both. Theſe Mercians as they were many,ſo were they ſtrong, and by ſtrong hand eight of their kings in a continued ſucceſſion, got and kept the Emperiall Crowne of the Heptarchy. For though thoſe kings raigned as kings in their owne territories; yet among them euer one was the ſupreame head of the reſt,and was called king of Engle lond, till Egbert the weſt-Saxon laid all into one. Neither were their kings more ſtrong then they were pious,after they had beene wet in the Lauer of baptiſme, themſelues and children ſhewing their faith by their workes,in building of Churches, Monaſteries and Hoſpitalls; and ſome of them were ſo zealous in the doctrine then taught, as they laid away their robes,& tooke the tonſure or habite of monkes. The first raiser of that Title and name of a Kingdome was Crida the sonne of Kenwald, who was the sonne of Cnebba, the sonne of Icbell, the sonne of Eomer, the sonne of Engengeate, the sonne of Offa, the sonne of Weremund, the sonne of Withleg, the sonne of Waga, the sonne of VVethelgeate, the third of the fiue sonnes of Prince Woden. This man, without more fame of his further acts, is said to haue raigned the space of ten yeeres, and to haue died Anno 594, His issue was Wibba that succeeded him in his Kingdome, and a daughter named Quenburg, matched in mariage with Edwin afterwards King of Northumberland, with whom she liued in the Court of King Redwald in the time of his troubles, and died before him in that his banishment. She bore him two sonnes, Osfrid and Edfride, as in succession of Edwins Monarchy shall bee shewed: notwithstanding Beda reporteth this Quenburge to be daughter of Ceorl, the third King of Mercia, and grand-childe to this first Crida.

His issue was Penda, Kenwalke, & Eoppa, all three Progenitors of Kings afterwards in that kingdome, with a daughter named Sexburg, maried to Kenwald, King of the West-Saxons, whom he without iust cause diuorced from him; for which cause great troubles afterwards ensued, as in the raignes of those Kings wee haue said. He in great honour raigned twenty yeeres, and giuing place vnto nature, left his kingdome to be enioied by another.

4. An.Do.626. Penda.

P*enda*, the sonne of Wibba, beganne his raigne ouer the Mercians the yeere of Christs Incarnation six hundred twenty six, & continued the same the space of thirty yeeres. He was a man violent in action, and mercilesse in condition, cruell and vnsatiate of blood: he shooke the Cities, & disturbed the borders of the Saxon-Kings more then any other in that Heptarchy before him had done. Against Kingils and Quinchelme, Kings together of the VVest-Saxons, he ioined battell neere vnto the City Cirenchester, where both the parties fought it out to the vtmost, with the effusion of much Saxons bloud: but those comming to concord, he with Cadwallo King of the Britaines, slew in battell Edwine and Oswald, Kings of Northumberland; Sigebert, Egfrid, and Anna, Kings of the East-Angles; and forced Kenwald King of the West-Saxons, out of his Country, in quarell of his Sister. Of these his prosperities he became so proud, that he thought nothing impossible for his atchieuement; and therefore threatning the destruction of the Northumbers, prepared his Army for that expedition. Oswy then raigning King of that Country, proffered great summes of mony, and most precious Iewels to purchase his peace: which being refused, and the battell ioined, more by the hand of God, then power of man, this Tyrant was slaine, and his whole Army discomfited. His Wife was Kinswith, and issue by her Peada, who after him was King: Vlfere and Ethelred, both Monarchs of the English, Merkthel, a man famous for his great holinesse; and Merwald that gouerned some part of Mercia, whose Wife was Edburga, the foundresse of Minster in Tanet, and daughter to Egbert King of Kent, by whom he had issue Meresin, a man of noted deuotion; Milbury, and Mildgith, both holy Virgins, and Mildrith also Abbesse of Tanet, all foure canonized for Saints. The daughters of King Penda were Kineburg, the Wife of Alkfrid, King of Northumberland, afterward a Votaresse in Kinesburg Abbey; and Kineswith, who married Offa King of the East-Angles, and became also a Nunne with her sister Kineburgh.

5. An.Do.656. Peada.

P*Eada*, the sonne of King Penda, in the daies of his father, and with his permission, had gouerned the middle part of Mercia, and after his death, by the gift of Oswy of Northumberland, all the South of that kingdome from the Riuer Trent, vpon cõposition to marry his daughter, and to imbrace Christianity; which thing this Peada performed, and was the first Christian King of the Mercians. His Baptisme receiued, to witnesse the first fruits of his profession, hee laid the foundation of a faire Church at Medeshamsted, now called Peterborow, but liued not to finish the same, for that he was slaine by the treason of Alkfled his wife in the celebration of Easter, (as Beda saith) hauing had no issue by her. But Robert de Swapham (an Author of good antiquity, who saw the stones of that foundation to be so huge, as that eight yoke of Oxen could hardly draw one of them) saith, that Peada was brought to his end by the practise of his Mother, and not of his wife; as in these his word is manifest: Peada (saith he) laid the foundation of a Monastery at Medeshamsted, in the Giruians or Fen-Country, which he could not finish, for that by the wicked practise of his Mother, hee was made away. Whereby this blot is taken from this Christian Lady, and brands the face of her that most deserueth it. This King raigning as substitute to king Oswy of Northumberland aforesaid, by some is not accounted for a Mercian king, his regiment resting vnder the command of another.

V*Vlfhere*, the Brother of murthered Peada, set vp by the Mercians, against king Oswy, prooued a Prince most valiant and fortunate. For he expelled the Northumbrians Lieutenants forth of those dominions; fought victoriously against Kenwald King of the West-Saxons; conquered the Ile of wight, and attained to be sole Monarch of the Englishmen: whereof more shall be said when we come to the times and successions of their raignes.

This Vulfhere is said to raigne in great honour for seuenteene yeeres, and his body to be buried in the Monastery of Peterborow, which he had founded. His queene Ermenheld after his death, became a Nunne at Ely, vnder her Mother Sexburg, and there died. KEnelm, the ſonne of King Kenwolfe, a childe of ſeuen yeres old, ſucceeded in the Kingdome of Mercia, but not in the Monarchy, as his fathers had done, Egbert the Weſt-Saxon at that time being grown great in his fortunes. This young King Kenelm raigned only fiue moneths, and then by the ambitious deſire of Quendrid his ſiſter, who ſeeking the gouernment by the ſhedding of his guiltleſſe bloud, inſtigated one Askbert his Inſtructer, by promiſes of great preferments and rich rewards, to make him away, who only ſtood (as ſhe thought) in her way to the Crown. This wicked practiſe was forthwith as impiouſly performed: for hauing him forth vnder pretence of hunting, he ſlew the innocent King, whoſe vertuous inclination promiſed great hopes, and whoſe harmleſſe yeeres had not attained to any worldly guile. His bodie hee ſecretly buried vnder a buſh, and (if we will beleeue the Golden Legend; where his life is deſcribed) was thus found out: A white Doue (which belike had ſeene the deed done) and had got it ingroſſed in a ſcrole of parchment, poſted therewith to *S. CHAPTER XI.

THE East-Angles kingdome (conteyning Suffolke, Norfolke, Cambridg-ſhire, and the Ile of Ely) was raiſed to the hight of a kingdom, by Vffa a Saxon Captaine, and the people thereof from him were called Vffines a long time after. But his greater by farre, was Redwald, the third King of this Prouince, who gote, and wore, the Emperiall Crowne of the Monarchy. Sixteene kings of this kingdome ſucceſſiuely raigned from Vffa to Edmund, whoſe matches, iſſues, and other collateralls, are in the draught annexed, preſented to thy ſight, with the Armes or Atchieuements, that the ancient haue giuen them, and the moderne admitted: which I for my part had rather ſubſcribe vnto, then to ranſcate the rubbiſh of times ruines, and get onely labour for my paines. The firſt king of the East-Angles that profeſſed Chriſtianity, was Erpenwald, but with ſuch diſlykes to his people, as they entred into conſpiracy, and traiterouſly murthered him. But his ſonne in law Sigebert, with a further foreſight, laid the fondation deeper, then the ſtepfather had done. For he built a Schoole, for the education of children, that the veſſell might be ſeaſoned to receiue that heauenly liquour, vnto which ceſterne, through the Conduits of Felix and others, thoſe waters of life, ſo plenteouſly ranne, that King Sigebert himſelfe deſcended his throne, and in Cumbreburg Abbey ſpent the reſt of his life in holy meditations. And Anna King of this Prouince, was ſo happy in his children, that moſt of them are commended vnto poſterities by the names of Saints. For ſo was Lady Etheldrid, who being twice married, and more then twelue yeeres in that eſtate, liuing in perfect virginity, and againſt the conſents of both her husbands, tooke the vaile of a Nunne at Coldingham, and afterwards became Abbeſſe of Ely. Her ſiſter Sexburg Queene of Kent, and a mother of foure children, after her husbands deceas, became a Nunne likewiſe, ſucceeding Queene Segbur Abbeſſe of the ſame Monaſtery, wherein Lady Nithgith their younger ſiſter with them was a Menchion. Ethilburg the third daughter of King Anna, was made Abbeſſe of Berking, a foundation of her brother Erkinwalds Biſhope of London. And Lady Withburg a naturall daughter of the ſaid King, with Sedrido the daughter of his wife, went into France, and in Saint Brigges Monaſtery, ſucceeded each others the Abbaſes; ſo full of deuotions, and ſo fruitleſſe of bodies, were all theſe Princes, excepting Queene Sexburg. But had not their guides bene blinded, and altogether ignorant in the Scriptures; they might haue knowne, that God in that ſexe required procreation. For, to increaſe & multiply was the womã created, & by faith and child bearing is to be ſaued. 1. Tim. 2. 15.

The circuit of this Prouince.

THe Counties (as we now cal them) that were subiect to this East-Angles kingdome, were Suffolke, Norfolke, Cambridge-shire, and the Ile of Ely. The bounds whereof were limitted in this manner: the East and North sides were confined by the Ocean; the West, with Saint Edmunds Ditch, and the South altogether with Essex, and some part of Hertfordshire.

This Vffa (as Florentius the Monke of Worcester hath laid downe) was the sonne of Withelin, and he the sonne of Hrippus, the sonne of Rothmund, the sonne of Trigils, the sonne of Titmon, the sonne of Caser, the second sonne of Prince Woden. And although the Writers of these times haue made no further mention of his Acts, yet may wee wel suppose that his daies were not altogether so quietly spent, both in the infancy of that newly erected kingdom, and when such wars were commenced for the obtaining the whole Iland. His issue was Redwald, that immediatly succeeded him, & from whom other kings of that kingdom were lineally descēded.

He receiued and succoured in his Court Edwyne with his wife in their Exiles, and assisted him against Ethelfrid king of Northumberland, that sought his life, as before we haue shewed, and hereafter in the succession of his Monarchy we shall haue further occasion to shew. He raigned Monarch eight yeers, and king of the East-Angles 31. Iohn Stowe.

Erpenwald, the younger sonne of King Redwald, (Reynhere his elder brother being slaine in battle by Ethelfred in the quarrell of distressed Edwine) succeeded his Father in the kingdom of the East-Angles, the yere of our Lord God six hundred twenty foure. He was the first king of that Prouince, that publikely professed the Christian Faith, which he receiued at the friendly motion and zealous exhortation of king Edwine of Northumberland; but so much to the discontentment & grudge of the people, as thereupon they presently entred into cōspiracy to practise his death; which a Pagan Ruffian named Richebert, not long after most traiterously executed. His raigne is placed in the foresaid Table of our writers, (as it is compared with the other Kings of those times) to extende twelue yeeres; after whose death, those people returned to their wonted Idolatry, and for three yeeres continuance embraced their former Gentility, from which they were reclaimed by Sigebert his brother in law, who succeeded him in his Throne, hee hauing no issue, to whom it might be left.

The Subiects reclaimed by Sigebert.

5. An. Do. 636. The fifth King.

Sigebert the sonne of the second Wife to Redwald, and by her born to a former husband, whose name as vnknowne, was greatly mistrusted by his Father in law, King Redwald, that he went about to aspire his Crowne, the motiues of which suspition, notwithstanding all the endeuors of innocent Sigebert, were still followed with an enuious eye, and his subiectiue semblances, as notes of popularity, were euer conceiued to aime at the supreme authority: which blot of iealousie, when it could no otherwise be wiped out, he abandoned the Court of the king, and Country of his birth; and in France as an exile, all the time of Redwald the Father, & likewise in the raigne of Erpenwald the son, spent his time in study of good Literature, & contemplatiue exercises, where learning the truth of Christs Doctrine, & hauing receiued the lauer of Baptisme, after the death of this said Erpenwald his allied Brother, returned, and was made King of the East-Angles.

Sigebert suspected of treason against Redwald.

He goeth into exile.

This man (saith Beda) following the examples of France, brought the light of the Gospell into his Dominions, and by the assistance of Felix Bishop of Dunwich, for a more firme plantatation thereof, built a Schoole for the education of children, appointing them Schoole-masters and Teachers after the maner of the Kentishmen; who are supposed to haue had at that time, the Liberall Sciences professed among them, in their Metropolitane City Canterbury, which was the pateme (saith that Countries Perambulator) that this Sigebert followed in the erection of his: but whether at Cambridge or elsewhere, hee leaueth for Doctor Caius of Cambridge, and M. Key of Oxford, to be disputed of. And indeed Beda assigneth not the place for this foundation, nor once nameth Cambridge, vnlesse you will say, that out of the ruines of Grantcester, an ancient City decaied in his daies, the same arose, and whereof hee maketh mention in his fourth Booke, vpon this occasion as followeth.

Queene Ethelred (saith he) that had been a Virgin, wife to Egfrid king of Northumberland the tearme of twelue yeeres, and Abbesse of Ely for seuen more, for her reputed holinesse after her death and buriall, was thought worthy by Queene Sexburge her sister (who had beene wife to Ercombert king of Kent, and succeeded her Abbesse in the same Monastery) to be remoued out of her wooden tombe & meane place of buriall, into the Church, & into a richer Monument; but for want of stone, which was scarce in those parts, certaine brethren were sent to finde out some for that vse, who comming to Gpantcearten, a little City left desolate and vninhabited, found by the walles a Tomb of white marble very faire, and couered with a like stone. This they thought to be found not without miracle, and therefore most fit to intombe her corps, which accordingly they did. But that this had beene the place of Sigeberts Schoole, he mentioneth not. But whether by him or no, wee know it now the other Vniuersity of England, a seed-plot of all diuine and humane Literature; and one of those springs whence issue the wholesome waters that doe bedew both the Church & Common-wealth, both, famous for the Arts, for Buildings, and Reuenewes, as their like is not to be found in Europe (saith Peter Martyre) and that most truly. But to returne: Sigebert being wearied with the waighty affaires of this world, laid the burden thereof vpon Egricke his kinsman, & shore himselfe a Monk in the Abbey of Cumbreburg, which himselfe had built: & wherein he liued, vntil that wicked Penda, the Mercian King, with his heathenish cruelty molested the peace of the East-Angls; who after long resistāce, finding themselues too weake, besought Sigebert for the better encouragement of their souldiers, to shew himselfe in field; which when he refused, by constraint (saith Beda) they drew him forth, where in the midst of them he was slaine in battle, vsing no other weapon for defence, sauing only a white wand, when he had raigned onely three yeeres, and left no issue to suruiue him, that is any where recorded.

7. An. Do. 642. The ſeuenth King. Beda hiſt. Angl. li. 3. cap. 18. Malmesb. de geſtis Regum Angl.

ANna ſucceeded King Egricke in the Kingdome of the East-Angles, the yeere of grace ſixe hundred forty two, as the next in bloud to Erpinwald, being the ſonne of Guido, ſaith Beda, the ſonne of Eni, ſaith Malmsbury, who was brother to great Redwald; and both of them the ſonnes of Titulus, the ſecond King of that Prouince. This King, as the other two former had done, felt the fury of raging Penda, with his mercileſſe Mercians, that ſore aſſaulted his Territories with rapine and ſpoile. To withſtand whoſe further proceedings, King Anna drew the ſtrength of his East-Angles againſt them, and encountred Penda in a great and mortall battle, wherein they were all diſcomfited, and Anna among them ſlaine, when hee had raigned in continuall trouble the ſpace of thirteene yeeres. His iſſue were many, and thoſe of great holineſſe or ſanctity of life. Whereof Ferminus the eldeſt, and heire apparant, was ſlaine by Penda in the ſame battle with his Father, and was with him buried in Blidribrugh, now Blibrugh, but afterwards remoued to S. Edmondsbury. His other ſonne was Erkenwald, Abbat of Chertſide, and Biſhop of London, that lyeth buryed in the South Ile, aboue the Quire in Saint Pauls Church, where to this day remaineth a memoriall of him. His daughters were theſe; Etheldrid the eldeſt, was firſt marryed vnto a Nobleman, whom Beda nameth Tonbert, Gouernour of the Fenny Countries of Northfolke, Huntington, Lincolne, and Cambridge-ſhires: and after his death remaining a Virgin, ſhee was remarried to Egfrid King of Northumberland, with whom likewiſe ſhee liued in perfect virginity the ſpace of twelue yeeres, notwithſtanding his intreaty and allurements to the contrary. From whom, laſtly, ſhee was releaſed, and had licence to depart his Court, vnto the Abbey of Coldingham, where firſt ſhee was vailed a Nunne vnder Abbeſſe Ebba; and thence departing, ſhee liued at Ely, and became her ſelfe Abbeſſe thereof, wherein laſtly ſhee dyed, and was interred; remembred vnto poſterities by the name of S. Audrie. His ſecond daughter was Sexburg, who married Ercombert, King of Kent, vnto whom ſhee bare two ſonnes, and two daughters, as wee in that Kingdomes ſucceſſion haue ſhewed: after whoſe death, ſhee tooke the habite of a Nunne, and ſucceeded her ſiſter Etheldrid, Abbeſſe of Ely, wherein ſhee dyed and was interred: and their youngeſt ſiſter Withgith, was likewiſe a Menchion with them in the ſame Monaſtery, and all of them canonized for Saints. Ethilburge his third daughter was made Abbeſſe of Berking, neere London, built by her brother Biſhop Erkinwald, wherein ſhee liued, and laſtly dyed. A naturall daughter likewiſe he had, whoſe name was Withburge, that with Sedrido the daughter of his wife, were both of them profeſſed Nunnes, and ſucceeded each other Abbeſſes in the Monaſtery of S. Brigges in France. Such a reputed holineſſe was it held in thoſe dayes, not onely to be ſeparated from the accompanying with men, whereunto women by God were created, but alſo to abandon the Country of their natiuity, and as ſtrangers in forraigne Lands, to ſpend the continuance of their liues.

8. An. Do. 654. Ethelherd the eighth King.

EThelherd, the brother of Anna, the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation ſixe hundred fifty foure, was made King of the East-Angles: the which it ſeemeth he had attempted in the raigne of his brother; for that hee had aſſiſted Penda in his warres againſt him; and was the motiue (ſaith Beda) of the warres againſt Oſwin King of Northumberland; wherein ſiding with the heathen Penda, he was worthily ſlaine, the fifteenth day of Nouember, when he had raigned onely two yeeres, leauing his name to the blot of infamy, and his Crown to be poſſeſſed by his younger brother. His wife was Hereſwith ſiſter of Hilda, the famous learned Abbeſſe of Streanſhale, and great grand-childe to Edwine King of Northumberland, who bare vnto him Aldulfe, Elfwolfe, and Beorne, all three ſucceeding Edilwald in the Kingdome of the East-Angles.

10. An. Do. 664

ALdulfe, the eldeſt ſonne of Ethelherd and Queene Hereſwith, after the death of his vncle King Edelwald, obtained the Kingdome of the East-Angles, and therein raigned without any honour or honourable action by him performed: Onely his name and time of his raigne, which was nineteene yeers, is left of him by Writers: and affordeth no further relation of vs here to be inſerted, beſides his Coine here ſet.

ELſwolf the ſonne of King Ethelherd, and brother to this laſt mentioned Aldulfe, began his raigne ouer the Kingdome of the East-Angles, the yeere of Chriſt his Incarnation, ſix hundred eighty three, and continued in the ſame, the time of ſeuen yeeres, without record of any memorable Act, Wife, or Iſſue, to reuiue his name.

12. An. Do. 714. Beorn the twelfth King.

BEorne, the yongeſt ſonne of King Ethelherd, ſucceeded his brother King Elfwolfe in the Kingdome of the East-Angles; no further mention being made of him, his wife, nor Iſſue, which are all together periſhed, and laid long ſince in their graues of obliuion.

13. An. Do. 714. Ethelred the thirteenth King.

He raigned two and fifty yeeres.

EThelred, after the death of his coſen Beorne, ſucceeded him in the Kingdome of the East-Angles, iſſuing (as is ſuppoſed) from King Edelwald the brother of Ethelherd, and of Anna, both of them Kings in that Prouince. His raigne by Writers is ſaid to be fifty two yeeres, which notwithſtanding was paſſed ouer without any memorable note: for albeit that his gouernment was long, and the declining Heptarchy not vnlikely to haue miniſtred matters of remembrance to poſterities, yet is the ſame paſſed ouer by the ſilence of our Writers, and no further mention made of him, beſides the education of his yonger ſonne Ethelbert, who proued a moſt worthy King. His wife, and the mother of this vertuous ſonne, was Leofrun, ſaith the Writer of his life, without further mention of her parentage, or other iſſne. This King deceaſed the yeere after Chriſts natiuity, ſeuen hundred forty eight, the ſame yeere that Ethelbert entred his Kingdome of Kent.

14. An. Do. 749. Ethelbert the foureteenth King.

EThelbert, the ſonne of King Ethelred, after his Fathers death was ordained King of the East-Angles, whoſe dayes of youth were ſpent in learning and deeds of charity, and the whole time of his gouernement in continuall tranquility; for hee is recorded to be a Prince religious and charitable, ſober, profound, and wiſe in counſell. This King being incited by Offa the Mercian (that ſtill thirſted after greatneſſe) to marry Elfryd his Daughter, a Lady of great beautie, came vpon that purpoſe to Offa his Court, then ſeated at Sutton Wallis in the County of Hereford, and was by him there cruelly murthered at the inſtigation of Quendrid his vnkind (intended) mother in Law; no other occaſion miniſtred, but the greatneſſe of his Port, that much in her eyes ouer-heighted her husbands. His Bride-bed (the graue) was firſt at Merden, north from Sutton vpon the Riuer Lug. But afterwards vpon repentance, Offa remoued it vnto Hereford; ouer whom, Milfrid an vnder King of the Mercians, built a moſt faire Church in memoriall of him, which yet beares his name, and is the Cathedrall of that See. His Bride, Lady Elfrid, much lamenting his contriued murther, with-drew her ſelfe to Crowland in the Fennes, and there vowed chaſtity all the dayes of of her life; notwithstanding some affirme that shee was wife to King Kenwolfe, the successor of her brother Egfrid. This King raigned the space of forty fiue yeeres, as is set in the Table of our English Writers, and died the yeere of Christs incarnation seuen hundred ninety three, the eighteenth day of May; and his Kingdome intruded vpon by the Mercians, hauing had neither wife nor children, that Historians make mention of: after whose death the Kingdome of the East-Angles was brought to decay, both by the Mercians, West-Saxons, and them of Kent; so that by meanes of their violence, that Prouince was destitute of her owne Gouernours, the space of seuenty seuen yeeres, vntill lastly the assaults of the Danes (a new-come Guest and most dangerous Enemy) caused the other Kings to stand vpon their Guards, and rather to defend what they already had gotten, then to seeke inlargement, to the hazard of all: at which time, it is said one Offa, to whom the right of that Crowne belonged, vpon a religious deuotion, tooke his pilgrimage to the Sepulcher of Christ, and visiting in his way a kinsman of his, whose name was Alkmund, at the Citie Norhenberge in Saxonie, there made his will, wherein he adopted young Edmund his Heire, the sonne of Alkmond: and accomplishing his voiage, in his returne died at the Port Saint George, from whence hee sent young Edmund his Ring, and therewith ordained him King of the East-Angles. Alkmund a Prince of great power in those parts, maintained his sonnes rightfull election, and with a sufficient power sent him to claime the Kingdome. These landing in the East of England, at a place called Maydenboure, built a royall Tower, which hee named, and to this day is called, Hunstantone, situated vpon the North-west point of Norfolke, that beareth likewise his owne name.

He raigned forty fiue yeeres.

15. An. Do. 870. Edmund the fifteenth King. The Danes inuasion. Polydor. Virg.

EDmund thus arriued, was as willingly receiued, and by the East-Angles made their King; in whose time Hungar and Hubba, two Danish Captaines, with an innumerable multitude of Heathen Danes, entred the Land at the mouth of Humber, and from thence inuaded Nottingham, Yorke, and Northumberland, where (without respect of age or sex) they laid all waste, and left the Land whence they departed like to a desolate Wildernesse. From thence they came with the like fury into Edmunds Territories, and sacked Thetford a frequent City in those dayes: but he not able to withstand their violence, fled into his Castle at Framingham, wherein he was of them besieged; and lastly, taken (saith Abba Floriacensis) in a village then called Hegliſdune, of a wood bearing the same name; or rather yeelded himselfe to their torments, to saue more Christian bloud: for it is recorded, that because of his most constant Faith and Profession, those Pagans first beat him with bats, then scourged him with whips, he still calling vpon the name of Iesus, for rage whereof, they bound him to a stake, and with their arrowes shot him to death; and cutting off his head, contemptuously threw it into a bush, after he had raigned ouer the East-Angles the space of sixteene yeeres, hauing had neither wife nor issue that is read of. His body and head (after the Danes were departed) were buried at the same royall Towne, as Abba termes it, where Sigebert the East-Anglean King, and one of his predecessors, at his establishing of Christianity, built a Church, and where afterwards (in honour of him) was built another most spacious, of a wonderfull frame of Timber, and the name of the Towne, vpon the occasion of his buriall, called vnto this day, Saint Edmondsbury. This Church and place, Suenus the Pagan Danish King in impiety and fury burned to ashes. But when his sonne Canute had made conquest of this Land, and gotten possession of the English Crowne, terrified and affrighted (as saith the Legend) with a vision of the seeming Saint Edmund, in a religious deuotion to expiate his Fathers sacriledge, built it anew most sumptuously, enriched his place with Charters and Gifts, and offered his owne Crowne vpon the Martyrs Tombe. After the death of this Edmund, the East-Angles Country was possessed by the Danes, and so continued about some fifty yeeres, vntill that Edward surnamed the Elder, expulsed these Danes, and ioyned that Kingdome a Prouince to the West-Saxons, after it had stood three hundred fifty three yeeres.

CHAPTER XII.

NOw as we haue ſpoken of euery ſeuerall Saxon King, that attained vnto, and held poſſeſſion of any part in the Eaſt & South of this Iland, vntill ſuch time as their Crownes were worne by their Conquerors, and the ſeuenfold diuided Heptarchy, vnited into an abſolute Monarchy: ſo by order of Hiſtory it is required, that their oppoſers (the Britaines) ſo long as they kept their ground, & ſtood in defence of their owne rightful inheritance, ſhould be ſhewed: who with a great diſdaine, and valorous reſiſtance, vnder-went the yoake of the Saxons ſubiections, as their ancient Anceſtors had endeauored to cleere themſelues from the chaines of the Romans captiuity. And vntill God and deſtiny withdrew from them the hand of defence, they mated the Saxons in all their deſignes. For albeit that the Romans had robbed the land of her ſtrength, and the aſpired Vortigern, called in theſe Strangers for his defence: yet their purpoſes being wiſely perceiued, the preuention thereof was preſently practized, and eargerly purſued, whileſt the pillars (that ſupported the frame of their gouernment) ſtood vpon their owne Baſes. But the ground-worke failing, and thoſe props not many, the waight of all fell vpon ſome few, whoſe acts and manly reſiſtance (Chriſt aſſiſting) ſhall further bee related, as time ſhall bring them to the yeeres of their aduentures, and carry our Hiſtory thorow the affaires of their times. Meane while, as we haue recorded the names of their Anceſtors, and worthy forerunners, the reſiſters of the Romanes: ſo now if you pleaſe, behold the Catalogue of their Kings, from the foreſaid Vortigern (the firſt ſubdued by theſe Saxons) vnto Cadwallader the laſt of thoſe Britiſh Princes; who left to them his Land, and went himſelf to Rome: whoſe times & ſtories, according to thoſe Guids that lead vs, we will declare, referring the credit therof to our Britiſh Hiſtorians; againſt whom howſoeuer ſome exceptions are, and may be iuſtly taken; yet are they not altogether to be caſt off, in the affaires of theſe enſuing Princes, eſpecially Gyldas and Ninius, who liued in, and preſently after the times of thoſe reſiſters. Neither is it to bee doubted, but that many others there were of that Nation, no leſſe carefull for tranſferring the remembrance of their Anceſtors actions to poſterity, (no Nation liuing, being more zealouſly deuoted in that kinde,) though their writings haue in Times ruines beene buried, and their remembrances preſerued onely by perpetuity of traditions. And although wee haue ſhewed the ancient Coines of the Britaines, and obſerued a ſeries thorow the Romanes ſucceſſion: yet be not offended, that I leaue onely Blanks for theſe latter Princes; as alſo the firſt Saxons, wanting the Monies of their owne ſeuerall Mintes.

Such therfore as I haue found of any Kings ſtamp, raigning whileſt the land was deuided and enioied amongſt them, I haue in the margent of their remembrances affixed, with the Armes attributed to euery ſeuerall kingdome: and hence will obſerue the ſame order, without any inuention or fained inſcription: which howſoeuer wee want to furniſh their ſucceſſions, yet this I am ſure of, no Nation in Europe can ſhew the like, or can come to ſo true a ſeries of their Soueraignes Coines, as England is able at this day to doe.

A ſucceſſiue Series of Great Britaines Coines

VORTIGERN. I.

VOrtigern among the many moleſtatiõs of the Scots and Picts, was ordained ſupreme Gouernor of theſe affaires; and to that end, with the Britaines full conſent was elected their King. For as touching that Monkiſh Conſtantine, the ſon of Conſtantius, who is ſuppoſed to be the brother of Aldreonus, king of Litle Britaine in France, ſent for and made king by theſe Britaines, whoſe ſimplicity this Vortigern is ſaid to abuſe, and laſtly to cauſe his murther and death; I rather thinke the ſtory to be the ſame that happened aboue forty yeeres before, in the daies of Honorius the Emperor, whē Conſtantius among the other conſpirators was raiſed vpon a hopefull expectation conceiued of his name.

This Conſtantius indeed had a ſonne that bare his name, a man of a ſoft ſpirit, and no deepe reach, and therefore in his youth was made a Monke. But his father riſen to his aſpiring honour, created him firſt his Ceſar, and next Auguſtus, till Fortune turned thoſe ſmiles into frownes, and ſtained their purple robes in both their own blouds. For not only the ſame names induceth this doubt, but the place, which was Winchester; and the Abbey Amphibilus, where this Imperiall Monke was ſhorne, doth not a little confirme the ſame: the remaines of which Colledge, by that ſtrong and thicke wall ſtanding to this day at the Weſt gate of that Cathedrall Church, doth not a little confirme. But wanting better directions to our proceedings, we muſt follow for theſe times men of later yeeres, and not without ſome ſuſpect of vncertainty. The rather, for that the Saxons as then the chiefe Actors in this Land, haue purpoſely concealed all Victors and Victories againſt themſelues, neither but ſparingly haue recorded their owne.

Saxons haue concealed all victories againſt themſelues.

This Vortigern, howſoeuer attaining the Crowne, was ouer-awed (ſaith Ninius) by the Picts & Scots, ſtood in feare of the Roman forces, dreading much the returne of Aurelius Ambroſius, with his brother Vter, ſurnamed Pendragon: and therefore wanting ſtrength of his owne to maintaine his ſtanding, ſent for the Saxons, as wee haue ſaid. He (ſaith the Britiſh Story) was Earle of Cornwall, of an houourable Family and noble deſcent, his Lady euery way anſwerable to both; by whom hee had three ſonnes, Vortimer, Catigern, and Paſcentius. His ſecond wife, or rather Concubine, (hauing caſt off this firſt) was Rowena, the daughter of Hengiſt, which Pagan mariage prooued not only the bane of the Land, but ſo ruinated the Church of Chriſtianity, that a Prouinciall Councell of the Britaines was aſſembled in Ann. 470. to repaire thoſe things that this mariage had decaied.

By this Heathen Damoſell he had a daughter, who (againſt the law of God & Nature) was his third wife, that kings (as he pretended, to excuſe his inceſt) might be deſcended from the right iſſue of Kings; vpon whom he begot his ſad lamenting ſonne Fauſtus, a vertuous Impe of thoſe impious parents, that ſpent his life in a ſolitary place neere to the Riuer Llynterrenny, as wee haue ſaid; who abandoning the company of men, among thoſe mountaines ſerued God in continuall teares and praiers, for remiſſion of the fault committed in his inceſtuous generation, for the recalling of his parents to a better life, and for the reſtitution of his Country to her former liberty.

His third wife was his owne daughter.

Fauſtus the ſonne of Vortigerne by his third wife.

This Vortigern raigned firſt ſixteene yeeres, and then depoſed for his fauors to the Saxons, was retained in durance all the raigne of Vortimer his ſonne, after whoſe death he was reeſtabliſhed: but oppreſſed by his Saxons, & purſued by Aurelius, withdrew himſelfe into Wales, & among thoſe vaſt mountains built a Caſtle by Merlins direction, wherof we haue ſpoken, and more we would ſpeake, were thoſe fantaſticke fictions vnderſet with any props of likelihood or truth, which Rand. of Cheſter in his daies vtterly reiected.

VORTIMER. 2.

12. An. Do. 452. Vortimer the ſecond reſiſter of the Saxons.

Vortimer how long he maintained warre againſt the Saxons. Foure chiefe battles, and the ſucceſſe of the firſt.

Vortimer, the eldeſt ſon of king Vortigern, through the abuſe of his fathers gouernment, for which he was depoſed by his owne ſubiects, was erected King of the Britaines the yeere from Chriſts birth 454. a man of great valour, which altogether he imploied for the redreſſe of his Country, according to the teſtimony of William Malmesbury. Vortimer (ſaith hee) thinking it not good to diſſemble the matter, for that hee ſaw himſelfe and Country daily ſurpriſed by the craft of the Engliſh, ſet his full purpoſe to driue them out, and from the ſeuenth yeere after their firſt entrance, for twenty yeeres continuance fought many Battles with them, and foure of them with great puiſſance in open field; in the firſt whereof, they departed with like fortune, and loſſe of the Generals brethren, Horſa and Catigern: in the other three the Britaines went away with victory, and ſo long vntill Vortimer was taken away by fatall death.

Huntington, Monmouth, Randulphus, and Fabian, name both the places and ſucceſſe of thoſe Battles: The firſt was in Kent, and vpon the Plaine nere vnto Ailsford, where the memoriall of Catigern to this day remaineth; & Horſted doth as yet reliſh of Horſa there interred. The ſecond Battle was, fought likewiſe in Kent at Crocanford (now Craford) where many periſhed as well Britaines as Saxons. The third was at Wepped Fleet, with great loſſe to the Britaines: and the fourth vpon Calmore, where many of the Saxons, after long and ſore fight were ſlaine, and more drowned in flight, and laſtly driuen into the Ile of Thanet, their firſt first assigned habitation (if not ouer the Seas) so that small hope rested for them so long as this valiant Vortimer liued, who had now dispossessed them of all their footing in the Continent, and often assailed them in the Ile of Thannet likewise, as Fabian confidently affirmeth.

Vortimer made away by Rowena.

But destiny going forward for the downfall of Britaine, remooued these rubbes out of her way: for Rowena, the mother of the Britaines mischiefe, and the maintainer of the Saxons residence, found the meanes to make this worthy Vortimer away, and by poison caused the end of his life, after hee had valiantly raigned the space of foure yeeres: all which time, by the testimony of an old Chronicle that Fabian had seene, Vortigern the father remained in durance, and vnder assigned Keepers in the City Caerlegeon, now Chester, and so demeaned himselfe towards his sonne (then his Soueraigne) in dutifull obedience and faithfull counsell, that hee wonne againe the hearts of the Britaines, and was againe re-established their King.

It is recorded by Ninius, that Vortimer after his last victory ouer the Saxons, caused his Monument to be erected at the entrance into Tanet, euen in the same place of that great ouerthrow, which by the said Author is called Lapis Tituli, of vs the Stoner, where for certaine it seemes hath been an hauen. In this Monument he commanded his body to be buried, to the further terror of the Saxons, that in beholding this his Trophey, their spirits might be daunted at the remembrance of their great ouerthrow. As Scipio Africanus conceited the like, who commanded his Sepulcher to be so set, that it might ouerlooke Africa, supposing that his very Tombe would be a terror to the Carthaginians. But how that desire of Vortimer was performed, I finde not, but rather the contrary: for an old Manuscript I haue, that cõfidently affirmeth him to be buried in London: yet others from Ninius the disciple of Eluodugus, hold the place to bee Lincolne. But howsoeuer his graue is forgotten, yet let this be remembred, that Sigebertus hath written of him, that After hee had vanquished the Saxons (saith hee) whose drift was not onely to ouer-runne the Land with violence, but also to erect their owne Lawes without clemency, he restored the Christian Religion then sorely decaied, and new built the Churches that those enemies had destroied,

AVRELIVS AMBROSIVS. 3.

3. An. Do. 466. The third resister of the Saxons.

A Aurelius Ambrosius, verily descended of that Constantine who in the fourth Consulship of Theodosius the younger, was elected here in Britain, only in hope of his lucky name, succeeded Vortigern the Father in the Gouernment of Britaine, and Vortimer the sonne, in affection and defence of his Country. Hee with Vter (saith Geffrey Monmouth) when their brother Constantine was murthered by Vortigern, fled into France, where they remained the yeeres of his first raigne; whose returne (as we haue heard from Ninius) he greatly feared, & whose force at the last he felt to his smart. For hauing againe resumed his Crowne, he liued in his old sinnes, and suffered the Saxons to be Lords of his Land: to preuent which (saith Beda from Gildas) the Britaines by little and little beganne to take strength, and with some courage to come forth of their Caues, who with one vniforme consent, called to God for his heauenly helpe. They had (saith he) for their Captaine a Roman called Ambrosius Aurelianus, a gentle natured man, which onely of all the bloud of the Romans remained then aliue, his parents being slaine, which bore the name of King of the Country. This man being their Leader, prouoked the Victors to the fight, and through Gods assistance atchieued the victory. From that day forward now the Britaines, now the Saxons did preuaile, vntill the yeere that Bathe was besieged, which was forty foure yeeres after their first comming into the Iland.

Galfrid Mon.

Beda hist. Ang. lib. 1. cap. 16.

His first expedition (as our British Historians report) was against Vortigern, and his Castle in Wales, wherein that incestuous King was consumed to ashes by lightning from heauen, as we haue said: and then following the Saxons, made toward Yorke, & at Maesbel beyond Humber, encountring Hengist, became his Victor: vnto whose mercy (say they) his sonne Occa yeelded himselfe, and obtained in free gift the Country Galloway in Scotland for him and his Saxons. But these his affaires thus prospering against the common Enemy, was enuied at by Pascentius, the youngest son of King Vortigern, who not able either to mate the Saxons, or after his Brethrens deaths to recouer the Kingdome to himselfe, ambitiously sought to prefer his base humor before the recouery of his Countries liberty, which then lay gored in her owne bloud. For hauing gotten the aid of Gillamare King of Ireland, whither hee had fled vpon the death of his Father, and now returned into the West of Wales, first indammaged the City of S. Dauids, and thence proceeded with fire and sword. Aurelius then sicke in the City of Winchester, sent his brother Vter to withstand his force, who slew both Pascentius and the Irish King his partaker, in a set & sore battell fought betwixt them. But before this battell, Pascentius had sent a Saxon, whose name was Eopa, in shew a Britaine, and in habit a Physitian, to minister poison in stead of physicke, which accordingly was effected with Ambrosius his death.

manner and forme in our draught of Wiltſhire wee haue inſerted. The matter being Stones of a great and huge bigneſſe, ſo that ſome of them containe twelue tunne in waight, and twenty eight foote or more in length, their breadth ſeuen, and compaſſe ſixteene. Theſe are ſet in the ground of a good depth; and ſtand in a round circle by two and two, hauing a third ſtone ſomewhat of leſſe quantity laid gate-wiſe ouerthwart on their toppes, faſtned with tenons and mortaiſes, the one into the other; which to ſome ſeeme ſo dangerous, as they may not ſafely be paſſed vnder, the rather for that many of them are fallen downe, and the reſt ſuſpected of no ſure foundation: notwithſtanding, at my being there, I neither ſaw cauſe of ſuch feare, nor vncertainty in accounting of their numbers; as is ſaid to be. The ſtones are gray, but not marbled, wherein great holes are beaten euen by force of weather, that ſerue for Rauens and other birds to build in, and bring foorth their young. The ground-plot containeth about three hundred foot in compaſſe, in forme almoſt round, or rather like vnto a horſe-ſhooe, with an entrance in vpon the eaſt-ſide. Three rowes of ſtones ſeeme formerly to haue beene pitched, the largeſt outwards, and the leaſt inwards; many whereof are now fallen downe: but thoſe that ſtand, ſhew ſo faire an aſpect, & that ſo farre off, that they ſeeme to the beholders to bee ſome Fortreſſe or ſtrong Caſtle. A Trench alſo is about them, which hath beene much deeper: and vpon the plaines adioining, many round copped hilles without any ſuch trench, (as it were caſt vp out of the earth) ſtand like great hay-cocks in a plaine meadow. In theſe, and thereabouts, by digging haue beene found peces of ancient faſhioned armour, with the bones of men, whoſe bodies were thus couered with earth that was brought thither by their welwillers and friends, euen in their head-peeces; a token of loue that then was vſed, as ſome imagine.

Ancient faſhioned Armor found at Stonhenge.

This Trophey, Aurelius Ambroſius (in memoriall of the Britaines maſſacre) erected, and is worthily accounted for one of the Wonders of this Iland, & are in the verſes of Alexander Necham called The Giants Daunce; wherein this Ambroſius was interred after hee had raigned thirty two yeeres, and wherof the towne Ambresbury beares the name. Others report, that the Britaines erected this moſt ſtately Sepulcher ouer the body of Ambroſius there ſlaine by the ſword of his enemies; that his Countries loue, in ſuch a coſtly peece of worke, might remaine vnto poſterities in this, the Altar of his vertue and manhood: for Paulus Diaconus ſaith, that this man, in ſuccouring his decaied Countrie, tooke vpon him the imperiall Robe, and againſt the violent rage of thoſe German enemies, oft times ouerthrew their puiſſant armies, but was laſtly ſlaine by them vpon the plaines of Salesbury. I cannot with ſilence let paſſe the ridiculous reports of the bringing of the Stones out of Africke into Ireland, and from thence, vnder the conduct of Vter the brother of Ambroſius, vnto this Plain, by the induſtrious meanes of Merlin, ſurnamed Ambroſe, borne in the ancient City Merdhyn, and as Humfrey Lhnyd ſaith, of a noble virgin, whoſe father, for his skill in the Mathematicks, and wonderfull knowledge in all other kinde of learning, was by the rude common people reputed to be the ſonne of an Incubus, or a male Diuell, which in the ſimilitude and likeneſſe of men doe vſe carnally to company with women. But how this may agree with his diuine mouth, who telles vs that Spirits haue neither fleſh nor bones; and the whole Scriptures, that man is carnally begotten, conceiued and born, I leaue for others further to diſpute. Onely I know, that ſuch begettings as Merlines is reported to bee, without father, and Simon Magus alſo, that before him would needs be the ſonne of a Virgin, doe not a little contradict our Chriſtian Profeſſion, who acknowledge onely the conception of Chriſt, to be conceiued without the ſeed of man, or of ſinne. But to our purpoſe: Ambroſius Aurelius (by Panuinius accounted the laſt Emperour of the Britiſh bloud) is ſaid to raigne in Britaine thirty two yeeres, and to die in that of Chriſts Incarnation foure hundred ninety ſeuen.

VTER PENDRAGON. 4.

An. Do. 498.

Mat. Weſtminſter.

Hect. Boetius.

Vter, ſurnamed Pendragon, the brother of Ambroſius, ſucceeded him both in valour, & in the Gouernment of Britaine. His entrance was with troubles againſt the Saxons, who vnder the leading of Eske and Octa, the ſonnes of King Hengiſt, had paſſed with ſpoile to the City Yorke, whither this new-made Generall preſently repaired; and giuing them battell, with the diſcomfiture of their whole Army, tooke both the brethren priſoners, and committed them to ſafe cuſtody.

But the Britaines (ſaith Boetius) becomming diſloiall to their Prince, ſeldome aſsiſted him with preuenting counſell: and the Prince enamored vpon the Duke of Cornwals Wife, conſulted more with Merline to transforme himſelfe from himſelfe, then to giue direction againſt the common enemy. For comming to Tindagell Caſtle in Cornwal, poſſeſſed by Gorlois, Duke of that prouince, beheld (in his eye) the paragon of Nature, which was lady Igren, his Dutches and wife. Vter, whoſe thoughts till then had bin free, and from his child hood had euer followed Mars in the field, was now ſurpriſed ſo far with her loue, that his Shield and Armes were both neglected and vnworne, & all his thoughts ſet on worke to purchaſe his moſt wiſhed deſire; which laſtly, by Merline & Magick was effected, and that after this manner (if we will will beleeue him of Monmouth, who is the reporter.) His ſuites & hopes failing (ſaith hee) to win her vnto diſhonor, Merline altogether new-moulded the ſhape of King Vter, and printed in his face the feature of Gorlois her owne Lord, by which meanes, and without ſuſpect the King diſhonourably violated this Ladies chaſtity, in which Bed of deceit, the famous Arthur was begot. The captiue Captaines Eske and Octa in theſe looſe times of his loue, gat looſe from their Keepers, and with their ratling armour rouſed Vter from this wanton Lullaby: who with troopes of ſtrength, and trumpets of defiance, met theſe Saxons face to face in the field, where betwixt them was fought a moſt bloudy battell, and that euen almoſt to the laſt ſtroke; and wherein, if fatall deſtinie had withdrawne her hand, the Iland had been rid of theſe Intruders for euer. For therein (ſay our Authours) the Saxons periſhed by the Britaines ſwords; vpon whoſe points alſo Eske and Octa paid their eſcapes with the loſſe of their liues. This field was at Verolam, whither Vter ſicke, and in his Horſe-litter, was borne among his Army, and after long and ſore ſiege, wonne from them that City. Finally, when this King had raigned the ſpace of eighteene yeeres, he died by poiſon put into a wel, whereof vſually he dranke, and was buried at Stonhenge with his brother Ambroſius.

An Ancient Manuſcript.

Of his ſurname Pendragon, theſe ſuppoſals are made. At his natiuity (ſay ſome) appeared a fierie Comet, in ſome part reſembling a Dragons Head: whereupon that great reputed Prophet Merline, attributed this heauenly Meteor vnto this Princely new-borne Babe, and gaue him the name of Vter-pendragon. Others for his ſerpentine wiſedom, deriue the ſurname of this Sepents Head, who like vnto that of Dan, bit the horſe heeles, ſo that the riders fell backward. For in all his warres againſt the Saxons, hee was moſt fortunate and victorious, with their great ouerthrowes. But others will haue him ſo named from his Royall Banner, borne euer before him, wherein was portraied a Dragon with a Golden Head; of which Standard ſince, neighbour Nations haue had good experience, and in far Country it hath been diſplaied in the cauſe of Chriſtianity, to the terror of the Pagans, as in Syria by that inuincible Engliſh King, Richard the firſt ſurnamed Cur-de-lion; in Scotland & Wales by that conquering Prince Edward the firſt, and the ſame as yet is in field borne for an Imperiall Standard in our Engliſh Campes.

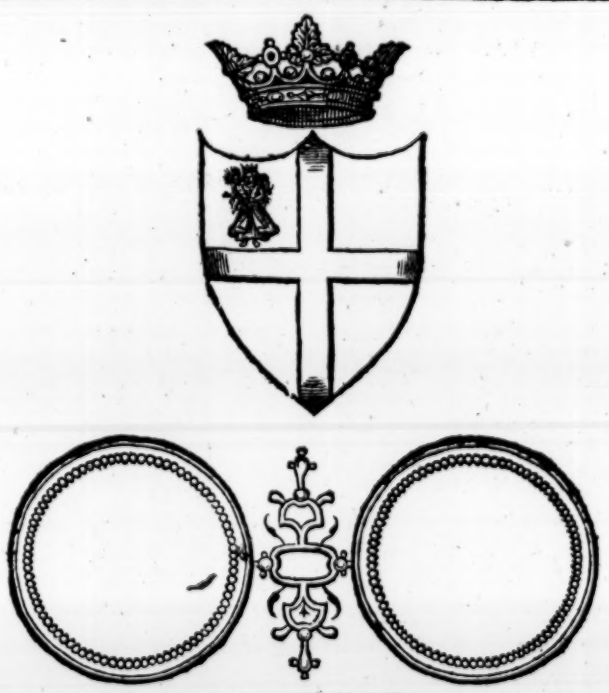
KING ARTHVR. 5.



5. An. Do. 516.

Arthur the ſonne of Vter, begotten as is ſaid of Ladie Igren Dutcheſſe of Cornwall, was crowned King at fifteene yeeeres of age; about the yeere of Chriſt fiue hundred and ſixteene; or as Mathew of Weſtminſter hath it, fiue hundred and eighteene. His proſperous entrance was enuied at by Lotho King of the Picts, and by Gouran King of the Scots, who had married his owne Aunts, Anna and Alda, the two ſiſters of Ambroſe and Vter, each of them expecting the Crowne before him, through the opinion and repute of his baſtardy; eſpecially Lotho, who had iſſue by Anna, Mordrad, and Gawan: the latter of which ſpent his life in the cauſe of that quarrell. His firſt proceedings were againſt the common enemie the Saxons, whoſe Captaine Colgerne, he chaſed from Northumberland into Yorke, which City likewiſe he girt with a ſtrait ſiege, notwithſtanding Colgerne thence eſcaped into Germany, and of King Cherdike got ſuccour for his Saxons, who with ſeuen hundred ſaile arriued in Scotland. Arthur aduertiſed of his great power, raiſed his ſiege, and drew towards London, and thence ſent for aid to his Nephew Howell, King of Little Britaine in France, who came himſelfe in perſon to ioyne with his Vncle.

Matth. Weſtm.

Theſe from South-hampton marched to Lincolne, which City Cherdik had ſtrongly beſieged, but was thence forced by Arthurs cõquering ſword. Twelue battles he fought againſt theſe Saxons (as Ninius recordeth) with great manhood and victory, The firſt was at the mouth of the Riuer Gleyne: the ſecond, third, fourth, and fifth, vpon the Banks of Douglaſſe, in the County of Lineux: the ſixth vpon the Riuer Baſſus; the ſeuenth in the wood Calidon; the eighth neere to the Caſtle Guynien, the ninth in Wales, at the Towne Cairlien: the tenth at Trachenrith, or Rithowode vpon the Sea ſide: the eleuenth vpon a hill named Agned Cathergonien; and the twelth at Bathe, or Bathen-hill, where the Britaines (as Beda ſaith) gaue the Saxons a very great ouerthrow; which (by Gyldas report) happened forty foure yeeres after the Saxons firſt arriuage into Britaine, the yeere wherein himſelfe was borne.

Beda hiſt. Angl. lib. 1. cap. 16.

Of Arthurs ſucceſſe both at home and abroad, his great magnificence in Court and Country, his Banners, and foure Golden Swords borne before him, his Round Tables, and challenges of Martiall Honour, let Monmouth the Writer, Newbery the Reſiſter, and Leiland the Maintainer, be heard for me. But certaine it is (by the report of Malmesbury) that Arthur was a Prince more worthy to be aduanced by the truth of recorde in warrantable credit, then by fables ſcandalized with poeticall fictions and hyperbolicall falſhods. Whoſe Banner was ſo often ſpread for the cauſe of Chriſtianity, and defence of his Country, being the only proppe that vpheld the ſame. And lamentable it is, that the fame of this puiſſant Prince had not beene ſounded by a more certaine Trumpet: for to ſay the truth of his Writer euen in a word, he was well skilled in Antiquities of tradition; but but as it seemeth, not any of ancient credit, so many toies and tales he euery where interlaceth out of his owne braine, wherewith he was charged while himself liued, insomuch as he is now ranged among those writers whom the Roman Church hath censured to be forbidden.

This hurt therefore those our zealous Monkes haue done to the Subiect whereof they wrote, that through an ouer-much conceited opinion, with the vertue and fame of the person, they haue mingled such matters as may iustly be reiected, whereby their worths are not only depriued of their truly-deserued honours, but which more is, euen their persons suspected to be nought else but fictions, as Hercules in Ouid, or Hector in Homer. And so hath Geffrey done by this most worthy Prince Arthur, whose warres against the Saxõs for defence of this Iland, he hath enlarged with the Conquests of other kingdomes and Countries, wherein he neuer came: which hath made not onely his Acts to be doubted of, but euen his person to be called in question, whether any such Arthur euer ruled in Britaine. Yet with better regard to the Recorders of his spreading fame, we grant both the man, and many honourably parts in him, though not in the like manner as they haue laid them downe: Neither are we straied so far ftom the steps of credulitie, that we can beleeue no more then we see; or that seeing, bee fore-stalled with a preiudicate opinion: for though we consent not to the fables of Homer, neither to the inuentions that Euripides and Sophocles made vpon the Battles of Troy, yet we deny not but that there were Warres and Battles at Troy, wherein many martiall acts vndoubtedly were performed: neither doubt wee of his person, as Seneca seemeth to doe of Iupiters, but acknowledge it with reuerence for truth, yet with this reseruation, that all is not Gospell which is written in Greeke. And had there not beene a truth of things whereupon Poets made their fables, there had beene at this day no fables of Poets in the world. And as Geffrey wondreth, that neither Gyldas nor Beda doe mention Arthur nor his great deeds, so, saith Randulphus, may we at Geffry, that hath augmented them aboue the pitch of credulity. But for the truth of this Prince, besides a Charter exemplified vnder the seale of King Edward the Third, wherin mention is made of King Arthur, to haue beene a great Benefactor to the Abbey of Glastenbury, who as Iohn Rouse reporteth, had giuen Bren-March and other Demaines, to the value of fiue hundred Markes yeerly, to the said Monastery. His Armes (being an Escocheon, whereon a crosse with the Virgin Mary bearing Christ in her armes) cut in stone, and standing ouer the first gate of entrance as yet, is said to be the Armes of that Abbey. And Ioseph, the iudicious Monke of Exceter, who followed King Richard the first in his warre for the Conquest of the Holy Land, in his poeticall verses extolleth Arthur with Alexander, Cæsar, and Hercules; yea and Ninius, farre his ancient, calleth Arthur an Iron Mall, that both bruised and brake the Lions iawes asunder.

Therefore of his person we make no doubt, though his acts haue beene written with too lauish a pen; neither consent we with those Historians that naturalize him for a Britaine, seeing thar Ninius, Beda, Malmesbury, and himselfe seeme to speake the contrary: for Ambrosius being the brother of Vter Pendragon, as we already from Beda haue shewed, was a Captaine descended from the bloud of the Romans, whose parents saith Ninius, had worne the Purple Robe, and both of them the sonnes of Constantine, whose father in Britaine against Honorius the Emperour had put on the said Robe. And by his naturall descent from the Romans, Arthur not only denied them Tribute, but also threatned to haue a Tribute from Rome: for in his Letters to that end sent vnto the Senate, thus in an old Manuscript we find it indited: Vnderstand among you of Rome, that I am King Arthur of Britaine, and freely it hold and shall hold; and at Rome hastily will I bee, not to giue you truage, but to haue truage of you: for Constantine that was Helens sonne, and other of mine Ancestors, conquered Rome, and thereof were Emperours, and that they had and held I shall haue yourz Goddis grace. Whereby is manifest his bloud was from the Romans. Let not therefore any of our Britaines take exceptions against me for this; neither that I enlarge not his fame, by the enlargement of his Empire in Russia, Lapland and in making Norway his Chamber of Britaine, as if that Kingdome and Title should be giuen him by the Pope, that indeed cuts large thongs out of other mens Leather: his Conquests of thirty kingdomes, and killing of Denabus the huge Spanish Giant, & his combat with Frolo Gouernor of France, and with Lucius Iberus the Roman Legate, whose slaine body he sent to the Senate for the tribute of Britaine by them demanded: seeing that others before mee, farre more ripe Historians, haue made both doubts and obiections against them. And therefore I conclude with this Arthur, as Saint Augustine with the Athenians, Whose men (saith hee) were euer greater in fame then in deeds. And with Ninius will end with his saying; Arthurus pugnabat contra illos in diebus illis, & licet multi ipso nobiliores essent, ipse tamen duodecies Dux belli fuit, Victorque bellorum: Arthur made warre against them in those daies, and though many were more noble then he, yet was hee twelue times Generall in the Field, and returned Conquerour. But more constant is the memory of his death, and place of his buriall, both which are reported vpon warrantable credite: for Mordred the sonne of Lotho, whereof we haue spoken, affecting the Crown, vpon a pretence of right from King Vter, and supposed bastardise of Arthur, gaue many attempts, through the aid of his Picts, and assistance of the Saxons, to dispossesse him of that wherein he was seated: and lastly at * Kambulan or Cambula in Cornwall (saith Leiland) this British Hector encountring Mordred, slew him out-right, and receiued of him his owne deaths wounds. The witnesse of this Field as yet are those peeces of Armour, horse-harnesse, and other habiliments of Warre, which are daily digged vp in tillage of the ground; vnlesse those reliques of battle be the seales of that fight which Marianus writeth to haue beene in this place betwixt the Britaines and Saxons, in the yeere of our Lord eight hundred and twenty.

If then it bee true that Arthur heere died, this place we may say seemeth to be consecrated vnto Mars: for Tindagell Castle, standing hard by, first brought into the world this glorious Prince, for one of her nine Worthies; and Cambula againe receiued his last bloud. But from this place he was carried vnto Glastenburie in Somerset-shire, where he died the one and twentith of May, in the yeere of our Saluation fiue hundred forty and two, after he had most victoriously raigned twenty six yeeres. His body was there buried, and six hundred yeeres after was taken vp, and found vpon this occasion: When Henry the second, and first Plantagenet, had swaied the English Scepter to the last of his raigne, it chanced him at Penbrooke to heare sung to the Harpe certaine Ditties of the worthy exploits & acts of this Arthur, (by a Welsh Bard, as they were termed, whose custome was to record and sing at their Feasts the noble deeds of their Ancestors) wherein mention waas made of his death, and place of buriall, designing it to be in the Church-yard of Glastenbury, and that betwixt two Pyramides therein standing: wherupon King Henry caused the ground to be digged, and at seuen foot depth was found a huge broad stone, wherein a leaden Crosse was fastned, and in that side that lay downward, in rude and barbarous letters (as rudely set and contriued) this inscription written vpon that side of the Lead that was towards the stone:

HIC IACET SEPVLTVS REX ARTVRIVS IN INSVLA AVALONIA.

Heere lieth King Arthur buried in the Ile of Aualonia.

And digging nine foot deeper, his body was found in the trunke of a Tree, the bones of great bignesse, and in his scull perceiued ten wounds, the last very great, and plainely seene. His Queene Gueneuer, that had beene neere kinswoman to Cador Duke of Cornwall, a Lady Wal. Conuen. Antiq. Glasten. Arthur the continuance of his raigne.

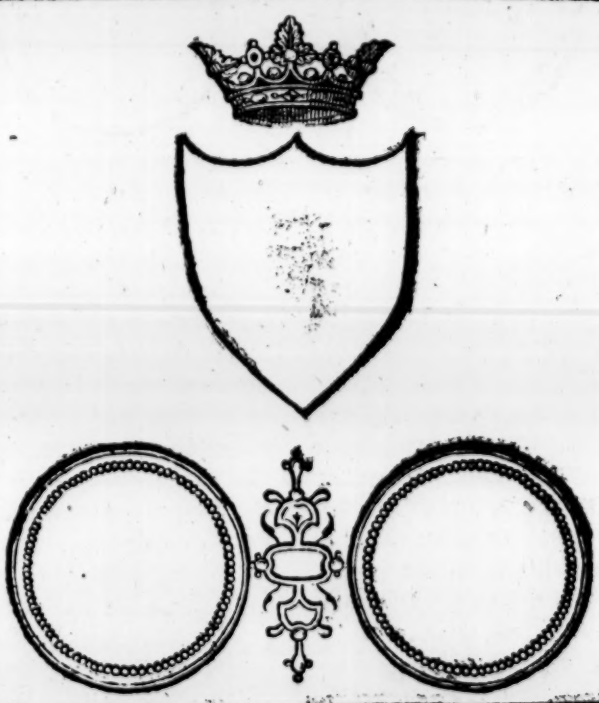
The like treſſes of haire my ſelfe ſaw in a coffin digged vp in an old houſe neere ...ulls in London, very beautifull in ſhew, but being touched, was nothing but duſt.

Lady of paſſing beauty, lay likewiſe by him, whoſe treſſes of haire finely platted, and in colour like the gold, ſeemed perfect and whole vntill it was touched, but then (bewraying what all beauties are,) ſhewed it ſelfe to be duſt. Giraldus Cambrenſis, a worthy Author and an eye-witneſſe, is the reporter of this finding of Arthurs bones. And the Croſſe of Lead, with the Inſcription, as it was found and taken off the ſtone, was kept in the Treaſury or Reueſter of Glaſtenbury Church, ſaith Stowe, till the ſuppreſſion thereof in the raigne of King Henry the eight, whoſe forme and rude letters we haue here expreſſed to thy ſight. Iohn Stow.

Arthurs bones intombed.

The bones of King Arthur, and of Queene Guinever his wife, by the direction of Henry de Bloys, Nephew to King Henry the ſecond, and Abbat of Glaſtenbury, at that preſent, were tranſlated into the great new Church, and there in a faire Tombe of Marble, his body was laid, and his Queenes at his feete; which noble Monument among the fatall ouerthrowes of infinite more, was altogether raced at the diſpoſe of ſome then in Commiſſion; whoſe too forward zeale, and ouer-haſty actions in theſe behalfes, hath left vnto vs a want of many truths, and cauſe to wiſh that ſome of their imployments had been better ſpent.

CONSTANTINE. 6.



An. Do. 542.

Hyst: booke.

Constantine the ſonne of Cador Duke of Cornwall, and coſin to King Arthur by his alliance in mariage, at his death was appointed by him to ſucceede in his Dominions, and moſt ioyfully receiued of the Commons, as the man, in the opinion of his worthy elector and themſelues, accounted moſt fit to defend the Land from the many oppreſſions of the Saxons, who now beganne to ſpreade the wing as farre as to Tyne in the North, and to ſet downe the limits of their ſeuerall Kingdomes; which notwithſtanding, theſe ſtrangers daily enlarged vpon the home-bred Inhabitants, the ciuill warres of the Britaines giuing way to the ſame; and that not onely among themſelues, but by the Picts alſo; in the behalfe of the two ſonnes of Mordred, that fought to diſpoſſeſſe him of his Crowne. In which quarrel many battles were fought, but with ſuch ſucceſſe to the attemptors, that theſe two Competitors were forced for refuge into London and Winchester- Cyldas. aber ſu. teſt.

chester, where taking Sanctuary in those Churches, neere vnto the Altar Constantine slew them: for which deede, the Priest Gyldas, that flourished in those daies, in his Inuective reprehensions, thus writeth: Britaine hath Kings, but they are Tyrants: Iudges it hath, but they are wicked, pilling and harming the innocent people; reuenging and defending, but whom? Such as be guilty and robbers. They haue many wiues, yet breake they wedlocke; many times swearing, yet periure themselues; vowing, but for the most part with dissembling lies; warring, but still maintaining vniust and ciuill broyles; abroad pursuing theeues, and yet at home cherish them, euen at their owne Tables, and sometimes also reward them. They giue large almes indeed, yet heape they vp sinnes high as the Mountaine. They sit in the Seat of sentence, yet seldome seeke the rule of right iudgement, despising the humble and innocent persons, and extolling vp to Heauen proud and bloudy Murtherers, Theeues, and Adulterers, yea, and if he woisld permit them, the very enemies of God. Many they keepe in prison, and load them with irons, more to serue their owne purposes, then for any guilt in the person, taking solemne Oathes before and vpon the Altars, and yet despise they the Altars, as altogether vile, and but filthy stones.

In his Booke De excidio Britan. Hum. Lluyd. Bre. Brit.

Of this hainous and wicked offence, Constantine the tyrannicall whelpe of the Lyoneſſe of Deuon-shire is not ignorant, who this yeere, after the receiuing of his dreadfull Oath, whereby he bound himselfe, that in no wise he should hurt his Subiects, (God first, and then his Oath, with the company of Saints, and his owne mother being present) did notwithstanding in the reuerend laps of both his Mothers, the Church, and her by nature, and that vnder the vesture of an holy Abbat, deuoure with sword and speare, in stead of teeth, the tender sides and the entrailes of two children of noble and Kingly race, and likewise of their two Gouernours, yea, and that (as I said) before the sacred Altars; the Armes of which persons so slaine, not stretched forth to defend themselues with weapons (which few in those dayes handled more valiantly then they) but stretched forth to God, and to his Altar, in the day of Iudgement shall set vp the reuerend ensignes of their patience and faith at the Gates of the City of Christ, which so haue couered the seate of the Celestiall Sacrifice, as it were with the red Mantle of their cluttered bloud.

These things he did not after any good deedes done by him deseruing praise: for many yeeres before ouercome with the often and changeable filths of adultery, and forsaking his lawfull wife (contrary to the Law of God) being not loosed from the snares of his former sinnes, he increaseth the new with the old. Thus farre Gyldas, for this time, and for the raigne of Constantine; whose life being no better, was cut off in battell by Aurelius Conanus, when he had raigned fully three yeeres, and without issue was buried at Stonhenge.

Constantines raignes continuance.

AVRELIVS CONANVS. 7.

7. An. Do. 545. Mat. Westminster.

Avrelius Conanus, the Nephew of King Arthur, after he had slaine his Cosen Constantine in battell, was made King ouer the Britaines, in the yeere after Christs Natiuity fiue hundred forty fiue. He was of disposition free and liberal, but therewithall of a light credit, and very suspicious, cherishing them that accused others, without respect of right or wrong, putting some to death, and retaining others in perpetuall prison, among whom his own vncle was one, whose two sons he caused to be slain, no cause obiected, but that these three were in truth betwixt him & the Crown: for which, and other the like impious parts, the said Gyldas continueth the tenor of his vehement reprehension in this manner. And thou Lyons whelpe (as speakes the Prophet) Aurelius Conanus, what dost thou? art thou not swallowed vp in the filthy mire of murthering thy Kinsmen, of committing fornications and adulteries, like to the others before mentioned, if not more deadly, as it were with the waues and surges of the drenching Seas, ouerwhelming thee with her vnmercifull rage? Dost thou not in hating the peace of thy Country, as a deadly Serpent, and thirsting after ciuill warres and spoiles (often times vniustly gotten) shut vp against thy soule the Gates of celestiall peace? Thou being left alone, as a withering tree in the middle of a field, call to remembrance (I pray thee) the vaine youthfull fantasie, and ouer timely deaths of thy Fathers and thy Brethren: shalt thou being set apart, and chosen forth of all thy lineage for thy godly deserts, be reserued to liue an hundred yeeres, or remaine on earth till thou be as olde as Methusela? Nothing lesse. And thus with exhortations for his amendment, turneth his speech to his Successor.

Gyldas.

The raigne of this King, among the vncertainties of other proceedings, is ranged by our owne Historians, as vncertainly. For some hold him to rule onely two yeeres, and no more, being then cut off by the iust reuenging hand of God for his sinnes: others allow three yeeres for his raigne, wherein, as they say, most viciously hee liued: and yet Matthew of Westminster will haue him continue in gouernement no lesse then thirty yeeres; and Iohn Stow addeth three more: such extremes are wee driuen vnto, that haue our relations onely from them.

VORTIPORVS. 8.

8. An.Do.578.

Vortiporus, after the death of Aurelius, ſucceeded him in the Kingdome of the Britaines, which then was much ſcantled by the intruſions of the Saxons, whom in many battels (as ſay the Britiſh Hiſtorians) he vanquiſhed, and valiantly defended his Land and Subiects, from the danger of them and of their Allies: notwithſtanding theſe reported actions thus honorably atchieued, yea and his Parentage with ſucceſſion of gouernment, may be both ſuſpected and iuſtly called in queſtion, as by the words of Gyldas is manifeſt; who ſuffered not this King alſo to paſſe vntouched in his Inuectiue and lamentable paſſions. And thou (ſaith he) Vortiporus the Tyrant of South-wales, like to the Panther in manners and wickedneſſe, diuerſly ſpotted, as it were with many colours, with thy hoary head in the Throne full of deceits, crafts, and wiles, and defiled euen from the loweſt part of thy body to the crowne of thy head, with diuers and ſundry murthers committed on thine owne kin, and filthy adulteries, thus prouing the vnworthy ſonne of a good King, as Manaſſes was to Ezechias; how chanceth it that the violent ſtreames of ſinnes, which thou ſwalloweſt vp like pleaſant wine, or rather art ſwallowed vp by them, (the end of thy life by little and little now drawing neere) cannot yet ſatisfie thee? What meaneſt thou, that with fornication, of all euils as it were the full heape, thine owne wife being put away, with her death, which thou wroughteſt, doſt oppreſſe thy ſoule with a certaine burthen that cannot be auoided?

Gyldas.

2 King. 20. 21.

By this teſtimony of Gyldas, this Vortiporus could not be the ſonne of bad Conan, as Geffrey Monmouth and Matthew of Weſtminſter affirme him: his Father being compared to godly Ezechias King of Iudah, and himſelfe continuing his gouernment, as is ſaid the ſpace of foure yeeres, ended his life without iſſue to ſucceed him.

MALGO CANONVS. 9.

9. An.Do.581: Mat. Weſtminſter.

Malgo Canonus, the Nephew of Aurelius Conanus, as ſome write, ſucceeded Vortiporus in the Kingdome of Britaine, a man of a moſt ſeemely preſence, but withall, charged with many vnbeſeeming and foule ſinnes, by ancient Gyldas, the onely recorder of the Actions in theſe times; who calleth him the Dragon of the Iles, greater in power then many, but exceeding all in miſchiefe and malice; a large giuer, but more lauiſh and prodigall in all ſinnes and licenciouſneſſe: in Armes and dominions more ſtrong, and greater then any other Britiſh Potentate; but ſtronger in the deſtruction of his owne ſoule, in committing the grand abhorred ſinne of Sodomie. In his youthfull dayes, with ſword and fire he brought to deſtruction his Vncle by the Mothers ſide (being then King) together with many others, and after vpon a ſhew-ſeeming remorſe of Conſcience, vowed the profeſſion and life of a Monke; but returned ſhortly after to his owne vomit, and became worſe then he was before: for deſpiſing his firſt mariage, hee became enamored vpon the wife of his brothers ſonne, whiles hee was liuing; and after that he had kept her a certaine time, murthered them both. In theſe ſinnes hee continued the terme of fiue yeeres, and dying without iſſue, left his Crowne to another.

Malgo Canonus, the continuance of his raigne.

By theſe reprehenſions of Gyldas it ſhould rather seeme that these Princes liued altogether at one and the same time, vnto whom he spake personally, and mouth to mouth, which could not be, if such successions and such yeeres had beene expired, as here is laid downe. And therefore not without cause some haue affirmed, that these Captaines vsurped authority together in diuers parts of the Iland, and not successiuely one after another; neither indeed as Kings, but rather Tyrants, polluted with these grieuous sinnes, as you haue heard, and are so termed by their own Historian, that bringeth * one more to tyrãnize, whom neither Monmouth nor he of Westminster hath spoken of, which is Cuneglasus, whom hee calleth a Lion tawney Butcher, a Beare, a Contemner of Religion, an Oppressour of the Clergy, that fought against God with his many grieuous sinnes, and warred vpon man with his martiall weapons. He (saith he) did put away his lawfull wife, prouoked the godly with many iniuries, was proudly conceited of his owne wisedome, and set his whole hope in vncertaine riches. If then the head was so sicke, could the body be sound, that as (Beda saith) were so set to breake all orders of truth and iustice, that scant any token or remembrance thereof remained? And for witnesse against them, called their owne Historian Gyldas, that accused them of many impieties, and this not the least, that those Britaines neglected the preaching of the Gospell to the Saxons.

Beda hist. Angl. lib. 1. cap. 22.

For these sinnes assuredly, God gaue their Land to another Nation, and themselues to exile, or to the swords of their enemies. Howsoeuer, some latter Britaine hath rather excused their sinnes by the ouer-rash zeale of Gyldas, whom he termeth a Pulpit-Priest (but no perfect Historian) that beat downe sinnes with an ouer-sharpe censure of the sinners, as the maner of many Preachers is at this day. But (saith he) let the true renowne of the Britaines appeare to the world: and surely so shall it doe for me. And againe I returne to my intended purpose.

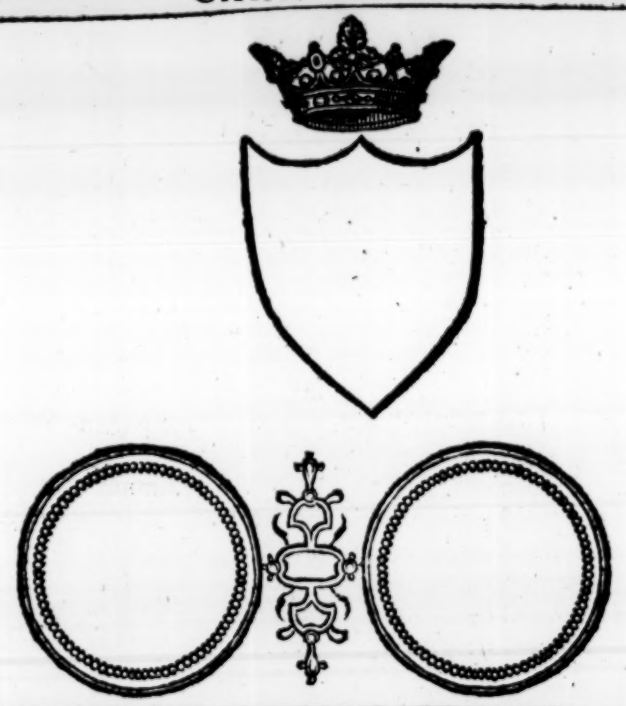
CARETICVS. 10.



10. An. Do. 586.

Careticus succeeded Malgo in the gouernment of Britaine, as destitute of vertue and fluent in vice, as any of these his preceding Kings: for it is recorded that he was a nourisher of dissensions, and sowed ciuill warres among his subiects; a sinne odible to God and Man, and vnto the vnconstant Britaines gaue occasion of his hatred: which when the Saxons perceiued, was further instigated, and with the assistance of Gurmund an Arch-pirate, and Captaine of the Norwegians, followed against the King; who not able to resist them, fled into the Towne of Chichester for safety, but by the deuice of his pursuers, certaine sparrowes being caught, and fire fastned to their feete, were let flie into the Towne; where lighting vpon straw and other matter fit for flaming, burnt in short space the whole City; and Careticus flying beyond Seuerne, secured himselfe among the Mountaines of Wales, wherein he died, after he had vnprosperously raigned three yeeres: and from that time foorth (saith Randulphus) the Britaines lost their whole Kingdome in the East part of the Iland, and were confined in the West by the Riuers Seuerne and Dee.

Ruler only of North-Wales, was made Gouernour of all thoſe parts; a man deſeruing well before he came to that eſtate, and being riſen, maintained himſelfe and ſubiects in great honour and peace. His firſt affaires againſt the Saxons, was to reuenge the deaths of his Britaines, and harmeleſſe Monkes of Bangor, ſlaine (as we haue ſaid) by wild Ethelfrid, the mighty king of Northumberland. Theſe in Field had aſſembled all their powers, wherein the fatall end either of the Britaines or Northumbrians muſt needs haue enſued, had not the quarrell beene ſtaied by the mediation of friends. Theſe Kings, then, and there reconciled, embraced peace, with ſuch true friendſhippe, that they continued amity together ſo long as they liued.

Harding ſaith, that this Britiſh king Cadwan, honorably receiued and worthily cheriſhed Acca, whom this King Ethelfrid had put from his bed, for the loue he bare vnto his Concubine; but is deceiued in making her the mother of Edwin, that was his ſiſter, and Cadwan to raigne but thirteen yeeres, wheras others allot him two and twenty-

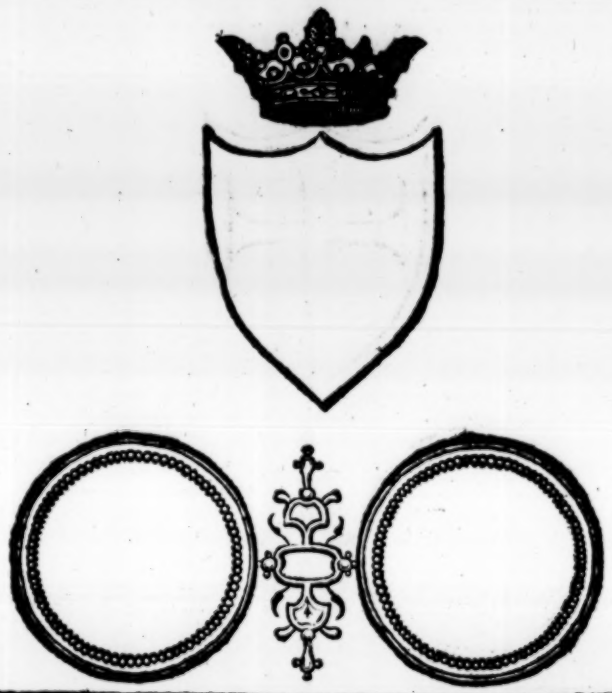
CADWALLO. 12.



12. An. Do. 635

Cadwallo or Cadwallin, the ſonne of Cadwan, was made King ouer the Britaines, the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation ſix hundred thirty fiue; Hee warred moſt ſtrongly againſt the Saxons, and either by Conqueſt or Alliance ioined amity with Penda the cruell King of the Mercians, a Pagan Idolater himſelfe, by the report of Beda, although a Chriſtian in name and profeſſion, yet in minde and manners ſo rude and outragious, that he ſpared neither womens weakneſſe nor childrens innocency, but put all to death with greeuous and bitter torments, to fulfill his cruell and vnmercifull tyranny, waſting a long time, and raging ouer the Prouinces, purpoſed to exterminate out of the borders of Britanny the whole Nation of the Engliſh, and to extinguiſh the very name of them. Neither did he ought eſteeme any reuerence or honour to the Chriſtian Religion, which thoſe men embraced: ſo that euen to this day (ſaith he) the Britaines cuſtome is to ſet light by the Faith or Religion of the Engliſhmen; neither will they communicate with them more then with Heathens or Pagans. Theſe two cruell Kings ſlew the moſt Chriſtian Edwyn King of Northumberland with his ſonne Prince Oſfride, in a great and bloudy battle at Hethfield, the yeere of Chriſts incarnation ſix hundred thirty three: and the yeere following, with wicked force (ſaith Beda) but with worthy vengeance, Cadwallo the Britaine ſlew Oſrike and Eanfrid, Kings of Deira and Bernicia, that were become Apoſtataes from their Chriſtian Faiths, and that with cruelty and loſſe of the Saxons, as their owne Hiſtorians held it fit neither to mention their names in their monethly Calendar, nor regiſter the yeere wherein they were ſlaine, in account of their gouernment, but aſſigned it vnto the raigne of their Succeſſour King Oſwald, which was ſo obſerued vnto his daies; ſo terrible was this worthy Cadwallo, and odious the remembrance of this vnfortunate Battle. But this curſed Captaine (ſaith he) enioied not this felicity long: for the ſaid Oſwald, to reuenge his brothers death, came with a ſmall power, but ſtrongly fenced in the faith of Chriſt, and neere to the Riuer Deniſe gaue him battle, wherein himſelfe and late-victorious Hoſt were all ſlaine and confounded.

Beda hiſt. Angl. lib. 2 cap. 20.

Beda hiſt. Angl. lib. 3 cap. 1.

But we muſt remember that Beda was a Saxon; in whoſe behalfe his penne hath ſomewhat paſſed the bounds of equitie (if not verity) in charging this moſt valiant Conqueror with tyranny, and his Martiall Sword with cruelty, that was drawne and ſtrucke in defence of his natiue Country, wherein the Saxons claime ſtood only vpon vniuſt intruſion. So likewiſe himſelfe being a Monke & Prieſt, hath euery where blamed the Britaines for diſſenting from the Roman Church, in celebration of Eaſter and other Ceremonies; whereas in doctrine they were as ſincere, which is the true ſubſtance of the Goſpell. But the Britaines record that this valiant Cadwallo died not in Hethfield, neither by the hand of King Oſwald, but that he raigned in great honor the ſpace of eight and forty yeeres, and in peace died 22. of Nouember, in the yere of Chriſt Ieſus ſix hundred ſeuenty ſeuen. His body the Britaines buried in S Martins, Church in London, neere Ludgate; whoſe image great and terrible, triumphantly riding on horſeback, being artificially caſt of Braſſe, they placed vpon the ſame Weſt gate, to the further feare and terror of the Saxons, as Vortimer before had commanded, his at Stonar. But this relation, as alſo that he married the ſiſter of king Penda, as my often named Manuſcript reporteth, I leaue to the beſt liking of my Reader.

Geffry Monm.

Cadwallo or Cadwan, the continuance of his raign

About this time the moſt blaſphemous doctrine of Mahomet began to infect all the Eaſterne World. For although himſelfe liued ſome nine yeeres before the gouernment of this Cadwallo, yet preſently after his death, his doctrine was more publikely imbraced. He was borne in Arabia, of a poore and baſe ſtocke, and being fatherleſſe, was ſold for a bondſlaue vnto an Iſmaelite, whoſe name was Abdemonaples, a man of exceeding great riches, & in great trade of merchandizing; and Mahomet for his ſubtilty in wit, was his fit inſtrument, and greatly in his fauor. The Maſter dying, left Mahomet his chiefe Factor, who hauing great riches in his keeping, married his Miſtris, and ſo became heire of all; with whom conſorted one Sergius a Monke, which for hereſie was fled into Arabia, who inſtructed Mahomet in the hereſie of the Neſtorians: and now for his wealth and Magicall Arts, wherewith hee bewitched the minds of the people, aſſumed assumed to himselfe the name of the great Prophet of God, and began to be famously publishly for the doctrine which he taught: the which was none other but a confused Chaos of all the heresies that had beene before him: for with the Sabellians he denied the Trinity; with the Maniches, he affirmed but two persons to be in the Deity; with Eunomius, he denied the equality of the Father and the Sonne; and with Macedone, taught that the Holy Ghost was a creature. He borrowed of the Iewes Circumcision, of the Nicholaitans, pluralitie of wiues; and of the Gentiles, much Superstition; and more to cloake his diuelish inuented fatasies, somewhat he tooke from the verity of the Gospel. Of these compounded, he deuised a law, and wrote this his religion in the booke called his Alcaron; and those his Professors he named Saracens, from Sara the wife of Abraham. An. Do. 62.

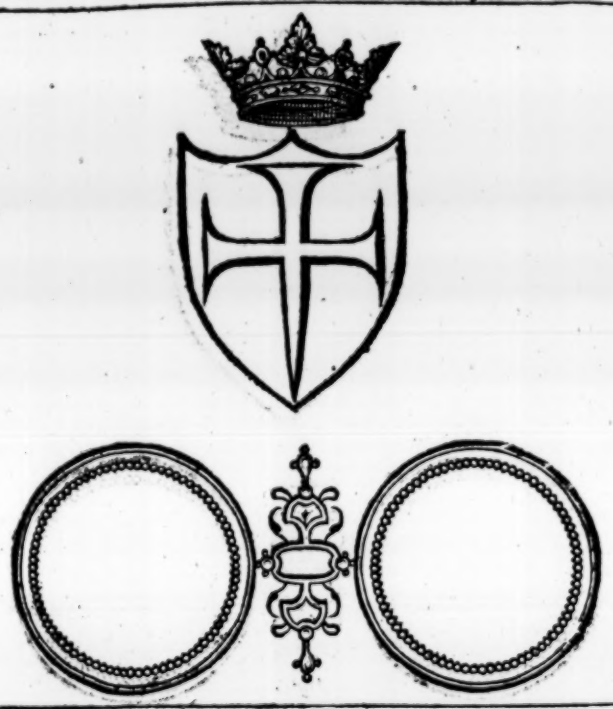
He died of the falling sickneſſe, which long time hee had dissembled, saying forsooth after his trances, that the Angel Gabriel had conference with him, the brightnesse of whose glory he could not behold.

CADWALLADER. 13.



13. An. Do, 685.

Geffry Moum.

Cadwallader, the sonne of Cadwallo, and last King of the Britaines, after the death of his Father, succeeded him in his dominions, and with great valour fought against the Saxons, as hee of Monmouth affirmeth, of whom heare him speake in his owne words. Cadwallader (saith he) raigning victoriously the time of twelue yeeres, fell lastly into a dangerous sickneſſe, with despaire of recouery and vnable to gouerne. Much debate & strife arose among his great Lords, & others of high estate, insomuch that they warred each against other to the no small annoiance and detriment of the whole Country. At which very time likewise, so great a dearth of corne and victuall raigned, that herbes and roots were the Commons chiefest sustenance: whose third calamity was mortality and pestilence, raigning so sore, and so suddenly, that in their eating, drinking, walking, and speaking, they were surprised with death, and in such number, that the liuing were scarce able to bury the dead; which miseries lasted no lesse then eleuen yeres continuance, whereby the Land became desolate, & brought forth no fruit at all, insomuch that the king and many of his Nobles were driuen to forsake their natiue Country, and to seeke releefe in forraine parts. Cadwallader repaired to the Court of Alan his cosen, the King of Litle Britaine in France, where he was honourably receiued and maintained.

But now the Angell of God sheathing his sword from slaughter, and the earth answering man againe with her former abundance, those Saxons that were escaped, sent for more of their Nation to their further supply; who repleniſhed the Cities, and manured the Country, at this day called Lhyoyger, containing all the Land that lay on the East of Seuerne and Dee, dispossessing the poore Britaines of their rightfull inheritance, and deuiding their Lands vnto their owne vse. Cadwallader hearing of their daily arriuage, and their vniust intrusion vpon his home-bred subiects, minded their redresse by his present returne, and to that end had wrought King Alan, for his succour & assistãce. But see how it chanced: He being now ready to imbarke his Host, and to hoise vp his sailes for Britaine, the silent night being much spent in praier & supplication, that God would prosper with good successe these his great affairs, behold an Angell appeared to him, or at leastwise to his seeming he heard a voice, that forbad him the enterprise, declaring that it was not Gods will that hee should vndergoe that Voiage, or that the Britaines should rule their Land any longer; but contrariwise bade hie him to Rome, and of Pope Sergius receiue the habit of Religion, wherein he should die, and rest in peace.

This dreame (for I hold it no other) being told vnto Alan, search was made into the Bookes of both the Merlines, as also into the speech of the Eagle at Shaftesbury, pronounced eight hundred and eighty yeeres before the birth of our Sauiour Christ (if we doe beleeue these to be true) wherein it was propheciedforsooth, that the Britaines should lose their kingdome, and that the same should be possessed of others, vntill the time that the bones of Cadwallader should be brought from Rome. By such toies and ilusions in those daies of darknesse, the euer-erring minds of men were content to be ledd; for not onely Cadwallader, a quiet and meeke-spirited man, was possessed with this conceit, that it came vnto him by a diuine prouidence, but also King Alan perswaded him to obey his Oracle; and thereupon preparing for his Pilgrimage, gaue ouer his expedition for Britaine, and left his distressed Subiects to bee ouer-runne by strangers, and the Land to be enioied by a forraine Nation: and receiuing the habit of seeming religion at the hands of Pope Sergius, died soone after in the yeere of our Lord six hundred eighty nine, and there was bured in S. Peters Church, being the last king of the Britaines bloud, that had held possession thereof the space of one thousand one hundred thirty and seuen yeeres before the Natiuity of Christ, and six hundred eighty eight yeres after his Birth, as the Chronicler of Wales, with other Britain writers, haue calculated, though (as is said) after the largest size: but howsoeuer, this sudden alteration was wrought in Cadwallader, yet whiles he continued a king in health: he raigned (saith Geffry) in great magnanimitie, the

But Beda, vnto whom more credit is heerein to be giuen, telles vs, that Lothaire was ſlaine by Edrik, his Nephew and Succeſſour, declaring the manner and day of his death; and that Ceadwall, a young man of the Weſt-Saxons bloud royall, being baniſhed from among them, fell vpon the South-Saxons, harrying the Country and killing their king. But afterwards lamenting the bloud he had ſpilt, whereat euen Nature her ſelfe ſeemed to be offended, in great repentance abandoned his kingdome, and pilgrim-like went vnto Rome, where of Pope Sergius he was baptized vpon Eaſter Euen, the yeere from Chriſts Natiuity ſix hundred eighty nine. The times thus agreeing, their names ſo neer, their deuotions alike, Sergius the ſame ghoſtly father to both, their ſepulchers in one & the ſame Church, doe ſtrongly confirme that they both were the ſame & one only man, as we formerly haue ſaid. But with this man Cadwallader, whereſouer he died, lay buried the laſt bloud of their kings, their gouernment, and immediatly the very Name of Britaine, for many hundred yeeres enſuing, as in the ſequell of this Hiſtory (Chriſt aſsiſting) ſhall bee ſhewed.

Engiſt, a Prince of the Engliſh-Saxons, hauing the Command ouer certaine forces planted in the low-countries of Germany, in the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation foure hundred and fifty, tranſported them ouer into Britaine, where the fifth yere after his arriuall, he began his kingdome in Kent; & hauing ſurpriſed his ſon in law king Vortigern, ſlain his Britaines, and ſeized into his poſſeſſion the beſt of the Iland, he laid the foundation of a Monarchy, and deſerueth to be reputed the firſt Monarch of the Engliſh Nation.

Floren. Wigorn.

(2) He (as all the Saxon Kings beſides) doth claime his originall from Prince Woden, and his wife Fria, by Wechta the eldeſt of their ſeuen ſonnes, being the fifth in iſſue from them; as thus: Himſelfe was the ſon of Withgils, who was the ſonne of Witha, and he the ſon of Wechta, the eldeſt ſonne of the Deified Woden.

Hengiſt, how long he raigned

This Prince held the ſupreme Scepter of this Iland for thirty foure yeeres continuance, and therein died honorably, ſaith Marianus Scotus. But Peter de Ikham, Polydore, and others ſay, that he was ſlaine in battell, or elſe taken by Edol, Earle of Gloceſter, and beheaded at Conesborow.

Mary. Scot. Peter Ikham.

His iſſue.

He left iſſue behind him two ſons and one daughter, whoſe names were Hatwaker, Eske, & Rowena.

Geffry Mon. Polydor Virgil.

(3) Hatwaker his eldeſt ſonne, is reported by Petrus Albinus of Wittenberg, a great Genealogiſt and Hiſtorio-

Petrus Albinus.

Historigrapher also) to be Duke of the Saxons in Germanie, and there left to gouerne the people at his Fathers departure for Britaine. And if Albinus authority be sufficient, he was the Father of Duke Hatwegat, and grandfather of Hilderik King of the Saxons, ancestor to the valiant Witikindus, the principall progenitor of the most noble Family of the Dukes of Saxony.

(4) Eske, the second sonne of King Hengist, came ouer with his Father into Britaine, and was his assistant in all his warres, wherein he gaue worthy testimony of his valour: whose Kingdome of Kent after his death he enioyed, and gaue name to that Countries Inhabitants, who were from him called Eskings, ouer whom he raigned peacably twenty yeeres.

Beda hist. Angl. lib. 3. cap. 8 Eske, how long he raigned.

(5) Rowena, the daughter of King Hengist, was borne in Germany before her Fathers departure, and afterwards sent for by him into Britaine, to further his designes. At whose surpassing beauty and feature Vortigern so viciously gazed, that he put from him his lawfull and louing wife, to inioy the pleasures of her Paganish bed, and to the great decay of Christianity and griefe of the Nobility, she became the Kings second wife, and the principall cause of the Lands destruction. By her he had a daughter, who contrary to all lawes either of God or man, was likewise his third wife; by whom he had issue Faustus, that as vertuously spent the daies of his life, as he was incestuously begot in that wicked bed.

This Rowena, whom some call Ronixa, by Vlitarpius is accounted the Neece, & not the Daughter of Hengist. But seeing his opinion is grounded vpon the youth of Hengist, as not sufficient in yeeres to haue a daughter so mariageable, I rather thinke and hold his bare testimony vnable to turne the great streame of other Writers out of their vsual course and receiued chanell.

ELLA THE FIRST KING OF THE SOVTH-SAXONS, AND SECOND MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

Ella Monar.

CHAPTER XIV.

An. Do. 581. Beda hist. lib. 4. cap. 5.

Ella a noble Saxon, being sent for by King Hengist, about the three and twentieth yeere of his raigne, brought a fresh supply of those Germans to the relief of his Countrymen, who with his forces landed at the hauen now called Shoreham in Sussex, where putting backe the Inhabitants in many skirmishes, lastly chased them into a great wood then called Andredsiege; whence often being assailed by the sudden assaults of the Britaines, (wherein, as may be thought, he lost the liues of his two elder sonnes) was so hardly beset, that he sent for more aid of his Saxons, who came to his supply.

Matt. Westminst.

(2) His strength thus augmented, and ambition still encreased, he fought three cruel and bloudy battels, but the last of them most fatall against the Britaines, in the place then called Macrodesburne, and besieging the ancient and famous City Andred-Chester (situated in the said great forest, and chiefe defensible fortresse in all those Southerne parts) intercepted the Britaines that came to their relief, and entring the same by an assault, put to the sword all that were found within it. After which great losse, the Britaines sought rather to prouide for their own safety by flying into desert places, then by making opē resistance to procure their owne too apparant destruction.

Henry Huntington

(3) Ella in this state continued the time of fiue yeres before he assumed the name of King, or the limits of that Prouince assigned vnder his gouernmēt: but then without any shew of resistance laid the foundation of this kingdom, which was the second of the Saxons; and as Hengist held Kent, so he had Sussex and Surrey for his Possession, wherein for six yeeres space with Hengist, hee liued, with such approbation of valour as that, after his death, hee became the second Saxon Monarch of the Englishmen, in the yeere of grace 488.

Ella, how long he raigned.

(4) He is said to be the elder son of Osa, & Osa his genealogy Florentius of Worcester thus deriueth: Osa (saith he) was the sonne of Etherbert, and he the son of Ingengeat, who was the sonne of Angengiat, whose father was Aluſa, the sonne of Ingebrand, the sonne of of Wegbrand, the ſonne of Beorn, the ſonne of Beornus, the elder ſonne of Brand, the ſonne of Bealdeag, the ſixth ſonne of Prince Woden and of Lady Fria his wife.

His Iſſue.

(5) His iſſue were Kymen, Plenching, and Ciſſa, three valiant ſonnes, that came ouer with him, and aſſiſted him in his enterpriſes for Britaine. From Kymen, the port wherein they arriued, was called Kymeniſhore; by the Britaines, Cuneneſhore, which time and Seas hath both ſhortened, and altered: and now it is called Shoreham, a well knowne hauen in Suſſex. This Prince came to his graue before his Father, either by the ſtroke of warres, or by the courſe of nature, without further mention of his acts, and his ſucceſſion, cut off by his death. VVil. Malmsb.

(6) Plenching his ſecond ſonne, was borne vnto him in the Lowe Countries of Germany, and with his brethren aſſiſted his Father to the attaining of the South-Saxons Crowne; but being cut off by vntimely death, whether by the hand of the enemy, or by natures appointment, it is vncertaine. Florent. VVig.

(7) The youngeſt ſonne of King Ella, was Ciſſa, whom death ſpared to liue a long life; but fame as ſparing to adorne it with memory of his acts: for nothing of him is left memorable, beſides the building of Chicheſter. Fortune indeed ſet his Fathers Crowne on his head, but kept the Imperiall Diademe in her owne hand, to adorne the head of a worthier bearer, which was Cherdik the weſt-Saxon, vnto whom Ciſſa gaue yeerely contribution, to ſecure him from the Britaines, as before and after hath beene, and ſhall be ſhewed.

(8) This Ella his entrance and erection of his Kingdome, for time is vncertaine; but his raigne therein, as alſo in his Monarchy, is more certainely knowne: for he was King of the South-Saxons the ſpace of thirty two yeeres, and Monarch of the Engliſh-men ſixe and twenty, dying in the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation fiue hundred and foureteene, which was the thirty ſixth after his firſt arriuall into Britaine. See Chap. 8.

CHERDIK THE FIRST KING OF THE VVEST-SAXONS, AND THIRD MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN. Cherdik.

CHAPTER XV.

1. An. Do. 495. THE Saxons Sunne, thus riſen and high aſcended vpon the South of Britaine, beganne now to ſpread his beames towards the Weſt; for Kent being quietly poſſeſſed by King Eske, and South-Saxia, with all the ſubdued, at the diſpoſe of great Ella; Cherdik a valiant Captaine of the Low Country Germans, thought himſelfe as ſufficient in warres, and as able for reach, to weare, and to weild a Crowne of Eſtate, as either of them that had ſo done before him: And ſeeing that Britaine was now the ſeede-plot for Diademes, ſet his affection and preparation that way.

(2) He with his forces entred in the Weſt of that Iland, where hee in his firſt battell ſo danted the Inhabitants, that apparant ſignes of approching glory, were added to his aſpiring hopes: for therein he ſlew Natanleod, otherwiſe called Nazaleod, a mighty King of the Britaines, whereby an eaſie entrance was laid open to his deſired Empire, and a more eaſie warre left to his poſterity. This battle chanced about the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus fiue hundred and eight, and was fought in the region of Natanleod, (which Country bare the name of the King) and neere vnto a brooke of water in the Weſt of Hampſhire, which from Cherdik began to bee called Cherdiks-ford, where now a Towne of the ſame name ſtandeth, but by contraction and ſhortneſſe of ſpeech, is called Chardford. Mat. Weſtm. Henry Hunt.

(3) Florentius of VVorceſter, the Saxons Genealogiſt, (as I may well terme him) bringeth this Cherdik (as he doth the reſt of the Saxon Kings) from the ancient Prince Woden, and that in this manner: Cherdik (ſaith he) was the ſonne of Eliſius, and he the ſonne of Eſla, the ſonne of Geriſius, the ſonne of VVigga, the ſon of Friaiirin, the ſonne of Freodegar, the ſonne of Beorn, the progenitor of Ida the firſt King of Bernicia; and Flor. Wigorn.

both of them the ſonnes of Brand, the ſonne of Bealdeag, the fift ſonne of the foreſaid Woden.

(4) In the ſeuenth yeere of Ella his Monarchie, was his arriuage, and ſixe yeeres after he beganne his Kingdome of the weſt-Saxons; ſeating himſelfe and the foundation thereof betwixt the Britaines and the South-Saxons; for whoſe further ſecurity, Ciſſa King of that Prouince, gaue him an yeerely contribution towards the maintenance of his charge in warre; wherein he got ſuch reputation, that after the death of Ella, and the thirteenth of his owne raigne, he aſſumed the Monarchie vnto himſelfe, and was both the firſt King of the Weſt-Saxons, and the third Monarch of the Engliſhmen, wherein hee continued the ſpace of twenty one yeeres, and deceaſed in the yeere of our Lord fiue hundred thirty fiue, being the three and thirtieth of his Kingdome, and the fortieth after his firſt arriuall.

Cherdit, how long he raigned.

His Iſſue.

(5) His iſſue were two ſonnes, Kenrik and Chelwolfe: the one immediately, and the iſſue of the other collaterally attained to the ſame poſſeſſion and title that Cherdike here firſt laid.

(6) Chelwolfe his ſecond ſonne (for of Kenrik the eldeſt we are hereafter to ſpeake) hath little mention made of among our writers: more then that hee was the Anceſtour of Eskwin, the eight King of the Weſt-Saxons, that is to ſay, the father to Kenfrid the father of Kenſy; which Kenſy had iſſue the ſaid Eskwin, who was the ſucceſſor of King Kenwalk, and predeceſſor of King Kentwin in the Kingdome of the Weſt-Saxons. See Chap. 7.

KENRIK THE SECOND KING OF THE VVEST-SAXONS, AND FOVRTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

Kenrik.

CHAPTER XVI.

1. An. Do. 534.

Enrik, the eldeſt ſonne of King Cherdick (as is ſaid) being borne in Germanie, and following his Father into Britaine, valiantly ſerued vnder him, as well in the Battle fought againſt King Natanleod, the firſt day of his arriuage, as in other battles againſt the Britaines in other places; namely, at Cherdiksford, Cherdisley, and in the Conqueſt of the Ile of Wight. Immediately vpon the death of his Father, he ſucceeded in his whole dominions, and was ordained the ſecond King of the weſt-Saxons, and the fourth Monarch of the Engliſhmen, beginning his raigne ouer both at one and the ſame time, the yeere of Chriſt his Natiuity fiue hundred thirty foure.

(2) And enlarging his confines vpon the Territories of the Britaines, gaue them two great ouerthrowes; the one at Searesbury in Wilt-ſhire, and the other at Banbury in Oxford-ſhire, which was fought the two and twentieth of his raigne, whereby his fame grew more renowned, and his Kingdome in more quiet after. He raigned the ſpace of twenty ſix yeeres, and left this life in the yeere of our Lord God fiue hundred ſixty. An. Do. 556. Kenrik, how long he raigned.

His Iſſue.

(3) He had iſſue three ſonnes, Chelwin, Cuthwolfe, and Cuth. Chelwin the firſt, ſucceeded his Father in the Monarchie, and Weſt-Saxons Kingdome.

(4) Cuthwolfe, the ſecond, aſſiſted his brother in many victories, as preſently in his raigne ſhall follow. And Cuth, the third brother, famous in his iſſue, though mentionleſſe for action in himſelfe, whereof more largely hath beene ſpoken in the raigne of Kenrik, as hee was King onely of the Weſt-Saxons. (2) For continuing the warres where his Father left, did not onely ſubdue the Britaines in many Battles, but alſo ſet himſelfe againſt his owne Nation the Saxons, and ſought to impoſe the ſcope of his power vpon the South of the Riuer Thames: for entring Kent (whoſe King was then a childe, by name Ethelbert, the ſonne of Imerik) at Wiphandun or * Wilbandun in Surrey, in a ſet and ſore Battle, defeated all his forces; whence the young King was chaſed, and two of his greateſt Captaines, bearing the names of Dukes, were ſlaine, as we haue ſaid.

(3) Not long after this victory, he ſet his minde to inlarge his weſt-Saxons Dominions vpon the poſſeſſion of the declining Britaines, and to that end furniſhed forth a great Band of his Souldiers, whereof he made his brother Cuthwin chiefe Generall. Theſe marching to Bedford, gaue Battle to the Britaines, where they ſlew them downe-right; and ſurprized foure of their chiefeſt Townes, at that time called Liganburge, * Eglesbourgh, Benſington, and Eueſham; which they fortified, to their owne ſtrength, and the Britaines great loſſe.

(4) And following the Tract of his fore-going fortunes, about ſix yeeres after ſent forth againe his Saxons, vnder the conduct of the foreſaid Cuthwin, who encountred the Britaines at Dierth or Deorham, with ſuch valour and ſucceſſe, that beſides great ſlaughter of the Britiſh Souldiers, three of their Kings, whoſe names were, Coinmagill, Candidan, and Farinmagill, fell in the field, with the ſurprizal of theſe three Cities, Gloceſter, Bathe, and Cirenceſter. Then (ſaith Gyldas) euidently appeared the Lands deſtruction, the ſins of the Britaines being the onely cauſe, when neither Prince nor people, Prieſt nor Leuite, regarded the Law of the Lord, but diſobediently wandred in their owne waies.

(5) But no greater were the ſinnes of the Britains, then the vnſatiable deſires of the Saxons were to conquer: for Cheuline about the laſt of Malgoe his gouernment, met the Britaines at Fetanleah, in the face of a Field, which was fought out, to the great ſlaughters of them both, and with the death of Prince Cuth, king Cheulins ſonne: notwithſtanding the victory fell on his ſide with great ſpoiles obtained, and poſſeſſions of many Prouinces, which himſelfe no long time enioied.

(2) But ſuch is the diſpoſe of God in his hidden Counſell, that things of leaſt appearance many times become the greateſt in ſubſtance, as in this Prince it was euidently ſeene, who making vſe of his owne youth and loſſe, got thereby experience, both to defenſe himſelfe, and to prouoke others, and with ſuch victories abroad, repaired his loſſes at home, that as farre as Humber he made all ſubiect to Kent.

Beda hiſtor. lib. 1. cap. 25.

(3) Thus growne to be the greateſt of any Saxon before him, hee ſought to hold it vp by forraine alliance, and to that end became ſuter for Berta a moſt vertuous Chriſtian Lady, the Daughter of Chilperik King of France; vnto whom by her father ſhe was laſtly granted, but with theſe conditions, that ſhee might reſerue her Chriſtian Profeſsion, enioy the preſence and the inſtructions of Luidhard her learned Biſhop, with the place of his Queene.

(4) Theſe couenants concluded, and many French Chriſtians attending her in his Court, by their daily ſeruice of God, and continuall practiſe of piety, drew many of the Engliſh to fauour their Religion, yea and the King alſo to be inclined that way. And as theſe were working the ſaluation of Kent, behold Gods proceedings for the conuerſion of the reſt.

(5) It chanced great Gregory (then Arch-deacon of Rome) to ſee certaine youths of this Iland brought to that City, to be ſold for ſlaues: His Chriſtian heart pitying at ſuch heatheniſh tyrannizings, and beholding ſtedfaſtly their faces to bee faire and Angellike, demanded of their Merchants, from what Nation, and whence they were; who made him anſwer, that they were Angles, and by that name known in the Ile of Britaine. Indeed, ſaid Gregory, and not without cauſe are they ſo named, their reſemblance is ſo Angelicall, and fit it is that they bee made inheritours with the Angels in heauen. But of what Prouince in Britain are they, ſaid Gregory, of Deira, ſay they, a country in the North of that cõtinent. Now ſurely, ſaid he, it is great pity but that theſe people Auſtine commeth into England.

(6) And to that purpoſe himſelfe, being afterwards Pope, ſent Auſtine a Monke, with forty others his aſsiſtance, whereof Melitus, Iuſtus, and Iohn were chiefe. Theſe landing in Tanet, in the moneth of July, about fiue hundred ninety and ſix yeres after the Incarnation of Chriſt, and one hundred forty and ſeuen after the firſt ariuage of theſe Angles into Britaine, had immediately acceſſe vnto the preſence of king Ethelbert, but yet in the open Field; for he feared to conferre with them in any houſe, leſt by ſorcery (as hee fondly ſurmiſed) he might be ouercome.

(7) Theſe preaching vnto him the word of life, his anſwer was, that preſently he could not conſent to their Doctrine, neither raſhly forſake his ancient and accuſtomed religion. But ſeeing (ſaid hee) you tell vs ſtrange things, and giue vs faire promiſes of after life, when this life ſhall be ended, wee permit you to preach the ſame to our people, and to conuert as many as you can; and wee our ſelues will miniſter all things behooueſull for your liuelyhood. Which promiſe hee inſtantly performed, and in Canterbury his head City, allowed them fit places for reſidence, and ſufficient prouiſion for their maintenance, wherein theſe religions men, following in ſome meaſure the examples of the Apoſtles, ſpent their times in preaching and praiers, watching for the peoples conuerſions, and exerciſing the workes of true piety, as examples and motiues vnto others, to embrace the Goſpel which they ſought to plant.

(8) Neere vnto the Eaſt part of the City ſtood an ancient Church, built by the Chriſtian Romans, whiles they had dwelt in Britaine, and by them dedicated to the honour of S. Martin, and is ſo yet called. To this Church the Chriſtian queene Berta, with her Communicants the French, daily reſorted to pray; and vnto theſe, and in this Church, Auſtine and his fellowes began daily to preach: vnto whoſe Sermons ſo many of the Kentiſh alſo reſorted, that a plentifull harueſt in ſhort time appeared, vpon the ſeed-plot of their tillage; for it is reported that ten thouſand of the Engliſh people were baptized there in one day, inſomuch that the King himſelfe forſooke his Heatheniſh Idolatrie, and likewiſe receiued the Sacrament of Baptiſme, vnto his ſaluation in Chriſt: in witneſſe whereof, hee gaue the Lordſhip and Royaltie of his chiefe City Canterburie, vnto Auguſtine and reſigned his Princely Palace therein vnto him; who in the Eaſt of this City laid the foundation of that great, and afterwards magnificent Church, dedicated to the ſeruice & name of Chriſt, which at this day is the Cathedrall of that Metropolitan See: and Ethelbert to giue him more roome, withdrew himſelfe vnto Reculuer in Tanet, where hee erected a Palace for himſelfe and his Succeſſours; the compaſſe wherof may be traced by an old wal, whoſe ruines remaine there yet to this day.

(9) Auſtine thus ſeated, and in the well-deſerued fauor of King Ethelbert, got one requeſt more, which was this; that whereas by the Law of the Twelue Tables, it was forbidden to bury the dead within the walles of any City, (the practiſe whereof, wee daily finde by monuments taken vp in the fields adioining) it would pleaſe him to giue to that vſe, an old Idoll-Temple ſtanding without the Eaſt wall of the City; wherin the King himſelfe had wontedly worſhipped his Idols. This obtained, and the Church purged from that profane exerciſe, to the ſeruice of God, being honored with the name of S. Pancras, king Ethelbert added thereunto a moſt faire Monaſterie, built vpon his owne coſt, and dedicated it vnto the name of Peter and Paul the Apoſtles, appointing it to bee the place for the Kentiſh kings Sepulchers; and Auſtine, likewiſe meant it for the burials of his ſucceſſours in that See. But firſt it became the monument of his owne name: for in regard of the Procurer, both Pancras, Peter, and Paul were ſoone ſwallowed vp, and the whole called onely by the name of S. Auſtines. In this place, eight Kings of Kent had their bodies interred, and tenne of their Archbiſhops therein laid, vntil that Cuthbert the eleuenth in ſucceſſion, in fauour of S. Iohns, a new Church by him erected, procured of King Egbert the ſonne of Ercombert, that the ſucceeding Archbiſhops might be buried there. This Monaſtery, as all the reſt did, came to her fatall period in the daies of King Henry the eighth; whoſe vncouered walles ſtood ſo long languiſhing in time and ſtormes of weather, that daily increaſed the aſpect of her ruines, till now laſtly they are made ſubiect to other publike vſes, and the whole tract of that moſt goodly foundation in the ſame place no where appearing. Onely Ethelberts Tower, in memory and honour of the man, as yet hath eſcaped the verdict and ſentence of deſtruction; whoſe beauty, though much defaced and ouerworne, will witneſſe to ſucceeding ages the magnificence of the whole, when all ſtood compleat in their glory together.

(10) Theſe his happy beginnings, Auſtine ſignified by Letters to Rome, and withall demanded directions, how he might further proceed: which queſtions, were they not written by the Venerable Beda, wee could hardly beleeue that ſuch idle conceits ſhould haue place in the minde of a man ſo well and fruitfully buſied: as, whether a woman with child might receiue the Sacrament of Baptiſme, or in her monethly diſeaſe, the holy Communion, or enter the Church: How long after her deliuerance, the husband ought to refraine her Bed: How the Gifts that were offered on the Altar, ought to bee deſtributed: and vnto what degree of conſanguinitie Chriſtians might marie: and many others ſuch like, as though himſelfe had neuer read either Moſes or Paul. But of the thing then more needfull, for that at that time it ſtirred moſt contention, it ſeemeth he was ſufficiently inſtructed; neither among his other queſtions is it once named: and that was, the due time for the celebration of Eaſter: the difference whereof, betwixt the Britaines and the Romans was ſuch, that it cauſed Lord-like Auſtin to prophecy (if not to ſeeke) their deſtructions; and they in their opinions, to hold him no better then the Man of Sinne: for thus the Story is reported.

Auſtines queſtions to the Pope.

(11) Auſtine, by the aſsiſtance and authority of King Ethelbert, called an Aſſemblie of the Britiſh Biſhops and Doctours, that had retained the Doctrine of the Goſpell amongſt them, euen from the firſt plantation thereof by the Apoſtles themſelues, to be holden in the Borders of the Victians and Weſt-Saxons, and at the place vpon that occaſion callled Auguſtines Oake*: thither reſorted ſeuen Britiſh Biſhops, and many other well-learned men (ſaith Beda) out of their greateſt Monaſterie at Bangor, where at that time Dinoth was Abbat. Theſe men now ready to goe to the foreſaid Synod, came firſt to a certaine holy and wiſe man, which liued thereabout an Anchorets life, to aske his counſell, Whether they ought at Auſtins preaching and exhortation, leaue their Traditions or no: The Anchoret replied, If hee be a man of God, follow him. But how ſhall we proone (ſaid they) that hee is a man of God? The Anchoret anſwered, Our Lord ſaith, Take yee on you my Yoke, and learne ye of me, for I am milde and humble of heart. If therefore this Auſtine bee milde and humble of heart, it is like that himſelfe beareth the Yoke of Chriſt, and will offer you the ſame to beare. But if hee bee curſt and proud, it is certaine that he is not of God, neither muſt we much eſteeme his words. Then they enquired, how they might know whether this Auſtine were proud or no: Prouide (quoth he) that he and his companie may come firſt to the place of the Synod or Councell-houſe: and if it bee ſo that when you approch neere him, hee ariſe courteouſly, and ſalute you, then thinke him to be the ſeruant of Chriſt, and ſo heare him, and obey him: but if when you approch, hee deſpiſe you, and will not vouchſafe to riſe at your preſence, which are the greater number, let him likewiſe bee deſpiſed of you. And truly (ſaith hee) as this Anchoret bade them, ſo did they: for it happened, that when they came thither, S. Auſtine was already ſet in his chaire, and ſtirred not: which which when they ſaw, forthwith waxing wroth, they noted him of pride, and therefore endeuoured to ouerthwart and gainſay whatſoeuer he propoſed. And ſo the Synod brake vp without any thing done.

Thus then wee ſee, that the ſubſtance of doctrine was embraced in Britaine, before the ſending of Auſtin from Rome: only in ceremonies they diſſented, as the moſt of Chriſtian Churches, without derogation to the Goſpell, at this day doe. And this for the celebration of Eaſter, a matter of no great moment (if we conſider our Chriſtian liberty, and the Apoſtles feare, that the obſeruations of dayes, moneths, times, and yeeres, turne the hearts after beggerly rudiments, bring againe into bondage, and make his labours for Chriſt in vaine) yet for the different obſeruation only of this Feaſt from the Romans, how oft are the Britaines tearmed by Beda, a wicked people, a curſed nation, and well deſeruing thoſe calamities which the Lord did inflict vpon them? This controuerſie for Eaſters celebration, thus begun, continued no leſſe then ninety yeeres after, and was laſtly concluded in manner as followeth.

Gala. 4. 9.

Beda hiſt. lib. 3. cap. 25.

(12) This variance (ſaith Beda) made not onely the people to doubt and feare, leſt bearing the name of Chriſtians, they did and had runne in vaine, as the Apoſtle ſpeaketh, but alſo good Oſwy King of Northumberland, and learned Prince Alkfryd, with Queene Eanfled, were much diſtracted and perplexed: for by this variance (ſaith he) it often times hapned, that in one yeere two Eaſters were kept; for the King breaking vp his Faſt, and ſolemnizing of the Feaſt, the Queene with Prince Alkfrid, continued their Faſt, and kept that day their Palme-Sunday. To conclude which contrariety, a Synod purpoſely was called, and the queſtion diſputed by their beſt Diuines. The place was Stranſhalch or Whitby, wherof Hilda was Abbeſſe. The chiefe parties for, and againſt the accuſtomed time of keeping that feaſt, were King Oſwy and Prince Alkfrid his ſonne. The Diſputers for Oſwy and the eſtabliſhed orders, were Colman Arch-biſhop of Yorke, with his Scotiſh Clergie, and Hilda the vertuous and learned Lady Abbeſſe of the place. For Alkfrid and the attempted alteration, were Agilbert Biſhop of the Weſt-Saxons, Wilfrid Abbat of Rippon, with Iames and Romanus, two learned men, and the reuerend Cedda newly conſecrated Biſhop, appointed Prolocutor of the Aſſembly.

Stranſhalch Synode.

King Oſwy perſwadeth to vnion.

The Conuocation ſet, King Oſwy made a ſolemne Oration, wherein he vrged a neceſſity, that thoſe people which ſerued one God, ought to celebrate his heauenly Sacraments alike, and ſhould keepe one order and rule in the ſame: the truth of which ſeruice, and ſurceaſe of that long vnchriſtian variance, for the Chriſtian celebration and time of Eaſter, was then preſently by thoſe learned men to bee handled, and by beſt approouements to be determined; whereunto hee requeſted their vttermoſt endeuours, and to that purpoſe commanded his Arch-biſhop Colman firſt to ſpeake: whereupon Colman with reuerence ſtood vp and ſaid: The Eaſter which I obſerue, I receiued of my Fore-fathers, of whom I was conſecrated, and ſent hither for your Biſhop. They all (you know) were godly men, and obſerued the Feaſt as wee doe now; neither thinke you they kept this tradition without ſure warrant from greater then themſelues, which was Saint Iohn the Euangeliſt, and the Diſciple whom Ieſus eſpecially loued, who in the Churches which himſelfe planted, celebrated the Feaſt of Eaſter, as we doe now. Therefore knowing the man ſo worthy, and the manner ſo ancient, I hope you will all confeſſe, it is not ſafe for vs now to reiect it.

Colmans ſpeech to the Synode.

Wilfrides anſwer.

Wilfride the declaimer, appointed to anſwer, ſtood vp and ſaid: The Eaſter which wee obſerue, wee our ſelues haue ſeene obſerued in Rome, where the bleſſed Apoſtles Peter and Paul liued, preached, ſuffered, and are buried: and in our trauels thorow France and Italy, either for ſtudie or vpon pilgrimage, wee haue ſeene the ſame order kept: and we know by relation, that in Africke, Aſia, Ægypt and Greece, nay thorow out all nations and tongues in the world where Chriſt hath his Church, that this our time and order is obſerued. Shall then theſe obſtinate Picts (I meane the Britaines) & theſe remote Ilands in the Ocean Sea, and yet not all of them neither, fondly contend in this point againſt the whole world?

Colmans temerity.

But here Colman interrupted him, and ſaid, I much marueil, brother, that you terme our doings a fond contention, ſeeing we haue for our warrant ſo worthy an Apoſtle as Iohn was, who onely leaned vpon our Lords breſt, and whoſe life and behauiour all the world acknowledgeth to be moſt wiſe and diſcreet.

Wilfrides moderation.

God forbid (ſaid Wilfrid) that I ſhould accuſe Iohn: but yet we know that he kept the decrees of Moſes literally, & according to the Iewiſh Lawes; and ſo the reſt of the Apoſtles were conſtrained in ſome things to doe, for the weakeneſſe of them who accounted it a great ſin to abrogate thoſe rites that God himſelfe had inſtituted; and for that cauſe S. Paul did circumciſe Timothy, offred bloudy ſacrifices in the Temple, ſhaued his head at Corinth with Aquila and Priſcilla: vpon which conſideration alſo ſpake Iames vnto Paul, You ſee brother how many thouſand of the Iewes haue receiued the faith, and all of thoſe are yet zealous followers of the Law. But the light of the Goſpell now ſhining thorow the world, it is not lawfull for any Chriſtian to be circumciſed, or to offer vp bloudy ſacrifices of Beaſts. Saint Iohn therefore, according to the cuſtome of the law, in the fourteenth day of the firſt moneth, at euen began the celebration of Eaſters Feſtiuitie, regardleſſe whether it fell vpon the Sabbath day, or any other of the weeke. But S. Peter preaching the Goſpell in Rome, remembring that our Lord aroſe from his graue the firſt day after the Sabbath, giuing thereby vnto vs certaine aſſurance of our reſurrection, obſerued the Feaſt of Eaſter according to the Commandement of that Law he looked for, euen as S. Iohn did, that is to ſay, the firſt Sabbath after the full Moone of the firſt moneth. Neither doth this new obſeruation of the Goſpell, and Apoſtles practiſe, breake the old Law, but rather fulfilleth it; for the Law commandeth the Feaſt of Paſſeouer to bee kept from the fourteenth day of that moneth, to the twenty and one of the ſame. And this hath the Nicene Councell not newly decreed, but rather confirmed (as the Eccleſiaſticall Hiſtorie witneſſeth) that this is the true obſeruation of Eaſter, and of all Chriſtians after this account is to bee celebrated: and thereupon charged Biſhop Colman, that hee neither obſerued it according to Iohn nor Peter.

To this the Biſhop replied, that Anatholius for his holineſſe much commended by the ſaid Eccleſiaſticall Hiſtorie, and Columba a Father of like ſanctitie, by whom miracles were wrought, kept the Feaſt according as he then did, from whoſe imitation he durſt not digreſſe.

vVilfrid.

Your Fathers, which you pretend to follow, how holy ſoeuer they bee (ſaid Wilfrid) and what miracles ſoeuer they haue wrought, yet this I anſwer, That in the day of iudgement many ſhall ſay vnto Chriſt, that they haue prophecied, caſt out Diuels, and wrought miracles in his name; to whom our Lord will anſwer, I know you not. And if your Father Columba (yea and our Father, if hee be the true ſeruant of Chriſt) were holy and mighty in miracles, yet can hee by no meanes bee preferred to the moſt bleſſed Prince of the Apoſtles, vnto whom our Lord ſaid, Thou art Peter, and vpon this roche I will build my Church, and the gates of hell ſhall not preuaile againſt it, and to thee will I giue the keyes of the Kingdome of Heauen. Thus ſaid, the King asked Colman, whether our Lord indeede ſpake thus vnto Peter, who anſwered. He did. But, Can you (ſaid hee) giue euidence of ſo ſpeciall authority granted to your Father Columba? The Biſhop ſaid, No. Then (quoth the King) doe you both agree confidently, that theſe words were principally ſpoken vnto Peter, & that vnto him the keyes of the Kingdome of Heauen were giuen? They all anſwered, It is moſt certaine. Whereupon the king concluded this great controuerſie, and ſaid, Then will not I gainſay ſuch a Porter as this is, but as farre as I know, and am able, I will couet in all points to obey his ordinance, leſt perhaps when I come to the Doores of Heauen, I finde none to open vnto mee, hauing his diſpleaſure, which is ſo eſpecially prooued to beare the keyes thereof.

REDVVALD THE THIRD KING OF THE EAST-ANGLES, AND SEVENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS WIFE AND ISSVE.

Monarch 7.

CHAPTER XIX.

An. Do. 616.

REdwald, the ſonne of Titulus, and the third King of the East Angles, had been a ſubſtitute vnder Ethelbert King of Kent, and ſerued a long time as his Vice-roy ouer all his dominions, whereby he gained ſuch reputation to himſelfe, that either for his owne valour, or Edbalds vices, (contemned of the people for his Apoſtacy, frenſie, and inceſtuous bed) became the ſeuenth Monarch of the Engliſhmen, about the yeere of Chriſt his Incarnation ſix hundred and ſixteene; and the twentieth and fourth of his raigne ouer the East-Angles.

(2) This Redwald (ſaith Beda) had receiued Baptiſme in Kent, but in vaine, and without zeale, as it afterwards appeared. For returning to his Country, through the perſwaſion of his wife, returned againe to his superstitious worships; and in one and the same Temple, after the manner of the old Samaritans, hee erected an Altar for the seruice of Christ, and another litle Altar for burnt sacrifices to his Idols, which stood vnto the daies of Beda himselfe. But as she was an instigator to the East-Saxons idolatry, so was shee an instrument to the further spreading of Christianity (though not by her so purposely meant) in saueing the life of Edwine, who afterwards planted the Gospell in all the North parts of the Saxons gouernment.

Beda hiſt. Angl. lib. 2. cap. 15.

(3) For Edwyne flying the rage of wilde Ethelfrid was succoured and maintained in the Court of King Redwald, vnto whom lastly, the Northumbrian sent both threats and rewards to haue him deliuered, or else put to death: And surely had not the Queene stood for his life, he had presently died. But she alleaging the law of humanity, the trust of a friend, and the royalty of a Prince, preuailed so farre, that Redwald did not onely saue his life, but assisted him in battell, to the destruction of his enemy, and the gaining of Northumberlands Crowne. For vpon the return of Ethelfrids Ambassadors, vnto whom Redwald yeelded not to make Edwin away, he with his power of the East-Angles were at their backes, and as an enemie made towards Northumberland.

Beda hist. Angl. lib. 2. cap. 12.

(4) Ethelfrid, whose rage and reuenge was ready enough vpon lesser occasions, with such sudden preparation as hee was able to make, met the East-Angles almost at Notingham, and that not farre from the Riuer Idle, where boldly encountring his vnequall enemie, at the first brunt slew Reynhere the sonne of King Redwald, to the great griefe of him & his whole host: whose reuenge was so volently sought, that they slew King Ethelfrid in the Field, and established Edwine to be his successor; which was the second yeere of Redwalds Monarchy.

Redwald, his raigne.

His Wife.

(6) The Queene and wife of this king is not named by any of our Writers, but that she had bene the widow of a Nobelman, descended of the bloud-royall of that Nation, and was a Lady that had deserued great commendations for the many vertues by her possessed, had she been a Christian, or a fauorer of the Christians, or had not beene an vter enemy to their faith. Notwithstanding by her first husband she had a sonne named Sigebert, that proued a learned and most religious Prince, of whom we haue spoken in Chapter eleuenth.

His issue.

(7) His issue were Reynhere and Erpenwald. Reynhere the elder, & Prince of the East-Angles, was slaine as you haue heard, in the battel that his father fought against wilde Ethelfrid, neere vnto the Riuer Idle in Notingham-shire.

(8) Erpenwald the younger succeeded his father Redwald in the kingdome of the East-Angles, and was the fourth king of that Nation, whose life and raigne we haue declared in the succesion of the East-Angles kings: Chapter, 11.

Edwine.

EDVVINE THE GREAT KING OF NORTHVMBERLAND, AND THE EIGHTH SOLE MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS RAIGNE, WIVES, AND ISSVE.

Monarch. 8.

CHAPTER XX.

An. Do. 617.

THe Monarchy reuerted from the East-Angles, was next possessed by the Northumbrians, wherein it was held with greater glory and for longer time. For Edwine in king Redwalds life growne very potent, after his death became his successor in the English Monarchy, & most worthily did adorne the same by his ciuill iustice and diuine piety: his exile, visions & obtaining of the Northumbrians Crowne, we haue already spoken of, and therefore without repetition will passe on to his end.

(2) This Edwine, the sonne of great Ella, the first King of the Deirians, was the third king that possessed the same, the eighth of Bernicia, the second (and first Christian) king of all Northumberland, at the age of twenty three, and in the yeere of Christ six hundred twenty foure, succeeded Redwald in the Monarchy, and was the greatest king of all the Saxons. For

(as Beda ſaith) he ſubdued all the coaſts of Britannie whereſoeuer any Prouinces were inhabited, either of Engliſh or of Saxons, which thing no King of the Engliſh before him had done; and added the * Meuian Iles vnto his owne Dominions. The firſt of them, next the South, was large and fertile, affording roome for nine hundred and ſixty of his Engliſh Families, and the ſecond, gaue ground for aboue three hundred Tenements.

Hebrides.

(3) His firſt wife dead, he became ſuiter for Lady Ethelburg, daughter to Ethelbert King of Kent, deceaſed, and ſiſter to King Eadbald then raigning: whoſe Ambaſſadours were anſwered, that it was not lawfull for a Chriſtian Virgin to be eſpouſed to a Pagan, leſt the faith and ſacraments of the heauenly King ſhould be prophaned, by the matching with that earthly King, which knew not to worſhip God aright. But Edwine hearing of the Virgins beauty, integrity, and piety, was ſo farre ouergone and rauiſhed therewith, that hee condeſcended, ſhee ſhould with her place retain her owne Chriſtian Profeſsion, and enioy the Chriſtian ſociety both of her men, women, Prieſts, and ſeruants her attendants in his Court. Theſe couenants thus confirmed, the Lady accompanied with Paulinus the reuerend Biſhop, and an honourable retinue, all of them Chriſtians, came to King Edwins Court, and with great ioy ſhee was eſpouſed his Queene.

Ethelburgs good parts.

(4) The greatneſſe and proſperity of this Northumbrian King, was both feared by them afarre of, that raigned in no ſuch power; and beheld by his neerer, with an enuious eye: among whom, Quinchelme that raigned with his father king ouer the Weſt-Saxons, ſent a deſperate Ruffin, whoſe name was Eumerus, to murder Edwin the next yeere of his mariage; who repairing to his Court, then reſident neere the riuer Deruent, at the place that is now called Aldeby in Yorkſhire, with a double-edged ſhort ſword, the point thereof poiſoned, and girt vnder his garment, vpon Eaſter day entred his Palace, as an Ambaſſadour, and with crafty ſpeech retained the Kings attention; where getting occaſion, and ſtepping forward, drew his ſword, which one Lilla the Kings ſeruant ſaw, and wanting wherewith to defend his perſon, put himſelfe betwixt the King and the ſword: and thorow his body ſo ſlaine, the ſame was ſo farre runne, that it dangerouſly wounded the King with his point, and with the ſame ſword, before he could be beaten down by the Guard, ſlew another ſeruant, whoſe name was Fordhere.

A conſpiracie.

Beda hiſt. Angl. lib.2.cap.9.

(5) It happened the ſame night, being holy Eaſter Sunday, that Queene Ethelburg was brought to bed of a daughter: for ioy whereof, and her ſafe deliuerance, the King gaue thankes to his Idols; which Biſhop Paulinus, then in preſence, greatly reproued, and bade Edwin to giue thankes vnto God, from whom onely all goodneſſe came; and ſpake vnto him of our new birth in Chriſt: at which conference the King much reioyced, and promiſed that he would euer after renounce all his Idols, and worſhip that Chriſt whom he preached, if that God would grant him his life, and giue him victory againſt that King, who had ſent this Manqueller to murder him; in pledge whereof, he aſſigned Paulinus to baptize his daughter, the which vpon Whitſunday following was performed in her, by the name of Eanfled, and ſhee the firſt of the Northumbrians which receiued that Sacrament. At which time alſo, Edwin being recouered of his wound ſo lately receiued, made an Army, and marched forth againſt the Weſt-Saxons, and in battle either ſlew or took priſoners all them that had conſpired his death, and as a victorious Conquerour, returned to his Countrey.

Biſhop Paulinus.

(6) Where continuing in honour, and his affaires proſpering to his owne deſires, hee was yet in minde diſtracted, and his thoughts continually perplexed, what God hee ſhould worſhip. The ſanctity of the Chriſtians moued him much, and the ancient cuſtomes of his Anceſtours ſate neere his heart, betwixt whom there ſeemed a combate in himſelfe. And in theſe dumps ſitting one day alone, it chanced Biſhop Paulinus to haue acceſſe to his preſence, where laying his right hand vpon the Kings head, demanded of him whether he remembred that ſigne: whereat Edwine ſuddenly fell at the Biſhops feete, whom he in haſte and reuerence preſently lifted vp, and ſpake vnto him as followeth.

Beda hiſt. Angl. lib.2.cap.12.

Behold O Soueraigne (ſaid he) by the bountifull hand and power of our God, you haue eſcaped the hand and vengeance of our moſt hated and dreadfull enemie. Behold alſo, by his moſt gracious goodneſſe you haue obtained the ſoueraign tie of raigne and rule of the Kingdome. Remember now therefore the third thing which you promiſed him, and deferre no longer to accompliſh the ſame by receiuing his faith, and keeping his Commandements, who hath deliuered you from your temporall aduerſities, and exalted you to the honour and Maieſty of a King; whoſe holy will if you hereafter obey, and doe his precept which by me is preached, he will alſo deliuer you from the perpetuall torment of Hell, and make you partaker with him in his heauenly Kingdome, and eternall bliſſe without end.

Edwine put in minde of couenants.

(7) Whereupon conferring with his Counſell, whereof Biſhop Coyſi was chiefe, for the eſtabliſhing of the Goſpell, and ſuppreſſing of Idolatry, it was then concluded, that the true God ſhould be worſhipped, and the Altars of their wonted Idols ouerthrowne: vnto which action, Coyſi himſelfe became the firſt man; for mounted on horſebacke in armour, with a girt ſword and launce in his hand (all which was vnlawfull for thoſe Idoll-Prieſts) hee brake downe their Altars, Grates, and Barres, and deſtroyed their Temples whereſoeuer he came. Some ruines thereof not farre from Yorke, and neere vnto the riſing of the riuer Derwent, remained to be ſeen vnto the dayes of Beda, and were then called Gotmund in Gaham. And king Edwine himſelfe, with all his Nobility, and moſt of the Commons, receiued the lauer of Baptiſme, the eleuenth yeere of his raigne, and of Chriſts Incarnation ſix hundred twenty and ſeuen, one hundred and eighty yeeres after the Saxons entrance into Britaine. The king was baptized the twelfth of Aprill, being Eaſter Sunday, at the City Yorke, in the Church of S. Peters, built then of wood, and was the Kings Oratory, which hee encloſed about with a deepe foundation; and laying the walles with ſquared ſtones, made it the Cathedrall Church, and his Conuerter Paulinus Arch-biſhop of that See.

Idolatry aboliſhed.

Beda hiſt. Angl. cap. 13.

(8) The Goſpell thus eſtabliſhed in theſe Northerne parts, ſpread daily further into other Prouinces, and with ſuch fruit of peace, that in the raigne of this Edwin, and thorowout his Dominions, a weake woman with her new-borne babe might haue paſſed without dammage or danger ouer all the Iland, and from Sea to Sea. And ſo much did the King tender his Subiects, that his prouident care was extended to the way-faring paſſengers, for whoſe vſe he encloſed cleere Springs by the wayes, where hee ſet great Baſens of braſſe, both to waſh and to bathe in; which either for loue or diſpleaſure of the King, no man defaced, or tooke away.

Beda hiſt. Angl. lib.2.cap.16.

And ſo great was the magnificence of this Monarch, that (according to Bede) he had not onely in Battle the Enſignes proper to battle borne before him, but in his ordinary paſſages thorow the Cities and Townes of his kingdome, there alwayes went an Enſigne-bearer before him. And (to vſe the words of the ſame venerable Author) he went not in any ſtreet, in which there was not borne before him that kinde of Standard which the Romans called Tufa, and the Engliſh Thuuf. That the Romans had ſuch an Enſigne, as that which here is called Tufa, Iuſtus Lipſius in his Commentary vpon that place in Vegetius (lib. 3. cap. 5.) where the ſeueral Enſignes of the Romans are recited, doth declare, correcting that place of Vegetius (where Rufa was ſet for Tufa) by this place of Bede, and in the ſame ſhewing, that Tufa ſignified a Ball, as the Ball (by the example of Auguſtus) was an Enſigne of Monarchy, or abſolute gouernment.

Tufa the Romans Enſigne.

Iuſtus Lipſius.

(9) But as the Sunne hath his riſing; his height and deſcent, and euer is mooving in the circle of his celeſtiall orbe; ſo man hath his birth time, being, and death, and till then is neuer ſtayed in one certaine point. Kings therefore, as they be Kings, are the Suns of their owne world, but as they are men, goe to the ſhadow of death: neither can the ſtrength of their power, wiſdome, or policie, loue or applauſe, ſtay the hand heere that holds the fatall knife; for ſo in this King Edwin we ſee, raiſed aboue hope to attaine the Diademe, and ruling in loue and liking of the people, was notwithſtanding cut off in the midſt of his glory and greatneſſe of ſtrength.

(10) For Penda the ſtout Mercian, enuying his peace, and Cadwallo the Britaine ſeeking to receiue his right, ioyned in friendſhip againſt this Monarch, and met him as his enemies in the face of a Field. The plaine was large, and called Hethfield, where after a long and moſt bloudy fight, King Edwin was ſlaine, with Prince Offryd his ſonne, his whole Hoſt put to the ſword, or moſt ſhamefull flight: which chanced the fourth of October, the yeere of our Lord ſix hundred thirty three, the ſixth of his Chriſtianity, the ſeuenth of his Monarchie, the ſeuenteenth of his Kingdome, and the forty ſeuenth of his age. His body was laſtly buried in S. Peters Church at Streanſhall, after called whitby.

His Wiues.

(11) Quenburge his firſt wife, was the daughter (as Beda reporteth) of Ceorle; but as all other Writers doe witneſſe, of Crida King of Mercia. Shee was married vnto him in the beginning of his youth, (and when he was diſpoſſeſſed of his inheritance by the Tyrant Ethelfrid, as we haue ſaid:) with him ſhee liued a great part of his baniſhment, and in the Court of Redwald King of the Eaſt-Angles deceaſed, before her husband could recouer his Kingdome.

* Tace. (12) Ethelburg, ſurnamed * Tate, was the ſecond wife of this King, who was the daughter of Ethelbert King of Kent, and of Queene Berta his firſt wife. Shee was married vnto him in the yeere of grace ſixe hundred twenty fiue, being the ſecond of his Monarchy, and was his wife ſixe yeeres: but ſuruiuing him, and deſirous to liue a religious life, ſhee returning into Kent, withdrew her ſelfe to a place not farre from the Sea-ſide, called Lymming, wherein ſhee built a Monaſterie of Nunnes, and among them ſpent the reſt of her life, and therein dyed, and was there buried.

His Iſſue.

(13) Offride, the eldeſt ſonne of King Edwine, and Quenburg his firſt wife, was borne in the time of his fathers exile among the Eaſt-Angles. He was baptized in the faith of Chriſt by Paulinus the firſt Archbiſhop of Yorke, and was ſlaine the ſame day, and in the ſame battell that his father was. He had a ſonne named Iffy, who was baptized alſo by Biſhop Paulinus, and after the death of his Father and grand-father, for feare of King Oſwald, was conueied ouer the Seas into France, to bee brought vp in the Court of King Dagobert, where he died in his childhood, and was there honorably interred.

(14) Edfrid, the ſecond ſonne of King Edwine and Lady Quenburg his firſt wife, was borne in the time of his fathers exile, and baptized with his brother Offrid by Biſhop Paulinus. After his Fathers death, for feare of King Oſwald, hee fled to Penda King of Mercia, who was his fathers enemy, and his mothers kinſman; by whom he was moſt treacherouſly murthered. He left behind him a ſon named Hererik, who by his wife Bertſwith had iſſue the vertuous and learned Lady Hilda, Abbeſſe of Streanſhalch: and Queene Hereſwith her ſiſter, the wife of Ethelhere King of the Eaſt-Angles, brother to King Anna, by whom ſhee had iſſue Aldwolfe, Elfwold, and Beorne, all three ſucceeding Kings of the Eaſt-Angles.

(15) Ethelme, the third ſonne of King Edwine, and the firſt of Queen Ethelburg his ſecond wife, was baptized by Paulinus Archbiſhop of Yorke, not long after his father and halfe-brethren; but in ſhort ſpace after his baptiſme, hee departed out of this world, euen in the time that he wore the white attire, which in thoſe dayes was vſed to be worne by ſuch as were newly baptized for a certaine ſpace. His body was with all due funerall obſequies enterred within the new Church of S. Peter in the City of Yorke, which his father had newly founded.

(16) Vskfrea, the fourth ſonne of King Edwine, and the ſecond of Queene Ethelburg his ſecond wife, and the laſt and youngeſt of them both, bare the name of his fathers great grand-father. He was baptized by the Archbiſhop Paulinus at one time with his brother Ethelme. After the deceaſe of his father, his mother carried him with her out of Northumberland into Kent, and from thence conueyed him ouer into France with his Nephew Iffy, the ſonne of his halfe-brother Offrid; where hee continued in the cuſtody of King Dagobert, being his mothers coſen-german, and there died, and was honourably buried in a Church with his Nephew Iffy.

(17) Eanfled, the elder daughter of King Edwine, and Queene Ethelburg his ſecond wife, was borne the night following that her father was wounded, and baptized, he being a Pagan. Shee was afterwards married to Oſwy, the fourth King of Northumberland, and tenth Monarch of the Engliſhmen, as ſhall bee ſaid. Beda hiſtor. Ang. lib. 3. cap. 15.

(18) Etheldrid the younger daughter, the fifth and laſt-borne child to King Edwine and of Queene Ethelburg, was baptized at the ſame time with Ethelme and Vskfrea her brethren. Shee died an infant, the white clothing not yet put off, which in thoſe dayes was vſually worne at certaine ſet times after their baptiſme, and was with like funerall obſequies buried by her brother Ethelme in the Church of S. Peters in Yorke, which their father had founded.

OSWALD

Oſwald.

OSVVALD KING OF NORTHVMBERLAND, AND THE NINTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS RAIGNE, WIFE, AND ISSVE.

Monarch 9.

CHAPTER XXI.

An.Do.634. OSwald, the fifth King of Deira, the ninth of Bernicia, the third of Northumberland, and the ninth Monarch of the Engliſhmen, began his raigne the yeere of Chriſts incarnation ſixe hundred thirty foure. He with Eanfrith and his brethren, the ſonnes of wilde Ethelfrid, and Oſrik alſo the ſonne of Alfrid King Edwins Vncle, had been ſecured in Scotland all his raigne, and among the Red-ſhankes liued as baniſhed men, where they learned the true Religion of Chriſt, and had receiued the Lauer of Baptiſme. But Edwines death wrought and divulged, theſe Princes returne again to their Country, and the Northumbrians Kingdome lately gouerned by one, was now againe diuided into two ſeuerall parts, as formerly it had beene.

(2) Ouer the Deirans, Oſrik was made King, and of Bernicia, Eanfrid aſſumed the raigne; but Gods iuſtice ouer-taking their Apoſtaſie, neither their liues nor this diuiſion laſted long. For Cadwall the Chriſtian, and Penda the Pagan, were Gods inſtruments, that with worthy vengeance in the firſt yeere of their gouernment, cut the one off in battell, and the other by trechery; whoſe names & yeeres of raigne as vnhappy and of hatefull remembrance, the Hiſtoriographers of thoſe times would haue to be omitted.

Beda hiſt. Ang. lib. 3. cap. 1.

(3) But religious Oſwald lamenting the effuſion of his Countries bloud, long ſlept not their reuenge. For aſſembling his power, which was not great, hee ſuddenly and vnlooked for came vpon Cadwallo, and at Deniſeburne pitched downe his tents. The place (ſaith Beda) ſtood neere the wall that Seuerus had made, where Oſwald for the firſt day forbare to fight, and among his Souldiers for his Standard ſet vp a Croſſe of wood; wherunto it ſeemeth thoſe dawning daies of Chriſtianity were ouermuch addicted. Here Oſwald making firſt interceſſion to God, the onely preſeruer of his people, in ſore and long fight obtained great victory, with the ſlaughter of Cadwallo, and of all his Britiſh Army: which ſo accompliſhed, many haue attributed the vertue of that Croſſe to bee no ſmall cauſe of that great ouerthrow. This Croſſe ſo ſet vp, was the firſt we reade of to haue been erected in England, and the firſt Altar vnto Chriſt among the Bernicians, whoſe pretended miraculous cures, not onely in the wood it ſelfe, but in the moſſe, and in the earth wherein it was ſet, let Beda report them, and Stapleton vrge them, yet for my part, I hold them no Article of our canonicall Creed.

(4) But certaine it is, that Oſwald himſelfe was a moſt religious and godly King, and tooke ſuch care for the conuerſion and ſaluation of his ſubiects, that he ſent into Scotland for Aidan a Chriſtian Biſhop, to inſtruct his Northumbrians in the Goſpell of truth. And whereas the Biſhop could not ſpeake their language, the King himſelfe was interpreter at his Sermons, and gaue his words in the Engliſh, as he ſpake and pronounced them in the Scotiſh; which language Oſwald perfectly ſpake, hauing beene there the ſpace of eighteene yeeres.

Beda hiſt. Ang. lib. 3. cap. 3.

Hect. Boetius.

Thus the godly proceedings of the King and Biſhop, produced ſuch increaſe of their heauenly ſeed, that it is reported in ſeuen dayes ſpace, fifteene thouſand Chriſtians receiued Baptiſme; and many of them forſaking the pleaſures of the world, to haue betooke themſelues to a religious and ſolitary life.

(5) At this time the whole Iland flouriſhed both with peace and plenty, and acknowledged their ſubiection vnto King Oſwald. For, as Beda reporteth, all the Nations of Britannie which ſpake foure languages, that is to ſay, Britaines, Redſhankes, Scots, and Engliſhmen, became ſubiect vnto him. And yet being aduanced to ſo royall Maieſty, he was notwithſtanding (which is marueilous to be reported) lowly to all, gracious to the poore, and bountifull to ſtrangers. The fruits whereof the ſame Author exemplifieth in his bounty and humility towards the poore; who vpon a ſolemne feaſt day, ſeeing many ſuch at his gates, ſent them both the delicates for himſelfe prepared, and commanded the charger of ſiluer to be broken, and diuided among them. The Biſhop much reioycing thereat, tooke the King by the right hand, and prayed that it might neuer conſume; as after his death it did not, but was ſhrined in ſiluer, and in S. Peters Church at Bebba, now Bambrough, with worthy honour was worſhipped for the many miracles and cures that it did, as likewiſe the earth wherein his bloud was ſpilt: with ſuch lauiſh enlargements haue thoſe Writers enterlined the deeds of Gods Saints.

(6) But as the Sunne hath his ſhadow, and the higheſt tide her ebbe, ſo Oſwald, how holy ſoeuer, or gouernment how good, had emulators that ſought his life, and his Countries ruine: for wicked Penda the Pagan Mercian, enuying the greatneſſe that King Oſwald bare, raiſed warres againſt him, and at a place then called Maſerfield in Shrop-ſhire, in a bloudy and ſore fought battell ſlew him; and not therewith ſatiſfied, in barbarous and brutiſh immanity, did teare him in peeces; the firſt day of Auguſt, and yeere of Chriſt Ieſus ſixe hundred forty two, being the ninth of his raigne, and the thirty eight of his age: whereVpon the ſaid place of his death is called to this day Oſwaldſtree, a faire Market Towne in the ſame Countie.

Beda hiſt. lib. 3. cap. 9.

(7) The diſmembred limmes of his body were firſt buried in the Monaſtery of Bradney in Lincolnſhire, ſhrined, with his ſtandard of Gold and Purple erected ouer his Tombe, at the induſtry and coſt of his Neece Offryd, Queene of Mercia, wife vnto King Ethelred, and daughter to Oſwyn that ſucceeded him. From hence his bones were afterwards remoued to Gloceſter; and there in the North-ſide of the vpper end of the Quire in the Cathedrall Church, continueth a faire Monument of him, with a Chappell ſet betwixt two pillars in the ſame Church.

His Wife.

(8) Kineburg, a moſt vertuous Lady, and daughter to Kingils the ſixth, and firſt Chriſtian king of the Weſt-Saxons, was the wife of king Oſwald, who became both his father and ſonne in the day of her mariage, by receiuing him at the Font, and her of his gift. Shee was maried vnto him in the ſecond yeere of his raign, which was the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation ſix hundred thirty ſixe: no other relation made of her beſides the birth of his ſonne.

His Iſſue.

(9) Ethelwald, the onely child of King Oſwald and Queene Kineburg his wife, was borne in the yeere of our Lord ſixe hundred thirty ſeuen, being the third yeere of his Fathers raigne; and but an Infant at his Fathers death, was diſappointed of the Northumbrian Kingdome by the fraud of his Vncle Oſwin. Notwithſtanding at the death of Oſwin king of Deira, and then not aboue ſixteene yeeres of age, he tooke the ſame kingdome, and by ſtrong hand held it againſt his Vncle ſo long as he liued, and at his death left it to his coſen Alkefrid, the naturall ſonne of king Oſwine, as in the ninth Chapter we haue ſaid.

CHAPTER XXII.

An. Do. 643.

OSwye, the illegitimate ſonne of King Ethelfrid, ſurnamed the Wilde, at thirty yeeres of age ſucceeded Oſwald his halfe brother in his Dominions, being the fourth King of Northumberland, and the tenth Monarch of the Engliſhmen, entring his gouernement the thirteenth day of October, and yeere of Chriſts Incarnation ſixe hundred forty three. His firſt beginnings were much diſquieted by Penda the Heathen Mercian, by the rebellions of his baſe ſonne Alkfrid, and by the oppoſitions of Ethelwald the ſon of King Oſwald: but none ſate more neere his heart then Oſwin king of the Deirians did, whoſe vertuous gouernment did much darken (as he tooke it) his owne, and the free loue of thoſe ſubiects, daily to leſſen his, among the Berhicians.

(who did apoſtate from his faith) and ruling his Prouince in plenty and peace the ſpace of ſeuen yeeres, was therefore greatly enuied by Oſwy of Bernicia, and laſtly by him prouoked into the field. Their hoſts met at the place then called Willfares Downe, ten miles weſt from the village Cataracton, and there attended to hazard the day. But Oſwyn finding himſelfe too weake for Oſwy, alſo to ſaue the effuſion of Chriſtian bloud, forſooke the field; accompanied onely with one Souldier, and wont to Earle Hunwald his friend as he thought, to ſecure his life. But contrary to truſt, hee deliuered him vnto King Oſwy, who cruelly ſlew him the twentieth of Auguſt, and ninth of his raigne, at the place called Ingethling; where afterwards for ſatisfaction of ſo hainous an offence, a Monaſtery was built, as vpon like occaſions, many the like foundations were laid; whoſe ſtones were thus ioyned with the morter of bloud.

(3) Of this Oſwyne thus ſlaine, Beda reporteth the Story following: Among his other rare vertues and princely qualities, his humility (ſaith he) and paſſing lowlineſſe excelled: whereof he thus exemplifieth: The reuerend Chriſtian Biſhop Aidan vſing much trauel to preach the Goſpell throughout that Prouince, the king for his more eaſe, gaue him a goodly Gelding with rich and coſtly trapping. It chanced one day, as the Biſhop rode to miniſter the word of life, that a poore man demanded his almes: but hee not hauing wherewith to releeue him, and pitying his diſtreſſed poore eſtate, preſently alighted, and gaue vnto him his horſe and rich furniture; whereof when the king heard he blamed him, and ſaid, What meant you (my Lord) to giue to the begger the horſe that I gaue you, with my ſaddle and trapping,? Had we horſes of no lower price to giue away to the poore? To whom the Biſhop replied, And is the brood of a beaſt dearer in your ſight, then this poore man the childe of God? The King thus reprooued, turned himſelfe towards the fire, and there ſadly pauſing vpon this anſwer, preſently gaue from him his ſword, and in haſte fell at the Biſhops feet, deſiring forgiueneſſe in that he had ſaid. The Biſhop much aſtonied, ſuddenly lift vp the King, deſiring him to ſit to meat, and to be merry; which the King immediatly did, but the Biſhop contrariwiſe began to be penſiue and ſadde, and the teares to tricle downe his cheekes: in which paſſion hee burſt out into theſe ſpeeches, and ſaid to his Chaplaine in an vnknowne tongue, I neuer till this time haue ſeene an humble King; and ſurely his life cannot bee long, for this people are not worthy to haue ſuch a Prince to gouern them. But to returne to king Oſwy.

CHAPTER XXIII.

An. Do. 659

Vlfhere, after the murther of his brother Peada, aduanced againſt Oſwy by the Nobles of Mercia, maintained his title and kingdome for twelue yeeres continuance, in the life time of that Northumbrian Monarch; and after his death tranſlated the Monarchy from thoſe Kings, & Country, vnto himſelfe and his ſucceſſors the Mercians, who now wore the Imperiall Diademe without reuerſement, vntill ſuch time as great Egbert ſet it vpon the weſt-Saxons head.

These stirres (saith Beda) happened in the yeere of grace six hundred seuenty seuen; and the next following, so fearefull a Blazing starre, as was wonderfull to behold, first discouered in the moneth of August, and for three moneths together continued rising in the morning, and giuing forth a blazing pile very high, and of a glittering flame.

(3) The remorse of conscience for the bloud hee had spilt, and the places of Oratories by him destroied, (besides his intrusions into another mans right) strucke so deepe a wound into King Ethelreds breast, that euer hee bethought him what recompence to make. First therefore building a goodly Monastery at Bradney, and that most fruitfully seated in the County of Lincolne, he thought that not sufficient to wash away the scarres of his foule offence, but determined in himselfe to forsake the world, for that was the terme attributed to the monasticall life: wherein notwithstanding, in lesse cares they liued, and their persons more safe from all dangers attempted, then when they publikely administred their lawes to their people, the iust executions whereof, many times breed the ouerthrow of their Princes, and their Persons neuer secure amids their owne guards.

(2) His Parents he nameth Twinfreth and Mercella, and himſelfe hee ſaith to haue been firſt named Pinered, borne both lame, deafe, and blinde, wherein he ſo continued vnto his mans eſtate. The rage of Bernred (ſaith the ſame Author) had forced all three into a ſolitary place, where ſuddenly by miracle Pinered was reſtored, and for that cauſe called another Offa; who preſently aſſailed, and in a great battel manfully fought, ſlew the vſurping Bernred. The Nobles of Mercia being rid of that Tyrant by the valour of Offa, gladly imbraced & receiued him for their King; who began his raign with greater ſhew of glory, then any Mercian before him had done, being in number the eleuenth that had raigned in that Prouince, and is accounted the ſixteenth Monarch of the Engliſhmen.

But he was ſo farre from fearing of his threats, that to his contempt he was the more eager.

King Charles the Great.

(4) The firſt that felt his fury, were the Kentiſhmen, vnder Alrike their King, whoſe ouerthrow was the leſſe diſhonourable (ſaith Malmesbury) for that they were vanquiſhed by ſo great a Monarch. The place was Otteford, vnfortunate to them, where their King was ſlaine by the hand of Offa himſelfe, their forces quite diſcomfited by the loſſe of this field, and their Country trodden downe vnder the feet of the Mercians.

(5) From South to North King Offa then marched, and beyond Humber made hauocke of all that ſtood againſt him; whence returning triumphant, he ſet vpon the weſt-Saxons, that had formerly ioined with his enemies: the place was Benſinton, which Caſtell King Offa tooke, with the diſcomfiture of King Kenwolfe, and all his weſt-Saxons, who ſought their reuenge by the aides of the Britaines in Wales. Their King (ſaith mine Author) was then Marmodius betwixt whom ſome intercourſe by letters paſſed, & great preſents to king Offa ſent, onely to protract time, and to worke vpon aduantage.

putting a great number to the sword, who were more intentiue and regardfull to the Feast, then to any defence from their cruell and mercilesse swords.

Armodus vanquished by Offa.

(8) These wrongs King Offa delaied not to requite, first making their hostages his vassals and slaues, and then with a great army entring Wales, in a bloudy and sore-fought battle hee ouercame Marmodius and all his associates in the field. Thus then as a Conquerour ouer all his enemies, triumphantly after ten yeeres wars abroad, returned he to his owne Kingdome, neither puffed with pride, nor suffering his title to be enlarged according to his cõquests: yet he was not neglectiue of regall state, by the report of the Ligger booke of S. Albans, which saith, that in regard of his great prerogatiue, and not of any pride, he first instituted and commanded, that euen in times of peace also, himselfe and his successors in the Crowne, should as he passed through any Citie, haue Trumpeters going and sounding before them, to shew that the person of the King should breed both feare, and honor in all which either see him or heare him.

King Charles congratulateth Offa.

(9) Vnto King Charles of France he wrote in excuse of his warres, and desire of his amity; whom Charles againe congratulated with letters of gladnes, both for his victories, and the Christian piety in his land embraced; desiring of Offa safe conduct for such his subiects, as came to his country in deuotion to God, and withall sent to him, (for a present) a Booke of the Decrees of the second Councell of Nice. Which Synodall Booke (to vse Roger Houedens owne words) was sent vnto King Charles from Constantinople, Wherein (saith he) alas for pity, by the vnanimous assertion of three hundred Bishops or more congregated in that Councell, were decreed many things inconuenient, yea and quite contrary to the true faith, as is most especially the worshipping of Images, which the Church of God doth vtterly detest. Against which Booke * Albinus wrote an Epistle, admirably strengthned by the authority of the holy Scriptures, which together with the foresaid Booke himselfe presented in the name of the Princes & Bishops of this land, vnto the foresaid Charles King of France. Such intercourse both for State and Church had this great Offa with that great Charles.

Offaes last wars.

(10) His last warres (according to mine Author) were against the Danes, whom he forced to their ships with the losse as well of their booties, as of many of their liues; and then (saith he) with the spirit of humility, both to recall himselfe from the trace of blood, and to the better establishment of his kingdomes peace, he ioined in affinity with his neighbour Princes, vpõ whõ he bestowed his daughters in mariage.

Offa went to Rome.

(11) And making Egfryd his sonne a King with himselfe, in great deuotion went to Rome, where with the like zeale and example of Inas the West-Saxon, he made his Kingdome subiect to a Tribute, then called Peter-pence, afterwards Rom-Scot; besides other rich gifts that he gaue to Pope Hadrian for canonizing Albane a Saint: in honour of whom, and in repentance of his sinnes, at his returne (ouer against Verolanium, in the place then called Holmehurst, where that Protomartyr of Britaine, for the constant profession of Christ, lost his head) Offa built a magnificke Monastery in Anno 795, indowing it with lands and rich reuenewes for the maintenance of an hundred Monks: vpon the first gate of entrance in stone standeth cut a Saltier Argent in a field azure, & is assigned by the iudicious in Heraldry to bee the Armes that he bare.

His repentance.

(12) Also in testimony of his repentance for the bloud he had spilt, he gaue the tenth part of all his goods vnto the Churchmen, and vnto the poore. At Bathe he also built another Monastery, and in Warwickeshiere a church, where the adioining town, from it and him beareth the name Off-Church.

Off-ley Towne.

(13) Finally, when he had raigned thirty nine yeares, he died in peace at his towne Off-ley the nine and twentieth of Iuly, the yeare of Christ Iesus, seuen hundred ninety foure: and with great solemnity his body was buried without the towne of Bedford in a Chappel standing vpon the Bank of Owse, which lõg since was swallowed vp by the same riuer: whose Tombe of lead (as it were some phantasticall thing) appeareth often (saith Rouse) to them that seek it not, but to them that seeke it, is altogether inuisible.

His issue.

(14) Quendrid the wife of king Offa hath not her parentage set down by any of our Writers: notwithstanding, the recorder of this his life, saith that her name was Drida, and that she was the kinswoman to Charles the great King of France, and by him for some offence banished his Realme, who arriuing vpon the coasts of England in a ship without tackle, was taken thence, and relieued by Offa, being then a young Nobleman, where shee changed her name vnto Pretronilla, with whom hee fell so farre in loue that hee made her his wife, contrary to the liking of his parents. She was a woman of condition ambitious, couetous, and cruell, as appeared specially in the death of Ethelbert, King of the East-Angles, that came to her husbands Court to marry their daughter; whose port shee so much enuied, that she procured him to be treacherously murdered: the manner the foresaid Author declared to be by his fal into a deepe pit, purposely made in his bed-chamber and vnder his chaire of estate. That his head was cut off, and found by a blind-man; that the well which beares his name sprung vp presently in the place where it lay, that the bloud thereof gaue the blinde man his sight, and that Dryda died in the same pit which shee had digged for Ethelbert, I leaue to the credite of my author, and the liking of my Reader: but certaine it is that Gods vengeance followed this heynous fact within one yeare after the same was committed, by the death of her selfe, her husband, & her sonne, and the translation of that Kingdome from the Mercians to the West-Saxons.

Quendred her treachery.

An ancient Saxon coine inscribed with her name, CENEDRED REGIN. we haue found and here placed, which the iudicious suppose to be hers, and that not vnlikely, shee being so powerfull, proud and ambitious.

Quendred rewarded with the like paines.

His issue.

Egfryd the only sonne of Offa.

(15) Egfryd the onely sonne, and heire apparant of King Offa and Queene Quendred, was the onely ioy and pride of his parents, who succeeded his Father in his dominions and title, and in the same yeare also in the shades of death.

Ethelburga the first daughter.

(16) Ethelburga, the eldest daughter of King Offa and Queene Quendred, was maried to Brithrick the sixteenth King of the West-Saxons: shee was a Lady of passing beauty, but withall of an insolent disposition, hating all whom her husband loued, and practising the deathes of them that she hated; Shee departed into France after the poisoning of her husband, & for that her offence, a law was enacted to the great preiudice of the west-Saxons Queenes, as in the raigne of Brithrik we haue declared.

Polychr. Elfled the second daughter.

(17) Elfled the second daughter of King Offa, and Queene Quendred, by the report of Randulph Higden the monke of Chester, was the second wife to Ethelred King of Northumberland; who in regard of her had put from him his former wife, for which his subiects rose in Armes against him, and slew him in the last yeare of King Offa, his raigne.

Elfrid the third daughter.

(18) Elfrid the third and youngest daughter of King Offa, and Queene Quendred, being promised in mariage, and assured vnto Ethelbert King of the East-Angles, after the murther of her hoped Bridegroom with great lamentations, and prophesying threats of reuenge, abandoned the society of men, and withdrew herselfe vnto the monastery of Crowland in the EGFRID THE TVVELFTH KING OF THE MERCIANS, AND THE SEVENTEENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

Monarch 17

CHAPTER XXIX.

An.Do.794.

Gfride, the ſonne of King Offa, ſucceeded his father in the Mercians kingdom, wherof he was the twelfth in number, and in the Monarchy of the Engliſhmen, ranked in account the ſeuenteenth. Hee began his reigne the 13. day of July, in the yeere of Chriſt his natiuity, ſeuen hundred ninety foure. The firſt buſineſſe that he vndertooke after hee came to the Crowne, was the reſtauration of ancient priuiledges to the Church, which his father had depriued them of; and great hope was conceiued of his further proceedings, had not God cut him off by vntimely death. For hauing reigned onely foure moneths, hee gaue place vnto nature, and to another ſucceſſour, the ſins of the people deſeruing no ſuch Prince: for whoſe cauſe, and his fathers great bloudſhed, as Alcuine wrote to Osbertus, he was taken away ſo ſoone.

Egfrid reſtoreth antike priuiledges.

(2) He deceaſed the ſeuenth day of December, and in the firſt of his reigne, hauing had neither Wife nor Iſſue that wee reade of. His body with all due obſequies was honourably buried in the Abbey Church of S. Albans, of his fathers foundation.

KENVVOLFE THE THIRTEENTH KING OF THE MERCIANS, AND THE EIGHTEENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

CHAPTER XXX.

An. Do. 794.

KEnwolfe, not ſo neere in blood to King Egfryd, as he was like him in all vertuous conditions, by him was ordained to ſucceed in his Dominions, whereby hee became the thirteenth King of the Mercians, and the eighteenth Monarch of the Engliſhmen, in the yeere of our Lord ſeuen hundred ninety ſeuen. At home he was an example of piety, peace, and religion, & ſet the ſcale of iuſtice without reſpect to all alike; abroad temperate, humble, and courteous, without vain oſtentation or ambitious conceits; in warres hee was ſtout and victorious; in peace ſtudious to enrich his ſubiects: briefly, at all times ſo carrying himſelfe, that enuy could not touch him with her tongue.

Kenwolfes praiſe.

(2) Whether vpon a new quarrell begun, or the old retained, (as inheritable to the Mercians againſt thoſe of Kent) I cannot ſay; but true it is, that in the entrance of his reigne, he entred that Prouince with a great hoſt of men, and in a ſore fought field diſcomfited the Kentiſh, and carried away priſoner their King, whoſe firname was Pren. His kingdome hee gaue to Cuthred, and kept him captiue in Mercia, to his great griefe, and his ſubiects diſhonour.

Wil. Malmeſburie.

(3) But Kenwolfe in peace, & minding the works of true piety, gaue himſelfe to the building of a goodly Church at Winchcombe in Gloceſterſhire; where vpon the day of dedication, in the preſence of Cuthred (aſſigned his Viceroy in Kent,) thirteene Biſhops, ten Dukes, many Nobles, and a great concourſe of people, hee led Pren this Kentiſh captiue vp to the high Altar, and there without either his entreaty, or ranſome for Redemption, releaſed and ſet him free; ſhewing thereby his deuotion to God, and the heroicall parts of a magnanimous Prince.

Winchcombe Monaſtery

(4) His reigne was twenty two yeeres, and death in Anno eight hundred nineteene, beeing ſolemnely buried in the Church of the Monaſterie of Winchcombe aforeſaid which himſelfe had founded.

Kenwolfes burial.

His wife.

(5) Elfryd, the wife of King Kenwolfe, hath not her parentage certainely reported by any of our Hiſtorians; yet ſome later vpon a likelihood of her name, the place and time agreeing, haue thought her to bee the daughter of Offa, affianced to King Ethelbert, as hath beene ſaid: but in theſe obſcurities, coniecture may wander aſtray.

Elfrids parents vnknowne.

His children.

(6) Kenelm the ſon of King Kenwolfe, and of Queen Elfryde his wife, was very yong at his fathers death, and ſucceeded him in the Mercians kingdome, but not in the Monarchy of the Engliſh; King Egbert the weſt-Saxon King then growne too great. And in the ſame yeere that he beganne his reigne, by the treaſon of his vnnaturall ſiſter hee was murthered, and firſt obſcurely buried, but afterwards ſolemnly remoued and repoſed neere to his Father in the Monaſterie of Winchcombe, as in the Mercian Kings ſucceſſions wee haue ſaid.

Kenelms death.

Chap: 10. ſect. 14.

(7) Quendred the eldeſt daughter of King Kenwolfe, and Lady Elfryd his Queene, after the deceaſe of her father, ambitiouſly aſpiring to compaſſe the ſway of the Mercian Kingdome wholy to her ſelfe, wickedly conſpired the death of her brother king Kenelme, which was traiterouſly acted by Askebert her inſtrument, who had the charge of him: but the ſame turning to her reproch, for very ſhame of ſo damnable a deed, ſhee within ſhort time after ended her life, but not her ignominie.

Quendred the eldeſt daughter of Kenwolfe.

(8) Burgenhild, the yonger daughter of king Kenwolfe, and of Queene Elfryd, hath not been ſo famous to poſterity as her ſiſter Quendred was for her infamous Act; notwithſtanding, ſhee may reaſonably bee ſuppoſed to haue ledde a better life, and to haue died a better death; eſpecially of vs, who find her not ſtained with any aſperſion of miſdeſeruing.

EGBERT

Egbert.

EGBERT THE NYNTEENTH KING OF THE VVEST-SAXONS, THE NINETEENTH, BVT FIRST SOLE AND ABSOLVTE MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS ACTS, VVIFE, AND ISSVE.

Monarch 19

CHAPTER XXXI.

An. Do. 800.

THe Saxon Heptarchy drawing now to a period, the ſpring of an entire Monarchie began to ſhew it ſelfe, and the glory of the Engliſhmen more cleerely to ariſe: for though they had weakned each other by their own wars, yet ſtood their power ſtrong in the poſſeſſion of the whole, and the ouerborne Britaines held ſtill at the worſt.

(2) But ſuch is the diſpoſe of the ſole diſpoſer of Empires, that they haue their riſings, their fuls, and their fals: neuer ſtaying in one and the ſame point, neither entailed to one and the ſame Nation, how ſtrong, politicke or populous ſoeuer. The prooſe whereof is apparant in all the Kingdomes of the earth, and this of ours as mutable as any; whoſe change of State vnto, and in, this ſeuen-fold Gouernment hath hitherto beene ſeene: the ſeuerall Kings thereof long contending to branch their owne fountaines furtheſt and faireſt, laſtly let them fall into one ſtreame, which ſo meeting, made a more famous influence in this Monarchy, then the ſeauen heads of Nilus in the Egyptian Sea.

The ſeuen fold gouernment mutable.

(3) Formerly, the Kentiſh, South-Saxons, East-Angles, Northumbrians, and the Mercians, who through no leſſe then eight deſcents had worne the Emperial Diademe, whoſe rayes ſhone now ſo bright in the weſt-Saxons eyes, that they againe ſought to reeſtate themſelues in ſo glorious a poſſeſſion. For, whereas Brightrik was poſſeſſed and contented with the weſt-Saxon Crowne, neither that worne without iealouſie and feare; yet others of the blood royall from Cherdik raiſed the wings of their ſoaring thoughts much higher, among whom Egbert was one, neither the laſt nor the leaſt in the opinion of the people, or ſuſpect of his Prince.

Weſt-Saxons ambition.

(4) This Egbert hauing commaund of ſome part of that Prouince, ſo carried himſelfe, that his fame grew fearefull to Brightrik the King, and hatefull to the enuious Ethelburg his moſt proud Queene, by whom hee was enforced firſt to ſecure himſelfe with the Mercian Offa; and laſtly conſtrained to flie into France: where vnder Charles the Great, hee turned his aduerſity into an occaſion of his valour, by ſeruing in his warres, and learned by his politicke gouernment, how to rule a quiet or diſturbed Sate.

Egberts exigents and reliefes.

(5) But King Brightriks death acted, and his Queene the contriuer baniſhed, Egbert is ſolicited to the wearing of the Weſt-Saxon crowne, where hee became the eighteenth King in number, and nineteene yeeres after the nineteenth Monarch of the Engliſhmen; entring his reigne the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus, eight hundreth, beeing the ſame yeere that Charles was made Emperour of the Weſt, and Conwall then ruling ouer the Scots.

Simon Dunel. ſaith 802. Mat. weſtminſter, ſaith 801.

(6) His firſt warres were againſt the Corniſh, and their aſſociats the Welſh, both of them a remnant of the old Britaines, who had beene oftentimes vanquiſhed, but neuer would ſeeme to bee ſubdued, and for foureteene yeeres continuance held ſide againſt Egbert; which their reſiſtance ſo prouoked his furie that hee enacted a moſt ſeuere law againſt them, commanding that no Britaine ſhould preſume to paſſe ouer great Offaes ditch, and preſent death to them that durſt ſet foot vpon any Engliſh ground. Their great Caer-legion (now Weſt-cheſter) hee tooke from them, and at London from their weſt gate caſt downe the braſen Image of Cadwallo there ſet vp by the Britaines for a terrour to the Saxons, as wee haue ſaid.

Iohn Deuer.

Chap. 12.

(7) His warres thus proſpering, his puiſſance grew dreadfull, and his glory much enuied at by the other Princes, whereof Bernulfe of Mercia was the firſt attempter that ſought to plucke the wing of this weſt-Saxon Eagle, but thereby wrought his owne downefall; for Egbert ioyning battaile with him at Ellenden ouerthrew his power, and in that quarrell Bernulfe was laſtly ſlaine.

berts eye, whose king not gracious in his own subiects sight, was the easier to be subdued; him he chased ouer Thamisis, and added not onely that County, but also Sussex and Surrey, for Prouinces vnto his owne Kingdome: next were the East-Saxons, the East-Angles, & in truth all, that both vpon the North, and the South of Humber gaue him obedience; so that the bounds of his dominion were greately enlarged, and his royall authority by those seuerall Kings acknowledged.

Egbert the first sole Monarch.

(9) Then to confirme his estate he called an assembly vnto the City Wincheſter, where causing himselfe to bee solemnly crowned, became the first Saxons absolute Monarch of the whole Iland, so reducing the Monarchiall title from the Mercians to the West-Saxons, in whose Progeny it continued without reuersement vntill the Danes first got, and againe lost it, and the Saxons issue failing, the same fell to the Normans Duke by Conqueſt, as in continuance of our history, Christ assisting, shall be seene.

An. Do. 816.

(10) His Coronation was at Wincheſter, and entrance in the yeare of grace, eight hundred and nineteene, at which time by his Edict in that City dated, he caused all the South of the Iland to be called England, according to the Angles, of whom himselfe came, and promising great felicity to his State and Successors, was therein not so happy as in his affaires he had beene fortunate.

(11) For those Saxons that by warre and blood, had made themselues Lords of other mens rights, and of one Kingdome no lesse then seuen, are now endangered to bee made seruants vnto subiection, and by warre and bloud their seuen-fold Kingdome brought againe vnto one; neither yet freed from the reuenge of bloody violence: for that a fierce and cruell nation (the Danes) ceased not continually to inuade them, till they had subdued and set the crowne thereof vpon their owne heads, who in King Brightrick dayes, and about the yeere seuen hundred eighty seuen, hauing with three vessels landed in the West of England, at three seuerall times, in so many seuerall places, sought the ruine of the land in the raigne of this Egbert.

Floren. Wigorn.

Simon Dun. Henry Hunting. Mat. West.

(12) The first was in his thirty third yeare, when with thirty fiue ships they layded at Lindisferne vpon the North of England, where they were met and fought with at Carham, but with such losse to the English, that two chiefe Captaines, Dudda and Osmond, two Bishops, Herefrid of Wincheſter, and Vigferd of Shirborne, with many Souldiers were therein slaine, King Egbert himselfe hardly escaping by the couert of the night.

(13) Their second attempt was in the second yeare following, when in West-wales they landed, vnto whom the Britaines there ioyned, and at the place called Hengiſtenton abode the King in field, where Egbert with prosperous fortune vanquished and slew both the Danes and the Welsh.

(14) The third place of their arriuage was Sheepie in Kent, which Iland they sacked, and with much adoe were expelled in the last of King Egberts raign, and but the new beginning of their sauage cruelties.

(15) This Egbert by Florentius of Worceſter is said to be the sonne of Alkemund, who was the sonne of Eafa, and he the sonne of Eoppa, the sonne of Ingils, the brother of Ine, the eleuenth King of the West-Saxons, and both of them the sonnes of Kenred, descended from Cherdik the first King of that Prouince: he was but low of stature, yet well composed and strong of limme, very valiant, wise and politicke, a skillfull souldier, and as great in mind, as fortunate in warre; he raigned ouer the West-Saxons the space of thirty six yeares and seuen monethes, and Monarch of the whole Iland seuenteen yeres: his death hapned the fourth day of February, and yeare of Christs Incarnation eight hundred thirty six.

The continuance of his raigne.

(16) His body was with all obsequies solemnly buried at Wincheſter, and his bones since taken vp, remaine with others in that Cities Cathedral Church, bestowed in Chests set vpon the wall of each side the Quier, with these verses neither ancient, nor elegant, thereon inscribed:

Hic Rex Egbertus pausat cum Rege Kenulpho,
Nobis egregia munera vterque tulit.

His wife.

(17) Redburg, the wife of King Egbert, was the first of the West-Saxons, that by their new made law was depriued of title, authority, or place of a Queene; notwithstanding it seemeth shee bare a great stroke with her husband, in that Iohn Beuer the Monke of Weſtminſter reporteth, that shee procured a law to be made against the Britaines; the penalty whereof was present death for any of them to set footing within the realme of England, or to passe the Ditch that King Offa had made.

Redburgs cruelty.

His Issue.

Ethelwolfe eldest sonne.

(18) Ethelwolfe, the eldest sonne of King Egbert, and Lady Redburg his wife, was in his childhood committed to the charge of Helmestan Bishop of Vincheſter, vnder whom hee was carefully trayned vp in learning and vertue, who comming to mans estate proued also a perfect Souldier, and had the leading of his fathers power against Baldred King of Kent, whom hee forced to flie ouer the Thamisis, and to abandon his kingdome, which hee subdued to the subiection of his father, and afterwards succeeded him in the Monarchy of the Englishmen.

Ethelstan yonger sonne.

(19) Ethelstane, the younger sonne of King Egbert, and of the Lady Redburg his wife, was by his father deputed King ouer the Kentishmen, the South-Saxons, and the East-Saxons, after hee had brought them vnto his subiection; which people hee most valiantly defended against the inuasions of the Danes, defeating their forces both by sea and land, and at Sandwich gaue them a most memorable ouerthrow, in the yeare of our Lord eight hundred fifty one, being the sixteenth of his brother King Ethelwolfes raigne; in whose time hee deceased, and is reported to haue left a sonne named Oſtride, who by reason of his minority succeeded not in his fathers dominions which Ethelbert the second sonne of King Ethelwolfe entred vpon, and being Monarch reunited these kingdomes inseparably vnto the Monarchy.

Edgith a daughter.

(20) Edgith, commonly called Saint Edith the daughter of King Egbert, was in her childhood by her brother Ethelwolfe committed to the charge and bringing vp of a Lady in Ireland, greatly renowmed for her holinesse of life, named Modewine, by whom she was afterwards recommended to a Discipleſſe of the said Lady, named Athee, and made Gouernesse of a Monaſtery of the Ladies, by her planted in a place which the King her brother had giuen her, called Polleſworth, situated in Arden in the north verge of the County of Warwicke, wherein she liued, died, and was honourably buried, and the place in regard of her afterwards called Saint Ediths of Polleſworth.

CHAPTER XXXII.

An.Do.837.

ETHELWOLFE, the eldeſt ſonne of King Egbert, committed in his youth to the care of Helmeſtan Biſhop of Wincheſter, and by him vnto Swithun a famous learned Monke of that time, tooke ſuch a liking vnto the quiet and ſolitary life, (onely enioyed by men of Religion, all other eſtates moleſted to withſtand the intruding Danes) that hee vndertooke the Monkiſh vow and profeſſion, and was made Deacon; ſhortly after which degree taken, Helmeſtan died, in whoſe place Prince Ethelwolfe was conſecrated, as Reger Houeden affirmeth, or at leaſt elected, (as Iohn Brampton Abbat of Iaruaux writeth) Biſhop of Wincheſter. But the death of his Father King Egbert immediately following, by great intreaty of the Nobles, and partly by conſtraint of the Clergie, hee was made King, and was by the authority of Pope Gregory the fourth, (whoſe creature in both profeſſions he was) abſolued and diſcharged of his vowes.

Roger Houeden. Iohn Brampton.

Henry Hunting. Mat. Weſtminſter.

(2) Hee entered his Monarchy the fourth day of February in the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation, eight hundred thirty ſeuen, and was the nineteenth King of the Weſt-Saxons, and the twentieth Monarch of the Engliſhmen. His Biſhopricke he gaue vnto Swithun his Tutor, and according to his place, combined all his powers to withſtand the dangerous Danes, that attempted the vtter ſubuerſion of his faire land: whoſe fift inuaſion in his firſt yeere happened; which drew the Saxons ciuill warres vnto a conſtrained peace, hauing more then they could well doe to defend their liues from their ſlaughtering ſwords, or to ſaue their vniuſtly gotten land from the ſpoiles of thoſe common enemies; who, not like Conquerours, but deſtroying Caterpillers, left nothing vndeuoured whereſoeuer they came, and had now begunne their mercileſſe depopulations in diuers places at once, ſo that the diſtracted Engliſh were to ſeeke where was moſt need firſt to withſtand.

Wil. Malmesbury.

(3) At Hampton & Porteſmouth many of theſe Norway Pirates had entred; at Hampton with their ouerthrow, at Porteſmouth with victory; & the ſame time at Carrum, a Troupe of theſe Danes diſcomfited King Ethelwolfes power. The next yeare at Merſeware, Lindſey, in Eaſt-Angle, and Kent, they did much miſchiefe, and harried all the Country before them: yet in his tenth yeare at Pedredeſmouth, the Somerſet and Dorſetſhiere men gaue them a memorable ouerthrow, vnder the conduct of Earle Enwulfe, Biſhop Adelſtan, and Oſred their captaines.

Simon Dunelm. Hen. Hunting.

An.Do.838.

(4) But in the ſixteenth yeare of this king, the great Planet Mars ſeemed to predominate continually, and Fortune to caſt the chance of victory euer on his ſide: for two hundred and fifty ſhips, (ſome reckon a hundred more) entred into Thamiſis mouth and ſet on ſhore an infinite number of theſe deſtroying Danes. London and Canterbury they had ſacked and left waſt, had pierced into Mercia, and chaſed Berthulfe their king out of his Country, and now in Southery had pitched their battle, as able and reſolute to abide all the power of the Engliſh; whither king Ethelwolfe with his ſonne prince Ethelbald repaired, and tooke the field at the place called Ocley; wherein after a long and ſore fight, the victory fell to the Engliſh, with ſuch ſlaughter of theſe Norway inuaders, as is incredible to report, and the ſame held as great and famous, as euer had hapned in the land before.

Henry Hunt. Aredus Rival.

(5) With the like ſucceſſe his Brother Athelſtan king of Kent, fought with the Danes at Sandwich, where chaſing them to ſea, tooke nine of their ſhips; and in Deuonſhiere, Earle Ceorle at VVinleſhore ſo ouerthrew their whole power, that in deſpaire they with-drew themſelues into the Ile of Thanet, where they made their abode all the winter ſeaſon; and if deſtiny had not withſtood the Engliſh, the Danes had beene expulſed for euer. But the Saxons seeming cleared of this common enemy, fell to their wonted quarrels with the euer depreſſed Britaines, againſt whom Burthred the Mercian obtained the aſſiſtance of King Ethelwolfe in his eighteenth yeare, whoſe daughter Ethelſwith hee had obtained in mariage; whereby for a while was encreaſed the fame and power of that valiant, but vnfortunate King.

Simon. Dun.

See Chap. 20. Sect. 20.

(6) In this State the affaires of the land ſtood vnto the nineteenth yeare of King Ethelwolfes raigne, who now remembring his former Eccleſiaſticke profeſſion, ordained that tithes and Lands due to holy Church ſhould bee free from all Tributes or Regall ſeruices; and in great deuotion went himſelfe to Rome, where hee was both honourably receiued, and entertained the ſpace of a whole yere; in which time hee new built the Engliſh Schoole that Offa the Mercian before had there founded, and lately was fired, bearing the name of Thomas the Holy; confirming alſo his Grant of Peter pence, and further couenanting in lieu of his Kind entertainement to pay yeerely three hundred markes to Rome, thus to hee emploied; one hundred to Saint Peters Church, an other hundred to Saint Pauls Light, and the third to the Pope: the Bride that euermore muſt be kiſſed and largely paid.

VVil. Malmsbury. Simon Dun.

(7) His returne from Rome was through France, and being a Widower, hee there married Iudith the moſt beautifull daughter of Charles the Bald then Emperour; in honour of whom in his owne Court, he euer placed her in a Chaire of Eſtate, with all other maieſtall complements of a Queene, contrary to the law of the weſt-Saxons for Ethelburgaes offence, formerly made. Which his doing ſo diſliked the Nobles, that Prince Ethelbald his eldeſt Sonne, Adelſtan Biſhop of Shirborne, and Ermulfe Earle of Somerſet roſe vp rebelliouſly in Armes and ſought to depoſe him; yet by mediation of friends, the matter came to a comprimize, and the land to be diuided betwixt the Father and Sonne, but with ſuch partiality that the better part weſt-ward was allotted to Ethelbald: which vnequality gaue great ſuſpition, that this reuolt was rather grounded vpon ambition, then any inclination they had for the defence of their lawes, which commonly is the pretence and vaile for all diſloyall attempts of ſeditious ſubiects againſt their ſoueraigne Lords.

Wil. Malmsb.

(8) Howſoeuer it was, long after this he liued not, but left his Monarchy vnto his eldeſt ſonne Ethelbald: and by will appointed Ethelbert his ſecond, to be King of Kent and Eſſex, which countries he had conquered. He raigned twenty yeares, one moneth, and nine dayes, and deceaſed at a place called Stamrige, the thirteenth day of Ianuary, in the yeare of our Lord, eight hundred fifty ſeauen, being the twenty one of his raign. His body was firſt buried at the place of his deceaſe, and afterwards remoued into the Cathedrall Church at Wincheſter.

Ethelwolfes time of raigning.

His wiues.

Osburgs parents.

(9) Osburg, the firſt wife of king Ethelwolfe, was the daughter of a Nobleman named Oſlake, who had the Office of Creat Butler of England, and was deſcended of the ſtocke of Stuffe and Withgar two brethren, being noblemē of the people called Iutes, who were the firſt Princes of the Ile of VVight; and Nephewes to Cherdike, and coſen germans to Kenrike the firſt and ſecond kings of the VVeſt-Saxons, and the third and fourth Monarches of the Engliſhmen. She was the ſecond kings wife that was debarred of the title and place of Queene. Shee deceaſed three years before the king her husband, in the ninteeenth yeare of his raigne, being the yeare of Chriſts Natiuity eight hundred fifty fiue.

Iudith a ſecond wife.

(10) Iudith his ſecond wife, was the daughter of Charles the Emperour, and king of France, as wee haue ſaid: her Mother was Queene Ermentrude, the daughter of Vodon Earle of Orleance. Shee was a Lady of paſſing beauty, and marryed to this king in France; and when ſhee came into England was receiued with the title and place of a Queene, in abolishment of the peruerſe law of the Weſt-Saxons, made againſt the Kings Wiues, as before was touched. She was his wife three yeares, and ſuruiued him without any iſſue.

Ethelbald the firſt Sonne.

(11) Ethelbald, the eldeſt ſonne of King Ethelwolfe and of Lady Osburg his firſt wife, was brought vp in his youth iu the exerciſe of warre, and ſerued vnder his Father in the great victory obtained againſt the Danes at Ocley in Surry, in the yeare eight hundred fifty one: afterwards hee turned his force againſt his Father; and at his returne from Rome, practiſed to defeat him of his Kingdome, and was ready to haue giuen him battaile, had not his father parted with him his Dominion.

Ethelbert the ſecond ſonne.

(12) Ethelbert, the ſecond ſon of King Ethelwolfe and Lady Oſburg his firſt wife, was in the life time of his Father, after the deceaſe of his vncle Ethelſtan, appointed and placed his Succeſſor in his Kingdome ouer the South-Saxons, the Kentiſh, and the Eaſt-Saxons, without any mention or meaning (as it ſeemeth) that he ſhould intermeddle further with any other part of England. Notwithſtanding after the death of his brother Ethelbald, it was generally holden of all men for law, equity, and reaſon, that he ſhould ſucceed him in the Monarchy: and ſo he did, with the conſent of his brethren, and without reſiſtance, or contradiction of any other.

Ethelred a third ſonne.

(13) Ethelred the third ſonne of King Ethelwolfe and Lady Osburg his firſt wife, had by the diſpoſition of his Father in his laſt will, the one halfe of his Fathers proper inheritance; which was all ſuch land as King Egbert his Grandfather had before hee was King, and was no part of the Demaines of the Kingdome; and this was diuided betwixt him and his brother Elfred, as the kingdome was betweene their elder Brethren Ethelbald and Ethelbert: with an intent that this Ethelred ſhould ſucceed his brother Ethelbald in the kingdome of the weſt-Saxons; notwithſtanding, his brother Ethelbert, after the deceaſe of King Ethelbald, entred into the other part, adoining it to his former kingdome, and was king of the whole, and after left it entire to this Ethelred, who ſucceeded him in the Monarchy.

Elfred a fourth ſonne.

(14) Elfred the fourth ſonne of King Ethelwolfe and of Lady Osburg his firſt wife, was borne at wantage in Barkeſhiere, in the yere of our Lord God, eight hundred forty nine; and the thirteenth of his fathers raign. Being a child of fiue yeeres old, he was ſent very honourably attended to the City of Rome, wher Leo the fourth then Biſhoppe confirmed him, was his Godfather at the confirmation, and annointed him to the expectation of a kingdome. Growne in yeares, he grew ſo in diſcretion, magnanimity and fauour of all men, that in the ſucceſſiue raignes of his three elder Brethren, he ruled as a Vice-roy or ſecondary king vnder euery of them, and after them at the laſt ſucceeded in the Engliſh Monarchy.

Ethelſwith a daughter.

(15) Ethelſwith, the daughter of King Ethelwolfe and Lady Osburg, was maried to Burthred the twentieth King of Mercia, which mariage was ſolemnized at the towne of Chippingham in VViltſhiere, in the moneth of Aprill, and yeare of Chriſts Natiuity eight hundred thirty fiue, and the fifteenth of her father raigne; but within twenty two years after, they were both forced by the Danes to abandon their kingdom, and departed into Italy, where the king died the ſame yeare in the Engliſh Colledge at Rome: ſhee liued after him fifteene yeares in the habite of a Nunne, at the City of Padua, and there died, and was honourably buried in the yere of our Lord God eight hundred eighty nine, which was the eighteenth yeare of her brother King Elfreds raigne.

Neote a ſuppoſed ſonne.

(16) Neote, ſuppoſed by Iohn Capgraue the Legend writer, to bee the ſonne of King Ethelwolfe, was in his youth brought vp at Glaſtenbury vnder Dunſtan, who was afterward Archbiſhop of Canterbury. He proued a man of great learning, and was one of the firſt Readers of Diuinity in the Vniuerſity of Oxford, at the foun-foundation, or as as ſome will haue it, the reſtauration thereof by King Elfred; hee planted a Monaſterie in Cornwall, whereunto hee vſed for deuotion and ſtudious meditations often to withdraw himſelfe, which of his abode there, was afterward called Neoteſtocke; and when hee was dead, his body was with great honor enterred in the County of Huntingdon, at a place then called Anulfesberie, and afterward in regard of his enterment, Saint Neotes, and now Saint Needes. ETHELBALD THE TVVENTIETH KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, AND THE TWENTY ONE MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS ACTS, AND RAIGNE.

Monarch. 21

CHAPTER XXXIII.

An. Do. 857. Flores, Wigorn.

Ethelbald, the eldeſt ſonne of king Ethelwolfe, hauing had part of the kingdome in the life time of his Father, after his death entred vpon the whole, and was the twentieth king of the Weſt-Saxons, and the twenty one Monarch of the Engliſhmen, beginning his reigne in the yeere of Chriſts incarnation eight hundred fifty ſeuen.

His wars againſt the Danes.

(2) His youth he had ſpent in the exerciſe of war, hauing made proofe of valour in his ſeruice againſt the Danes in many battles; and likewiſe attempted (though not in ſo good a cauſe) to haue fought againſt his own father. Which his aſſaies, as they ſeemed violent and vnnaturall, yet beeing in the quarrell of the Weſt-Saxons law, enacted in preiudice of their Queenes, he was both ſided and approued, as hath been ſaid.

Wil. Malmsbury.

(3) But howſoeuer vnwilling hee was this faire Queene ſhould [illegible]tate by his fathers ſide, yet contrary to all lawes either of God or man, hee laid her by his owne, and by nuptiall rites, brought her to his ſinfull and inceſtuous bed. Which act, though foule enough, ſome haue made worſe, in reporting his Wife to be his own Mother, whom King Ethelwolfe kept for his Concubine. And ſurely this his ſinne was not long vnpuniſhed by the ſhortneſſe of his raigne and life, leauing no other memory of his acts, beſides this foule blot to his faire name.

The time of his raigning.

(4) His raigne was onely two yeeres and an halfe, and death chanced vpon the twentieth day of December, the yeere of Chriſts aſſuming our fleſh, eight hundred and ſixty. His body was firſt buried at Shirburne in the County of Dorſet, where at that time was the Cathedrall Church and Epiſcopall See; but afterwards was remoued and enterred at Salesburie, in the County of Wiltſhire.

His wife.

1. Cor. 5. 1.

(5) Iudith, the Wife of King Ethelbald, was the widow of his owne Father, a moſt vnlawfull matrimony contracted againſt all law of God or of nature; which being both diſſolued and puniſhed by the haſty death of the King, and ſhee returning towards her father and Country in Flanders, was rauiſhed by Baldwin the Foreſter of Arden in France, and by him forcibly kept vntill ſhee conſented to become his wife, who in regard of that marriage, when he was reconciled to the Emperor Charles her Father, was by him created the firſt Earle of Flanders, by whom ſhe had iſſue Baldwin the ſecond, who eſpouſed Lady Elfrid, the youngeſt daughter of Elfrid King of England; from whom, through fiue deſcents lineally, Maud queene of England, Wife to William the Conquerour, deſcended, and from her, all our Norman Engliſh Kings vnto this day.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

An.Do.860.

ETHELBERT, the ſecond ſonne of King Ethelwolfe, who had ſucceeded his Vncle Ethelſtan in the kingdome of the South-Saxons, Kentiſh, and Eaſt-Saxons, and for fiue yeeres continuance, ruled thoſe Countries with great equity and valour; after the deceaſe of his brother Ethelbald, ſucceeded him alſo both in the Weſt-Saxons kingdome, and the whole Lands Monarchy: whereof hee was the one and twentieth King, and the two and twentieth Monarch.

(2) His raigne began in the yeere after Chriſts natiuity, eight hundred ſixty, and was diſquieted from firſt to laſt by the inuaſions of the bloudy Danes. For preſently after his coronation, theſe common enemies entred the Land, ruinating all before them vnto the City Wincheſter, which they ſacked, and left it troden vnder their deſtroying feete, euen to the ground. But in their returne were encountred by the Barke-ſhire men, vnder the leading of Oſrick, Earle of Hampton, by whom they were vanquiſhed, the prey recouered, and a great number of thoſe Infidels ſlaine.

Hen. Hunting.

(3) In his firſt yeere alſo a nauie of Danes and Normans entred into the Iland Tanet, and began their wonted ſpoiles among thoſe people: whereupon the Kentiſh compounded their peace for a great ſum of money giuen. Notwithſtanding theſe miſcreants, which knew not God, gaue little regard to their promiſed couenants, and before the daies of truce were expired, like a ſudden floud ouer-bare all before them. Theſe their irruptions to withſtand, the Kentiſh then prepared, rather aduenturing themſelues vpon the chance of battell, then to reſt vpon a ſeeming truce, wherein their deſtruction was too apparant, and forthwith aſſembling all their powers together, ſet vpon thoſe truce-breakers, and with much ſlaughter forced them at length out of their Country.

The Kentiſhmen compound for their peace.

(4) But the date of King Ethelberts life being expired, hee yeelded his body to the courſe of nature, and his Kingdomes to his next brother, after he had raigned ouer the Kentiſh, South, and Eaſt-Saxons, the terme of ten yeeres, and had ſate Monarch of the whole onely fiue. He died the yeere of grace eight hundred ſixty ſix, and was honourably buried in the Cathedral Church of Shirborne in Dorſet-ſhire, by his brother King Ethelbald.

Ethelberts time of raigning.

His ſuppoſed Iſſue.

(5) Athelm, the brothers ſonne of King Elfred, mentioned in the laſt will and teſtament of the ſame King, ſeemeth by all likelihood to be the eldeſt ſon of this king Ethelbert, elder brother to the ſame king Elfred, although hee ſucceeded not his father in his kingdome. For in thoſe daies, if the kings ſonne were vnder age, the ſucceſſion went to the next brother; and if that brother left his ſonne at full age, then it went vnto him; otherwiſe it reuerted to the elder brothers ſonne.

Athelm the eldeſt ſonne.

(6) Ethelwald, ſurnamed Clito, which is a word of addition giuen to all the Saxon kings ſonnes of England; is mentioned in king Elfreds will to be his brothers ſonne, and is moſt likely to be the ſonne of this king Ethelbert: he prooued a moſt deadly enemy to his coſen king Edward, the ſonne of king Elfred his Vncle, deſtroying his townes in Dorſet-ſhire; and being driuen out of England, ioined himſelfe with the Danes, who made him their king in Northumberland, aud vnder his leading, greeuouſly aſſailed the Countries of the Eaſt-Saxons, Eaſt-Angles, and Mercians; wherein hee was laſtly ſlaine, the yeere of our Lord nine hundred and fiue, being the fourth of king Edward his coſen-germans raigne.

ETHELRED THE TVVO AND TWENTIEETH KING OF THE VVEST-SAXONS, AND THE TWENTY THIRD MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN, HIS ACTS, AND ISSVE.

Ethelred. Monarch 23

CHAPTER XXXV.

An. Do. 866.

Ethelred, the third ſonne of King Ethelwolfe, after the deceaſe of his brother ſucceeded him in his Dominions, and was in number the two and twentieth King of the Weſt-Saxons, and the twenty third Monarch of the Engliſhmen; hee beganne his raigne in the yere of our ſaluation eight hundred ſixty and ſixe, and for the time that hee was King, raigned in continual warres againſt the Pagan Danes, whoſe numbers now were greater, and footing ſurer in this land then formerly had beene.

Hunger and Hubbe.

(2) In the firſt yeere of his raigne, there arriued vpon the Engliſh coaſts a huge Army of theſe Danes, whereof Hungar and Hubba, men of incredible ſtrength and cruelty, were the Captaines: Theſe wintred in Eaſt Anglia, made truce with the inhabitants vpon certaine conditions, and forbare a time from their wonted rauening.

(3) But in the next yeere, the King beeing buſied to put backe a freſh inrode of Danes in the South and VVeſt of the Iland then entred; theſe deuourers tooke aduantage vpon the ciuill broiles commenced among the Northumbrians, who in theſe turmoiled times ſought to withdraw their ſubiection from the VVeſt-Saxons, and to ſet vp Kings againe of their owne. The foreſaid Captaines Hungar and Hubba, hauing in time of their truce ſtrengthned themſelues with new ſupplies of aid, marched further into the North, where finding the people vnprouided of ſtrength, and the two Kings Osbright and Ella of reconciled enemies to be made no ſure friends, they harried the Country before them, and entring Yorke ſlew the two Kings, with infinit number of the Engliſh; which City they conſumed with fire, and burnt therein all thoſe that had fled thither for ſuccour.

The Danes march Northward.

(4) The State thus ſtanding, and their forces encreaſing euery day, brought new feares vpon the inhabitants, when euery late victory with increaſe of Captiues and rich ſpoiles, miniſtred occaſion and meanes of ſome other conqueſt to follow; which theſe Pagans ſo purſued, till laſtly they ſet a ſubſtitute King to raigne vnder them, ouer all the North Borders beyond the riuer Tyne; and ſo retiring themſelues out of Northumberland into Mercia, came to Nottingham, which City they wonne, and therein wintred the third of King Ethelreds raigne, who with the aid of Burthred the Mercian King, conſtrained the Danes to ſue for peace, and ſafe departure, yeelding the City, and againe retyring themſelues ouer Tyne, remained in Yorke all the next winter. Ingulphus.

(5) The Summers opportunity approching, their wonted deſire for ſpoile was with it increaſed, and to cut off long trauell, theſe Danes by boates paſſed Humber, where Hungar and Hubba beganne with fire and ſword to lay all waſte before them, ſparing neither Perſon, ſexe nor age. The places reſpected for publike good, and ſacred Temples conſecrated onely to God, which all other Tyrants haue forborne, theſe ſauage men as the earths deſtroiers caſt downe and trampled vnder their prophane feete: among which for note were the goodly Monaſteries of Bradney, Crowland, Peterborow, Ely, and Huntington, all laid in leuell with the ground, and their Votaries, aſwell the Nunnes as the Monkes, murthered with their vnhumane and mercileſſe ſwords; to auoid whoſe barbarous pollutions, the chaſt Nunnes of Coldingham deformed themſelues to their laſciuious eys, by cutting off their vpper lips and noſes; but to euerlaſting remembrance they remaine moſt faire, and well beſeeming faces of pure Virgins. An. Do. 780. Flores Hiſtor.

(6) Theſe Pagans piercing further into the Iand, came into the territories of the Eaſt-Angles, wherein holy Edmund raigned King, whoſe Martirdome in moſt cruell manner they wrought, he conſtantly calling vpon the name of Chriſt; whereof wee haue already ready ſpoken, and ſhall bee occaſioned hereafter to ſpeake.

(7) But in the laſt yeare of this Kings raign, their raging power was moſt great: for with a new ſupply, two Daniſh Kings, Sreeg, and Halden, entred into Weſt-Saxia, and at Reading the Kings towne intrenched themſelues: theſe forraging the Country, were encountred with at Engleſield by Ethelwolfe Earle of Barkeſhiere, and his men, who in skirmiſh ſlew one of their leaders; and chaſed the reſt backe to their Trench.

(8) Theſe Danes fearing leſt delaies would proue dangerous, and knowing that the firſt ſucceſſe is commonly ſeconded with further courage of hope; foure dayes after ſhewed themſelues in field ready to fight: their hoaſt they deuided into two battalians; whereof the one was guided by two of their Kings, and certaine Earles were leaders of the other; which when the Engliſh perceiued, they alſo diuided theirs, whereof King Ethelred had the leading of the firſt, and Elfred his brother was Generall of rhe ſecond; the place was Aſſendon, where their Tents were pitched, and the day approached for bataile: King Ethelred in his Tent ſtaid ſo long in praiers that Elfred vpon a forward courage haſted to encounter the enemy, and that with a moſt fierce and ſharpe fight, wherein hauing ſpent the moſt of his ſtrengthes, and ready to decline, and giue backe: Ethelred manfully entred the battaile, and ſo ſeconded his brother, and ouer-tyred Souldiers, that hee made way by dint of his ſword through the thickeſt of their almoſt-conquering enemies, and with ſuch loſſe of the Daniſh bloud, drawne from the ſides of one of their Kings, fiue Earles, and an infinite number of the common Souldiers, that the ſtreames ther of ſeemed as an ouer-ſwelling tide, altogether to couer the face of the field, and is accounted for the nobleſt victory that the Engliſh till then had gotten of the Danes.

Aſſendon battle.

Scala Chronicon.

(9) Yet were not theſe Pagans therewith diſcouraged, but gathering more ſtrengthes and ſupplies from other parts; fourteene dayes after, made head againe againſt the Engliſh, and pitching downe their ſtandards at Baſing, abode the cõming of Ethelred and triall of battle: wherein ſucceſſe was altogether altered; for herein the Kings part was diſcomfited, and the Danes the winners of the day.

Baſing Batale.

(10) Thus both ſides borne vpon rage & hope, in their heate of bloud prepare for new fight. The Danes power was augmented with a further ſupply ſent from beyond Seas, and the Engliſh confirmed with hope of Succeſſe: Theſe meeting at Merton (two moneths after the battaile of Baſing) encountred each others both boldly and bloodily; wherein at firſt the Engliſh preuailed, and the Danes were chaſed; but their numbers the greater, and freſh ſupply maintaining their battaile, they recouered themſelues, and wonne the day; wherein King Ethelred receiued his deaths wound, with ſuch ſlaughter of his people, that little wanted the end of all encounters, to haue been afterwards attempted any more by the Engliſh.

Polydore Virg.

(11) Great was the valour and reſiſtance of this King; for in his ſhort time of Raigne as Writers record, no leſſe then nine ſet battales againſt the Danes he fought in one yeare, to the great effuſion of Chriſtian bloud, and to no little loſſe of the Daniſh power; for in his raigne fell of them one King, nine Earles, and of the common ſort without number.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

An.Do.872.

Marianus. Florentius.

ELfred, or Alfred, the fourth ſonne of King Ethelwolfe, though he had beene annointed king at Rome by Pope Leo in his young years & fathers life time, yet raigned he in no part of his dominions, before the deaths of all his Brethren, vnder whome hee ſerued in moſt of their warres, aſſiſting them likewiſe in all their counſels. The land now miſerably torne by the cruell intruſions of the bloudy Danes was left vnto him, both to redeeme, and to raigne ouer, by the death and Teſtament of king Ethelred his laſt brother.

(2) Hee beganne his raigne in the yeare of his age twenty two, and of our Lord God eight hundred ſeuenty two, being crowned in the City of VVincheſter, the twenty third king of the VVeſt-Saxons, and the twenty fourth Monarch of the Engliſhmen: but of ſome Hiſtorians he is famouſed by the ſtile of the firſt abſolute Monarch.

Aſſer.

(3) His raigne beganne with troubles and warre in defence of the land which the Pagan Danes intended to deſtroy; and though his powers were ſmall, yet was he forced into the field within one moneth after his coronation; the place was Wilton in the County of Wiltſhiere, on the ſouth-banke of the riuer VVily: where the Danes at firſt gaue backe and fled. But ſeeing the fewnes of their purſuers, reenforced their battle, and got the field, with whom the VVeſt-Saxons entred league, and compounded for their departure from among them.

Speculum hiſt. Ricardus Cirancestrencis.

(4) Theſe Rouers then with their aſſociates at Reading, got themſelues into London, where they wintred (with whom the Mercians likewiſe compounded for their peace; which proued ſhortly to bee the deſtruction of their princely blood; and laſtly, the lands ſubuerſion by a forraine Nation. For the Danes hauing got footing in the North, the Weſt, and the South of this land, (vnto whoſe aide many new-come gueſts from their Eaſterne countries were arriued vnder the leading of other three Kings, Gurthrun, Esketel, and Ammond) all together ſet their griping tallents with ſuch faſt hold vpon Mercia, that at Rependon they conſtrained Burthred the King with his Queene Elſwith out of the land, and in his ſtead placed a King of their owne choiſe, vpon condition to deliuer vp the ſame againe vnto them when they would demaund it.

Mat. Weſt.

Polychro. lib. 6. c. 1

(5) In the fourth yeere of King Elfred their armies diuided themſelues into two parts, the one of them guided by King Halden, returned into Northumberland; where hee beſtowed that Country among his followers, and therein remained for two yeeres continuance, doing much harmes both to the Engliſh and Picts. The other part led by the laſt new-come King, came to Grandbridge, where they wintered and ſpoiled the Country, and there ſpreading themſelues as Graſhoppers vpon the face of the earth, eate vp all where they came; ſo that King Elfred was enforced to compound for their departure out of his kingdome Weſt-Saxia; to which couenants they promiſed and ſwore; yet contrary to both, tooke into Deuonſhire, and wintred at Exceſter: vnto whom a further ſupply by ſea ſought to ioine themſelues, but met which ſuch boiſterous blaſts, that one hundred and twenty of their ſhips were caſt away by tempeſt at Swanwicke vpon our coaſts, and their land-army marching towards Exceſter, were there welcommed with ſo ſharpe an encounter by King Elfred, that they gaue him both pledges and oath to depart with all ſpeed.

(6) But Fortune euer dallying with them whom ſhee meanes to down-caſt, ſet the chance of loſſe preſently sently vpon the Saxons side: for now the three Kings, Gurthrun, Esketel, and Ammond thought it not good to let Elfred thus rest, and thereupon drew their forces westwards towards him, where at Chipingham (a Mannor of his) they wintered, and compelled the West-Saxons there, either to yeeld, or to forsake the Country.

An.Do.876.

(7) King Elfred therefore, with such strength as he had, hasted towards them, and seuenteene miles from Bristow pitched downe his tents euen in the face of the enemy; where betwixt these fierce nations a great battaile was fought, to the infinite losse of bloud on both sides, and that vpon such equall departure, as neither could challenge to bee masters of the field; yet the report went, that King Elfred was discomfited, which turned greatly to his aduantage; for thereupon many of the English hasted to his succour, left the ouerthrow of him should be the bane of them all; his strengthes thus renued with an vnexpected supply, no time was detracted to stay the Danish rage, who were now returned further into the heart of the land, and at Abington by Oxford had pitched their standerds for fight.

Abington.

(8) Thither the English repaired, & the next morning Elfred ordered his Army; neither were the enemies vnprepared, but with braues stood ready to receiue the encounter. The battaile ioyned, continued with such losse of bloud, that it is accounted one of the sorest that euer betwixt them before had beene fought, and onely parted by the approch of the night, neither party challenging the honor of the day, the losse being so great vpon both sides.

Seuen Battails in one yeare.

Seuen of these battles are reported to be fought in that yeare, whereby both their strengths were much abated, and their spilt bloud soo cooled their liuers; that lastly they concluded vpon a peace: one article was this, that the Danes should admit no more of their nation to arriue in this Iland: but how soone that was broken, the sequels did shew.

An.Do.876. Simon Dunel.

(9) For in the yeare eight hundred seuenty six (saith Simon Dunelmensis) Rollo a noble man of Denmarke with a great army entred into England, with no lesse spoile and destruction then other of those Danes before him had done, notwithstanding the truce: with whom king Elfred met, and gaue him so hoat welcome, that he liked not greatly his entertainment) & being warned (forthsooth) in his sleepe that better fortune attended him in France, hee left his conntrymen to tugge with the English.

(10) The Danes then accounting the peace to be broken, like Bees from the Hiue, infest all the land, insomuch that this vndaunted King Elfred was ofttimes brought to such extremities, that hee hid himselfe out of sight, and in the Fens and Marsh grounds was forced with such small companies as he had, to liue by fishing, fowling, and hunting of wilde beasts for his food, hauing no more of his great Monarchy left him but Somerset, Hampton, and Wiltshires only, neither yet them free from the incursions of the Danes.

Elfrids exigents.

(11) The solitary place of his most residency, was an Iland inclosed with the two riuers, Thone and Parret, at their meeting in the County of Sommerset, commonly called Edelingsey, where he in very poore attire disguised, was entertained into a Cowheards house (if not into his seruice,) where on a time as he sate by the fire in trimming of his bow and shafts, a cake of dow baking vpon the hearth before him, chanced to burn; the Cowheardesse coming in, and seeing him mind more his bow then his bread, in a great fury cast away both his bow and arrowes, and checking him as her Groom, said, Thou fellow, doest thou see the bread burne before thy face, and wilt not turne it? and yet art thou glad to eate it before it bee halfe baked? Litle suspecting him to be the man that had beene serued with farre more delicate cates.

Asser. Spe. Histo. Ric. Ciren.

(12) But this Prince, the very mirrour of Princes, more minding the wealth of his subiects, then the maiesty of State, disguised himselfe in the habite of a common Minstrell, and in person repaired to the Danes Campe, who lay like Senacheribs, wallowing in wantonnesse, and secure in their owne conceit from impeach of danger; which Elfred a most skilfull Musitian, and an excellent Poet, did not a little egge on by his sweet musicke, and songs of their valour, so that he was suffered to passe vncontrolled into the company of their Princes, at banquets, or elsewhere: whereby he both saw their negligent security, and by diligent obseruance learned the designes that in their counsels they entended.

Polydore Virg. Fabian.

(13) Returning to his comfortlesse company, he told them the condition of the hostile Campe, & how easie it was to recouer againe their decaied estates: whereupon shewing himselfe to his subiects, vnto whose sight nothing could be more ioyous; on the suddaine set vpon the careless Campe of the Danes, and made thereof a very great slaughter, to the great terrour of others in other parts, that had accounted him dead long before.

Henry Hunt. An.Do.878.

(14) Hubba, that had harried the English, and now rowzed vpon the newes of King Elfreds victory and life; with thirty three ships sailed from Wales, and arriuing in the mouth of Tau, where it falleth into the Seuerne Sea, assaied to take there the then-strong Castle called Kinwith, vnto whom the Deuonshiere men gaue battle, and slew eight hundred and eighty persons of their retinue; where died the Danish King Hubba, whose corps being there interred vnder a great heape of copped stones, gaue name to the place, and was called Hubblestone. There and then was taken the Danish much esteemed Banner, called Reafan, wherein a Rauen was purtraied wrought in needle-worke, (so Asserius Meneuensis reporteth) by the three sisters of Hubba and Hungar the daughters of Lothbroke (that is, Leather-breach) the Dane: In regard whereof, as also for the opinion of good lucke, as they tooke it, it was euer born before them in their wars.

(15) These aduerse proceedings of the Danes designes, especially falling when the game was neere wonne, made them suspect, how faire soeuer the ball lay to hand, yet fortune would serue it in the end to their losse: for Elfred now flocked vnto vpon euery side, beganne to build fortresses behind his backe, and forward to march with his conquering sword: whereupon the Danes sent to him for Peace, and deliuered him hostages, vpon assurance that they meant as they spake: The Conditions were, that their King should receiue Baptisme, and the great Army of the Danes quietly to depart out of the land.

Danes send for peace.

(16) Whereupon Gurmound or Gurthrun the Danish King repaired to the new built Castle of Edelingsey vnto King Elfred, and in the place then called Alre, was washed in the lauer of Baptisme, whom Elfred receiued for his God-son by the name of Athelstane, and gaue him in free gift the Country of East-Angels. In the same fountaine of grace (saith Simon Dunelmensis) thirty of the chiefe Danish Nobility were initiated: vpon whom the truly Christian King Elfred bestowed many rich guifts: And that the limites of the English might bee free from their incursions, thus the confines of King Elfreds kingdome were laide forth, as we find it in the end of those Lawes that Elfred published, whose words are these: Let the bounds of our Dominion stretch from the riuer Thamisis, and from thence to the water of Lea, euen vnto the head of the same water, and so forth straight vnto Bedford: and finally, going along by the riuer of Ouse, let them end at Watling street.

(17) But so farre were the Danes from performance of couenants, that in this eight yeere of King Elfreds raigne, and the eight hundred seuenty nine after Christ, this Gurmund and his company wintered at Chipnam in Wiltshiere, and a new supply of these Pagans (known by the name of the Wiccingi) wintred at Fulham neere London; yet after vpon better aduice, the one went into their assigned circuit, and the other other departed to the realme of France; and ſo to his twelfth yeare the land tooke ſome reſt, that had been kept long waking by the loud ſound of warre.

(18) In the yeare of Grace eight hundred eighty fiue, theſe laſt retired Danes finding France not fitting their purpoſe, returned into Kent, and put into Medway, where on his Eaſt ſide they began a fierce ſiege vnto the City Rocheſter, before whoſe gate they built a ſtrong Caſtle: Thither King Elfred haſted, before whoſe power theſe Danes could not ſtand, but were forced to their ſhippes, and backe againe into France.

An.Do.889. Aſſerius. Flo.VVigorn.

(19) Whereupon the King remooued his ſiege vnto London, whence all the Danes fled (as Wolues abide not the preſence of the Lion,) the inhabitants reioycing to ſee the face of their King: which City hee reſtored to her former liberty and beauty, and committed the cuſtody thereof vnto Ethelred Duke of Mercia, that had maried his daughter the Lady Ethelfred, whoſe title the king had maintained againſt Colwolphus, made king thereof by the Danes. Wherupon both Kent, the South-Saxons, and Weſt-Saxons came willingly, and ſubmitted themſelues to King Elfred, The Eaſt-Angles being gouerned, or rather ſpoiled by Athelſtan the Chriſtned Dane, who after twelue yeeres raigne there died, and was buried at Hadley in Suffolke.

(20) But in the one and twentieth of his raigne, and of Chriſts Incarnation eight hundred ninety two: thoſe rouing Danes returned out of France, and againe arriued in Kent in the mouth of the riuer Limen, with two hundred and fifty ſhips, which they drew foure miles into the great wood, then called Andreads Weald, and there deſtroied a Caſtle that ſtood for defence, building another more ſtrong at Apulder, wherein they kept. At the ſame time likewiſe entred one Haſtings, a Nobleman of Norway, with eighty ſhips; but with a fairer ſhew as hee entended, for he ſent his oath vnto Elfred not to annoy any part of his dominions; and withall his two ſonnes to bee baptized: which king Elfred accepted, himſelfe becomming the Godfather of the one, and Duke Ethelred of the other; and both they, and his Ambaſſadors returned with rich gifts. Againſt theſe Kentiſh inuaders, King Elfred fought a great battaile at Fernham, neere vnto Aelefford, wherein hee wounded their king, and forced his Army to flee ouer Thameſis; in paſſing whereof, through ouermuch haſt & great feare, many of them were drowned, and they that eſcaped, fled to an Iland called Brekleſey incloſed about by the riuer Colne.

(21) Newes then being brought into the Eaſt, that the Danes from Northumberland had infeſted the Weſt, and with a ſtrong ſiege begirt the City Exceſter: Elfred left for Generall his ſonne in law Duke Ethelred, whileſt he with a ſtrong power went to ſuppreſſe their rage: who hearing of his comming, brake vp their ſiege, and were gone: vpon the aduantage of his abſence, periured Haſtings then wrought, who out of his new built Caſtle at Beamfield, made ſpoile of the kings people, and forraged all the Country before him. Whereupon Duke Ethelred aſſembled a power, & firſt aſſailing his wel ſtored Caſtle, tooke thence his wife and two ſonnes, with exceeding ſpoiles of gold, ſiluer and garments; all which were preſented vnto King Elfred at his returne to London: who out of his princely magnanimity, ſent backe to Haſtings his wife and two ſonnes; becauſe (ſaid hee) ſhee was no warriour, and his two ſonnes were his God-children: whereupon Haſtings repaired his Caſtle, and ioined with the other Danes that lay at Apulder.

(22) Thoſe then that had fled but lately from Exceſter, in their returne met with other their conſorts, and rouing about the coaſt for their prey, fell laſtly vpon the ancient City Cheſter, which preſently they beganne to ſacke and burne. But the country inhabitants comming to the reſcue, begirt them about with their hoaſt, and foreſtalled the paſſages of all ſupply of victuals; ſo that for want of food, the Danes were conſtrained to eate vp their horſes, and vpon compoſition thence to depart.

An.Do.897. Floren. Wigorn. Marian. Scotus.

(23) Thence fetching a compaſſe all along the coaſts of Wales, in the ſame yeare they arriued in Eſſex, being the twenty foure of king Elfreds raigne: and in the Winter following, drew their ſhips by the Thameſis into the riuer Lea, by which they paſſed in thoſe light Pinnaces twenty miles North-ward into the land, and built them a fortreſſe at the place called weare*: thither forthwith the King repaired, and pitched his tents before his enemies in the ſame place; who ſeeing their ſtrength, & the dãger of long ſiege, did that by policy, which power could not ſo ſodainely do: for he diuided the riuer into ſundry ſtreames, whereby the Chanell was made vnnauigable, and the Shippes bedded in the mudde, lay rather to their annoiance then defence. The former experience of their hunger-ſtarued beſiege made them more fearefull to fall into the like; & therefore in great haſte departed their fortreſſe, leauing their wiues and children to the mercy of the Engliſh. Neither ſtayed they till they came vnto the borders of Wales, when at Cartbridge vpon Seuerne they built another Caſtle, and lay there all the next winter.

(24) Long there they ſtayed not, without diſlike of their lodgings and cold entertainments, but that they returned to their wonted ſpoiles, and diuiding themſelues, ſome to Northumberland, and ſome into Eaſt-Anglia, like Locuſts eate vp all as they went: whoſe breath as it were, ſo infected the aire, that for three yeares following a great mortality raigned both vpon men and beaſts, and ended not much before the death of this incomparable Prince: which hapned to the great ſorrow of his ſubiects vpon wednesday the twenty eight of October, when hee had raigned twenty nine yeares and ſix moneths, of his age fifty one, and yeare of Chriſt Ieſus nine hundreth and one.

(25) The vertues of this Prince are matchable to any that euer raigned before him, and exceed the moſt that euer raigned after him, both in ſeruice of God, whoſe Subſtitutes they are; in defence of his Country, which charge they all beare; in prouiding good lawes, the ſinewes of Kingdomes; and care of poſterities, from which no man is exempted.

Scal. Chr. Regiſt. Hyde. Tho. Rudburne. Rod. Hig.

The day and night containing twenty foure howers, he deſigned equally to three eſpeciall vſes, and them obſerued by the burning of a taper ſet in his Chappell or Oratory; eight howres hee ſpent in contemplation, reading and prayers; eight, in prouiſion for himſelfe, his repoſe and health; and the other eight in the affaires of his common-wealth and ſtate. His Kingdome hee likewiſe diuided into Shieres, Hundreds and Tithings, for the better ordering and adminiſtring of iuſtice, and for the abandoning of theeues, which had formerly increaſed by the meanes of long warres; whereby notwithſtanding the multitude of Souldiers continually imployed, it is reported that a Virgin might trauaile alone in his daies through all his Dominions, without any violence offered; and that bracelets of gold were hanged in the high waies, and no man ſo hardy as to take them away.

Hee was a moſt zealous, and ſtudious protector and prouider for the Clergy, Widdowes, and Orphans, liberall of his goods, wiſe, temperate and iuſt, valiant, patient in aduerſities, and euer religious in the ſeruice of God. A moſt learned Prince, a skilfull Muſition, and an excellent Poet: the beſt lawes befitting his Subiects he tranſlated into the Engliſh tongue: as alſo the Paſtorall of Gregory, the hiſtory of Beda, and Boetius his Conſolation of Philoſophy; the Pſalmes of Dauid (whoſe godly raigne he propoſed to himſelfe for imitation) hee likewiſe began to tranſtate, but died before he could finiſh the ſame. And ſo great a deſire had he vnto learning, that (as Alfredus Riuallenſis witneſſeth) he publiſhed this Act: Wee will and command, that all Freemen of our Kingdom, who soeuer possessing two hides of land, shall bring vp their sons in learning till they bee fifteene yeres of age at least, that so they may be trained to know God, to be men of vnderstanding, and to liue happily: for, of a man that is borne free, and yet illiterate, we repute no otherwise then of a beast, or a brainelesse body, and a very sot. And for the furtherance of this his roiall intent, consorted with Aserius Meneuensis, Grimbald, Iohn Scot and others: neither permitted he any in office in Court, or elsewhere, vnlesse he were learned, which incited his nobles to the earnest pursuit of learned arts; and to traine vp their children in good letters. His buildings were many, both to Gods seruice, and other publike vse, as at Edelingsey a Monastery, at Winchester a New-Minster, and at Shaftsbury a house of Nunnes, wherein hee made his daughter Ethelgeda the Abbesse. But the foundation of the Vniuersity of Oxford (which hee began in the yeare of our Lord eight hundred ninety fiue, and whose lectures he honoured with his owne presence) surmounteth all his others, to the continuance of posterities, a liuing spring and gracious fountaine, whence issue the streames of all knowledge, that abundantly haue watered both this and other kingdomes.

(27) Some alleadge that the malice of those chanons against him, was for displeasure that he placed ouer thē a rude Swineheard named Denewlphus, whom he made their Bishop; but the ground of that assertion seemeth vnwarrantable by the relation of Wigornensis, & also of Tho. Rudburne; the first of which saith, that Elfred caused him to be trained vp in learning, and the later, that after long study, he attained to the degree of a Doctor of Diuinity in the Vniuersity of Oxford, and was afterward made Bishop of Winchester by the King. For doubtlesse at that time the Bishops of Rome had not deuested our Kings of that prerogatiue.

Elfwith

(28) Elfwith the wife of King Elfred was the daughter of Ethelred surnamed Muchel, that is, the Great, an Earle of the Mercians, who inhabited about Gainesborough in Lincolnshiere: her mother was Edburg a Lady borne of the Bloud roiall of Mercia. She was married vnto this King in the twentieth yeare of his age, being the second of the raigne of his brother King Ethelred; and was his wife twenty eight yeares, and liuing after him foure; died in the yeare of grace nine hundred and foure, and was buried in the Monastery of Nunnes which she had founded at Winchester; out of which afterwards King Henry the first took to his wife Maud the daughter of Malcolme King of Scots, by whom the roiall bloud of the ancient Kings of England became vnited to the Normans, whereby he wanne much loue of the English nation.

Malcolme King of Scots.

His issue.

Edward the eldest sonne.

Edward, the eldest sonne, and second child of King Elfred, and Queene Elfwith, was borne about the beginning of his Fathers raigne, in the yeere of our Lord eight hundred seuenty one: hee was brought vp in his Fathers Court, and carefully attended, and instructed by men of great vertue and knowledge, in learning, and in all other qualities, and exercises conuenient for Princes. He was maried, and had diuers children: being thirty yeeres of age before his Father deceased, and then succeeeded him in his Kingdome and Monarchy.

Ethelward the second sonne.

Ethelward, the second son, & fifth, and last child of King Elfred and Queene Elfwith, was borne about the midst of his Fathers raigne, and about the yeare of our Lord eighr hundred and eighty. Hee was in his youth by his Fathers appointment, and for the example of other young Nobles brought vp in the study of good Arts, at the vniuersity of Oxford, where (saith Th. Rudburne, and the Annales of Winchester) he became a man very learned, and a great Philosopher: he had of his Fathers gift by his last wil great liuings in the Counties of Deuon, Somerset, South-Hampton: he proued a man of great iudgement and wisedome, and liuing vntill he was aboue forty yeres old; hee died the sixteenth day of October, in the two and twenty yeare of his brother King Edwards raigne, Anno nine hundred twenty two, and was buried at VVinchester.

Rudburne Annales Sant. Swithuni.

Elfleda the eldest daughter.

Elfleda, the eldest daughter and first child of King Elfred, and Queene Elfwith his wife, was married to Ethelred Duke of Mercia, who in respect of this marriage was suffered to haue all roiall iurisdiction ouer that Country, in as ample manner as the Kings thereof had enioied; and after the decease of her husband, which happened in the yeere of our Lord nine hundred and twelue: shee continued the gouernment in the same sort eight yeares, with such resolution and valiant resistance of the common enemy (the Danes) that shee stood her brother Edward in great stead, as in the relation of his life shall be further shewed. She died the fifteenth of June nine hundred and nineteene, and was buried in S. Peters Church at Glouceſter, leauing issue, a daughter, named Elfwin, whom King Edward her brother depriued of that Duchy which her owne mother enioyed, and he his crowne by her assistance.

Ethelgeda the second daughter.

Ethelgeda, the second daughter and fourth child of King Elfred and Queene Elfwith, was neuer married, but tooke vpon her the profession and vow of Virginity, and was by her fathers appointment made a Nunne of Shaftsbury in the County of Dorset, in the Monasterie there founded by him: who is also accounted the first of the Towne it selfe. Shee was afterward Abbesse of the house, and therein spent, and ended her life, and was there also buried.

Elfride the yongest daughter.

Elfride, the yongest daughter, and child of King Elfred and Queene Elfwith his wife, was married to Baldwin the second, surnamed the Bald, Earle of Flanders, sonne of Earle Baldwin the first, and Queene Iudith his wife, the widdow of King Ethelwolfe her Grandfather. Shee was his wife thirty yeeres and more; shee suruiued him and was a widdow eleuen yeeres: shee died the seuenth of Iune, in the yeere of our Lord nine hundred twenty nine, being the fift of the raigne of King Ethelstan her Nephew. She is buried by her husband in the Chappell of our Lady, within the Monastery of S. Peter, at the City of Gaunt. She had issue Arnulfe the third Earle of Flanders, progenitor of all the Earles of Flanders since his time, Adnulfe Earle of Boloigne and Terwin.

Chapter XXXVII.

An.Do.901.

NO greater were the griefes conceiued for the death of worthy Elfred, then were the hopes of the people in his ſonne Prince Edward, whoſe valour had beene often approued againſt the raging Danes, & whoſe vertues were both many and princely; not ſo learned as his Father, neither ſo patient to vndergoe his chance; but as glorious in martiall proweſſe, and as fortunate in al his fights; vnder whoſe hand the Danes euery where fell, and vnder his Monarchy all the Engliſh did ſtoope, excepting the Northumbrians.

Speculum hiſt. Ric. Ciren.

(2) He entred his raigne the yeare of Chriſts natiuity, nine hundred and one, and at Kingſton vpon Thames was crowned and annointed with holy oyle. The Daniſh warrs continuing in a ſucceſſiue manner, fell as it were hereditaryly from the Father vnto the Sonne, and ripened dayly towards their wiſhed harueſt. Beſides Ethelwald the ſonne of Ethelbert the vncle to this king Edward, young at his fathers deceaſe, and therefore perhaps held vncapable of gouernment, ſhewed now the bloſſoms of vnder-ſucking plants, whoſe fruits are neither plenteous nor pleaſant in taſte; for his humours euer working vpon diſcontents, drew his thought onely how to make the poſſeſſor fall.

Ethelwald his minority.

(3) He then entring action of rebellion, tooke the towne of Winborne neere vnto Bathe, and beſides the allegiance due to his Prince, in ſacrilegious manner brake the heſts of holy Church, in deflowring and taking a Votariſt to wife. Edward the elder, ſo called (it may be in regard of this his Oppoſite) with a ſelected Army repaired to Bathe, and thence prepared for the field: whoſe ſight was ſo cockatrice-like to his coſen-germans eye, that in the night he bade his Nun and Winborne adew, poſting to Northumberland, and proffering his ſeruice to the Danes that lay for aduantage of rapine and ſpoile.

(4) Him as a fitte inſtrument they created their King, and forward in hope of ſome proſperous ſucceſſe, paſſed through the Eaſt-Saxons, the Eaſt-Angles, and the Mercians Countries: and laden with robberies came to Crikelade in Wiltſhiere, whence they departed ouer Thamiſis to Baſingſtoke; and harrying the land before them, with triumph returned vnto Eaſt-Anglia. Edward thus endangered by theſe dreadfull enemies, gaue them no aduantage by lingering delaies, but followed their tract vnto Saint Edmunds Ditch, whence in his returne, the Danes gaue him battaile, and obtained the victory, though bought with the liues of Ethelwald and Cochricus their Kings, and loſſe of many Engliſh, which made Edward the readier to enter a truce with them about the fift of his raigne.

(5) That the Engliſh were moſt expert for warre in theſe daies, is witneſſed by their reſiſtance of thoſe ſturdy Danes, againſt whom the Commons many times with victory fought, without either King or Captaine to guide them: and they were likewiſe famous in other lands: for about this time it was, that the Engliſhmen at the perſwaſion of the Gothes, beſieged the great City Argilla in Barbary, which they wonne with ſuch ſlaughter of the enemy, and ſpoile of the towne; that for thirty yeares after it lay deſolate without inhabitants, whereby it was hoped that the Saracens would haue departed Europe, as Ioannes Leo Afer hath told vs, who according to the Saracens doth referre this ſiege to the three hundred and foureteenth of Mahomet Hegira, which meeteth with the yeare of Chriſts Natiuity, nine hundred and fiue.

The Danes breake truce with the Engliſh.

(6) The truce yet laſting, the Danes in Northumberland were nothing quiet, to ſtay whoſe irruptions king Edward ſent a great power, who harried the Country before them, and with much ſlaughter returned victorious. Theſe dalliances of Fortune made the Danes very deſperate, and therefore to ſtay the rowling ball before it ſhould paſſe their goale, they gathered their powers & entred Mercia, where with victory and ſpoile they raged for a time. But Edward to aid Ethelred his brother in law, and Earle of that Prouince, muſtered his men, and at Wodneſfield neere Wolfrune-hampton in Stafford ſhire gaue the battaile, wherein the Engliſh ſo behaued themſelues that the two Pagan kings Cowilfus & Healidine, the two Earles Vter and Scurſa, beſides other Nobles & Commons innumerable they ſlew: and now the clouds of theſe diſtemperatures being driuen backe, king Edwards Monarchy aſcended the Horizon, and the Sunne of his power beganne to ſhine very bright, therefore he ſeeking to hold what he had got, ſet his thoughts to ſecure his towns with Caſtles and walles of defence.

(7) Theſe his proceedings cauſed him to be both beloued and feared; but his mind ſtill free from any ambitions pride, as may appeare by the intercourſe betwixt Leolin Prince of Wales and himſelfe whereof Wal. Mapæus maketh mention as followeth. VVhat time Edward the Elder (ſaith he) lay at Auſteline, and Leolin Prince of Wales at Betheſley, intending a Parly, Leolin refuſed to come downe, or to croſſe the Seuerne: VVhereupon Edward tooke boat and entred the riuer towards him, which when Leolin ſaw, and knew who hee was, he caſt off his rich roabe wherewith he was clad, and which hee had prepared for that roiall aſſembly, and entred the riuer breaſt-hie, where claſping the boat with an imbrace, ſubmiſſiuely ſaid: Moſt wiſe and ſage King, thy humility hath ouercome my inſolency, and thy wiſedome triumphed ouer my folly; come, get vpon my necke, which I haue (foole as I am) lifted vp againſt thee, ſo ſhalt thou enter into that land which thy benigne mildnes hath made thine owne this day: and after he had taken him vpon his ſhoulders, he would needs haue him ſit down vpon his roiall roabe, and ſo putting his hands iointly into his, did him homage.

(8) In the twelfth yeare of his raigne, as Henry Huntington hath it; Ethelred Earle of Mercia, who had married Elfleda king Edwards ſiſter, departed this life, ſhe hauing borne him one onely daughter named Elfwen, whoſe trauell in childbirth was ſo grieuous, that euer after ſhe forbare the nuptial imbracements of her husband, alleadging that it was an ouer fooliſh pleaſure, which brought with it ſo great paines; and thereupon changing the wonted Affection of her ſexe from the bed vnto battaile, gouerned Mercia eight yeares after her husbands deceaſe, as another Zenobia, and did not a little aſſiſt her brother in his warres: for the VVelſh ſhe purſued as farre at Brekenoke, which ſhee tooke with their queene: from the Danes ſhee wonne the County of Darby, and aſſaulting the town vpon them, put her ſelfe in great danger; for enterpriſing to enter the Gate, ſhee was reſiſted by whole multitudes of Danes; notwithſtanding, ſhe perſiſted, & got entrance, in which encounter many died, and foure of her chiefe men of war, being Warders of her perſon, euen faſt by her ſide were ſlaine.

The Danes in Yorkeſhire ſhe conſtrained to be at her deuotion, ſo that ſome of them became her ſubiects, ſome vowed to attend in her aide, and ſome promiſed to be preſt at her diſpoſe. Her policie in warre proued euer the ſureſt; her counſell of State was regarded with the wiſeſt, and her prouidence in building, and repairing Cities for the weale-publike, or fortifying places for munition of warre exceeded others: which ſhee extended vpon Cheſter, Tamworth, Lichfield, Stafford, Warwicke, Shrewsbury, Wednesbury, Eadsbury, Finborow, Rimcorne, Brimsbery-Bridge, and others.

Many townes planted by her.

This renowned Lady giuing place vnto Nature, left the warres to bee continued by her brother; her daughter at the diſpoſe of her vncle, and her body to be buried at Gloceſter in the Monaſtery of S. Peter, which her husband and her ſelfe had formerly built.

(9) The laſt battaile of this King againſt theſe vnſatiate enemies, was in the Country of the Eaſt Angles, whereof Edricke the Dane was king; for hee intending new warres with the Engliſh, ſought to incite other Danes to his aide, whereof Edward hauing intelligence, preuented his purpoſe, by his ſodaine approch into thoſe parts.

Polydor.

Edricke therefore hauing all in a redineſſe, raſhly encountered with his enemy, and fought a fierce battaile to the great loſſe of his Army, and damage of his life; for returning to his Court after ſo foule a diſcomfiture, became odious to his owne ſubiects, who violently fel vpon him and murdered him; and themſelues brought low by ciuill diſſention were ſhortly made ſubiect to the Engliſh King Edward, and that Kingdome with Mercia, ioined vnto his VVeſt-Saxons. And now hauing raigned in great warres and honour the ſpace of twenty foure yeeres, deceaſed at Farringdon in Barkſhire, the yeare of Chriſts incarnation, 924. and was buried in the new-Monaſtery of VVincheſter, which his Father begunne, and himſelfe wholly finiſhed.

(10) Eguina the firſt wife of king Edward, was the daughter of a meane Gentleman named Bercher, whoſe eye-pleaſing feature & alluring beauty made her to be educated aboue the degree of her birth, and was brought vp by the nurſe of king Edward in tender affection and great eſteeme. It chanced Prince Edward in kindnes came to viſite his nurſe, where ſeeing the admirable beauty of the Maide, fell ſo farre in loue, that he tooke her to his wife without the conſent or knowledge of his father: In which regard ſhe is reputed by ſome Writers rather his Concubine then his queene, no other cauſe mouing them but her meane parentage, and ſecret making and keeping of this mariage, although there bee ſome good hiſtories and many likelyhoods to induce that ſhe was his lawfull Queene.

(11) Elfleda the ſecond wife of King Edward, was the daughter (as Mathew of Weſtminſter reporteth) of an Earle named Ethelhelme, and Aſſer the Biſhop of Sherborne maketh mention of an Earle in Wiltſhire among the Weſt-Saxons of the ſame, name; who was in great fauour with King Elfred, the father of this king, by whom hee was ſent Ambaſſador to carry his Almes to Stephen the ſixt, of that name Biſhop of Rome, in the yeere of our Lord 887. and by all probable conference of name, time, and place, hee ſeemeth to bee the man that was father to this Queene.

(12) Edgiua, the third wife of king Edward, was the daughter and heire of Earle Sigeline Lord of Meapham, Culings, and Leanham in Kent, who was there ſlaine in bataile againſt the Danes, Anno 927. Shee was maried vnto king Edward about the fourteenth yeare of his raigne, being the yeare of Grace, 916. She was his wife ten yeares, and after his death ſhee liued a widdow all the times of the raigns of King Ethelſtan her ſonne in law, of king Edmund, and king Edred her owne ſonnes, of king Edwy her Grand-child; and was liuing in the Raigne of king Edward another of her Grand-children, almoſt forty yeares after the death of her husband. It is writ of her that in the yeare of Grace, 959. ſhee offered her lands and euidences to Chriſt vpon his Altar at Canterbury. Elfred the ſecond ſonne.

(14) Elfred, the ſecond ſonne of King Edward and the Lady Eguina, is warranted by the teſtimony of the ſtory of Hyde, to haue been loued of his Father aboue all his other children, that he cauſed him in his owne lifetime to bee crowned King, and to ſit with him in his Seat of Eſtate, as his Partner in the Kingdome, and that he enioyed that great honour but for a ſmall time, deceaſing ſhortly after his creation; and long before his fathers death; and was buried in the New Monaſtery at Wincheſter; which afterwards was remoued to Hyde.

Within one yeere after her mariage, her husband deceaſed, and his ſon Guthfrid ſucceeded him in his Kingdome. Wherefore ſhe forſaking that Country, obtained of her brothers gift, the Caſtell of Tamworth, in the County of Warwicke, where ſhe began a Monaſtery of Nunnes, and therin liued, died, and was interred, and both the Monaſtery and Body afterwards was remoued from thence vnto Polleſworth.

Elfward the third ſonne.

(16) Elfward, the third ſon of King Edward, and the firſt of Queen Elfleda his ſecond wife, was born, as it ſeemeth, about the beginning of his fathers raigne. He was carefully brought vp in the ſtudy of Liberall Arts, and in all other princely qualities; ſo that it was expected he ſhould haue ſucceeded his father in the Kingdome: but preſently vpon his fathers deceaſe, he deceaſed himſelf in Oxford, and was buried at one time, and in one place with him in the New Monaſtery at Wincheſter, in the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus 924.

Buried at Wincheſter.

Edwine the fourth ſonne. Wil. Malmſ.

(17) Edwine, the fourth ſonne of king Edward, and the ſecond of Queene Elfleda his ſecond Wife, was very young when his father was buried, and his brother Ethelſtane crowned. Notwithſtanding a deep ieloſie poſſeſsing the king, that his title was too neere the Crown, he cauſed him to be put into a little Pinneſſe, without either Tackle or Oares, one only page accompanying him, that his death might be imputed to the waues: whence the young Prince ouercome with griefe, and not able to maſter his own paſsions, caſt himſelfe headlong into the ſea, & his dead body being driuen vpon the coaſts of Flanders, was taken vp by Adulphe, Earle of Boloine, his coſen-germane, and honourably buried in the Monaſtery of Saint Bertin, in the Towne of S. Omers. Which fact was much lamented by king Ethelſtan, who greeuouſly puniſhed the ſuggeſtions of his owne ieloſie, and the procurers of his brothers death, ſending great thanks to the Earle that buried him, and rich Preſents to the Monaſtery which entombed him, and to appeaſe the ghoſt of his innocent brother, built the Abbey of Middleton in the County of Dorſet.

In which Monaſtery, ſhe was firſt a Nunne, and afterward Abbeſſe during the whole time of her life, which was there ſpent and ended; and her body in the ſaid Abbey buried.

Eguina the third daughter.

(19) Eguina, the third daughter of king Edward and the ſecond of Queene Elfleda his ſecond Wife, was the ſecond Wife to Charles the third, ſurnamed the Simple, king of France, ſon to king Lews the brother of Iudith, Queene of England before mentioned. She had iſſue by him Lewis the third, ſurnamed Beyond-ſea, becauſe he was brought vp here in England with his Vnkle King Ethelſtan; and Gillet Dutcheſſe of Normandy maried to Rollo the Dane: who in regard of his marriage, was allowed to bee the firſt Duke of that Country. This Queene ſuruiued King Charles her husband; and afterwards was remaried to Herbert, the younger Earle of Vermandoys; which marriage was taken for ſo great an indignity, becauſe Earle Herbert the elder, father to this Earle, had cauſed the king her Husband to die in priſon, that King Lewis her ſonne preſently purſued her, apprehended, and committed her to the ſtrait cuſtody of Queene Gerberge his wife: ſo as ſhee had no recourſe vnto him, nor iſſue by him.

Her marriage with Herbert diſliked.

Ethelhild the fourth daughter.

(20) Ethelhild, the fourth daughter of king Edward, and the third of Queene Elfleda his ſecond wife, followed the example of her elder ſiſter Elfleda, and became a Nunne in the Monaſtery of Wilton, which was ſometime the head Towne giuing name to the whole County of Wiltſhire, & anciently called Ellandon.

Edhild the fifth daughter.

(21) Edhild, the fifth daughter of king Edward, and the fourth of queene Elfleda, was maried to Hugh ſurnamed the Great, Earle of Paris, Grand-maſter and Conſtable of France, in the yeere of our Lord 926. being the third of her brother king Ethelſtanes raigne. This Hugh was the ſonne of Robert, brother to Endes king of France, and father of king Hugh Capet, progenitor of the Kings of France, euer ſithence vnto this day: but ſhee died before him without any iſſue by him.

Edgith the ſixth daughter.

(22) Edgith, the ſixth daughter of King Edward, and the fifth of queene Elfleda, was the firſt wife of Otho the firſt, ſurnamed the Great, Emperour of the Weſt, ſonne to the Emperor Henry, ſurnamed the Falconer. By him ſhe had iſſue Ludolfe, Duke of Swabe, William Arch-biſhop of Mentz, Ludgard maried to Conrad Duke of Lorrayn, and Mechthild Abbeſſe of Quedlingburg in Saxonie: in which City ſhe deceaſed the ſeuen & twenty of Auguſt, in the yere of Chriſts Natiuity 947, the eleuenth of her husbands Empire, and the firſt of her brother king Edreds raigne in England. She was buried at the Eaſt end of the north ſide of a Chapel which her ſelfe had founded in the ſame City.

Elgiua the ſeuenth daughter.

(23) Elgiua, the ſeuenth daughter of King Edward, and the ſixth of queene Elfleda his ſecond Wife, was by king Ethelſtan her brother, with her ſiſter Egith, ſent to the Court of the Emperor Henry the firſt, king of the Saxons in Germany, who honourably entertained her, brought her vp with his owne daughters; and after he had married her elder ſiſter to his eldeſt ſonne, he placed her alſo in mariage with a Duke of Italy about the Alpes, who is not named of our Writers, but may eaſily be coniectured by the honourable diſpoſition of the maker of the match, to haue beene a Prince of note and account, worthy of her eſtate and parentage.

Married to a Duke of Italy.

Edmund the fifth ſonne.

(24) Edmund, the fifth ſonne of king Edward, and the firſt of queene Edgiua his third and laſt Wife, was borne in the twentieth yeere of his fathers raigne, being the yeere of the worlds ſaluation 921. and at his fathers death little more then three yeres of age, was notwithſtanding by the carefull prouiſion of his mother, brought vp with all princely education conuenient for his yeeres and eſtate, inſomuch as there was generally a great expectation amongſt the people conceiued of him in the life of his brother king Ethelſtan, vnder whom he learned ſome experience of ſeruice in warre, and after whom he ſucceeded in the kingdome of England

Three yeere old at his fathers death.

Edred the ſixt ſonne.

(25) Edred, the ſixth ſonne of king Edward, and the ſecond of queene Edgiua his third Wife, and the youngeſt ſonne of them both, was borne about the two and twentieth yeere of his fathers raigne; and yeere of grace 923. which was not long before the death of his father, who left him a little infant in the cuſtody of his mother, by whom hee was carefully brought vp, and prooued a Prince of ſo great vertue and Edburg the eight daughter. Han. Higd. Polic. lib. 6. cap. 4.

(26) Edburg, the eight daughter of King Edward, and the first of Queene Edgiua, in her childhood had her disposition tried, and her course of life disposed by her Father in this manner: hee laid before her gorgeous apparrell, and rich Iewels, in one end of a chamber, and the new Testament and Bookes of princely instruction in the other; willing her to make her choice of which she liked best: she presently tooke vp the bookes, and hee her in his armes; kissing her said, Goe in Gods name whither God hath called thee, and thereupon placed her in a Monastery at Winchester, wherein shee did most vertuously spend her whole life, and in that Abbey was buried.

Edgiua the ninth daughter.

(27) Edgiua, the ninth daughter of King Edward, and the second of his last Queene, whose name shee bare, is reported in the history of the Monastery of Hyde by Winchester, and other Writers of our Country, to haue beene married to Lewes Prince of Aquitaine in France, which not long before had beene a Kingdome of it selfe, sometime allotted to the portion of Lewes the third sonne of the Emperour Charles the Great; of which house it seemeth this Lewes was; afterward it became a Dukedome, and the possession of an other Family, by whom it came to be the inheritance after the Conquest to the Kings of England, which were descended of the house of Angeow.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

An. Do. 924.

Thelstan, the eldest sonne of King Edward (as hath beene said) for the great hopes conceiued of him, was crowned with a greater solemnity then any of his ancestors euer before him. The place was Kingston vpon Thamisis in the County of Surrey, the yere of Christ Iesus 924. where, in the midst of the towne a high Scaffold was built, and thereon the coronation performed to the open view of all, by Athelmus Archbishop of Canterbury, with shouts of ioy as that of Salomon.

Crowned at Kingston vpon Thamisis.

(2) His beginnings were with troubles, and that rather by reason of friends then force of foes: for it is recorded, that Elfred a Nobleman, either in fauour of King Edwards other sonnes, holding Ethelstan a Bastard, or else vpon an ambitious hope for himselfe, intended at Winchester to haue pluckt out the eyes of his Soueraigne: but his treason being known, before the seed could shew blade, he was apprehended & sent to Rome to purge himselfe by oth: where, before the Altar of S. Peter and Pope Iohn the tenth, hee there abiured the act, and thereupon fell sodainly down to the earth, so that his seruants tooke and bare him into the English Schoole, where, within three dayes after he died: the Pope denying him christian buriall vntill he knew King Ethelstans pleasure.

(3) These stormes ouerpast, as great a cloud seeing to arise vnto Ethelstans sight, whose eye of iealousie euer following the ascent, & his eare euer opened vnto the instillations of Parasites, amongst whom his Cup-bearer was a chiefe, who brought daily more and more suspition into the Kings head, that lastly (as wee haue shewed) hee consented to young Edwins death, though with too late a sorrow hee repented the same: for besides his seauen yeeres pennance voluntarily vndergoe, to pacifie the the ghoſt of his betraied brother, he built the two Monaſteries of Midleton and Michelneſſe, as for the moſt part ſuch ſeed-plots were euer ſowne in the furrowes of bloud, which hapned vpon this occaſion: It chanced his Cup-bearer in his ſeruice vpon a feſtiuall to ſtumble with the one foote, and recouering himſelfe with the other, pleaſantly to ſay, you ſee how one brother helpeth another; vpon which ſpeech the King with griefe and touch of heart, called to mind the death of his innocent brother, and forthwith commanded execution to be done on him the procurer, to repay his fact with deſerued death: & himſelfe was euer after more tender and carefull towards his other brethren, with a more reſpectiue regard, & beſtowed his ſiſters moſt honourably in mariage, as hath beene ſaid.

His Cup-bearer put to death.

(4) At his entrance of gouernment, to diſcharge the expectations of his ſubiects, hee endeauoured both by warres and alliances to make them ſtrong and rich. Firſt therefore entring friendſhippe with Sithricke the Daniſh King of Northumberland, vpon whom with condition that hee ſhould receiue Baptiſme, he beſtowed his ſiſter Editha in marriage, hee bent himſelfe to ordaine Lawes for the weale-publike, & thoſe to bind aſwell the Clergy as the Layety, out of which firſt ſprang the attachment of Fellons, to take hold of ſuch as ſtole aboue twelue pence, & were aboue twelue yeeres of age.

Theſe in a fierce battle hee ouercame and conſtrained them to ſubmit themſelues to his will, who knowing the chance of warre to bee variable, and pittying the cauſe of theſe down-caſt Princes, reſtored them preſently to their former eſtates, adding withall this princely ſaying, that it was more honour to make a King then to be a King.

(6) This notwithſtanding, the caſe of Godfrey ſo moued the ſpirit of King Conſtantine, that hee againe aſſiſted him in his inroades into the Engliſh part, which drew againe King Ethelſtan into the North: & cõming to Yorkſhiere (as he was a man much deuoted to God-ward) turned aſide to viſite the tombe of *S. (7) To the aide of Conſtantine came Anlaſe, called by writers king of the Iriſh, and of the Iles, who had maried his daughter, a man no doubt both hardy and deſperate, as appeared by the action hee vnderwent; for it is recorded, that as Elfred the Engliſh had attempted to know the ſtate of the Danes; ſo this Dane at this place did to vnderſtand the Engliſh: for diſguiſing himſelfe like a Harper, hee went from Tent to Tent, and had acceſſe euen into King Ethelſtans preſence, vntill hee hed learned what hee moſt deſired, and then returned againe to his Campe, which part of his was no bolder nor more wiſely performed, then was kept ſecret, and after reuealed by a moſt faithfull ſouldier. for Anlaſe departed & free from purſuit, this Souldier made the act known to King Ethelſtan: who being ſore diſpleaſed with his enemies eſcape, imputed the fault vnto him the reuealer; but he replying, made him this anſwere; I once ſerued Anlaſe (ſaid he) vnder his pay for a ſouldier, and gaue him the ſame faith that I doe now vnto yon; if then I ſhould haue betraied his deſignes, what truſt could your Grace repoſe in my truth? let him therefore die, but not through my Treachery, and by his eſcape ſecure your royall ſelfe from danger; remooue your Tent from the place where it ſtands, leſt at vnawares hee haply aſſaile you.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

An. Dō. 940.

Dmund the fifth ſonne of King Edward, borne vnto him by Queen Edgiua his third and laſt wife, at the age of nineteen yeres ſucceeded his brother King Ethelſtan in his kingdome, and Monarchy: he began his raigne the yere of the vo. lds ſaluation 940. and with great ſolemnity was crowned at Kingſton vpon Thamiſis, in the fifth yeere of Otho the firſt Emperour of that name, and his brother in law; his valour had often beene tried in the warres of King Ethelſtan againſt thoſe ſtout and ſturdy enemies the Danes, Scottiſh, Iriſh, and welſhmen, that often had aſſailed to diſturbe his peace.

infancy of Edmunds eſtate, with great power of men purpoſed to ſubdue all before him; but Edmund as forward, with full reſolution meant to keepe what was got; and ſo gathering his power, proceeded towards the North, and at Leiceſter encountred with the Danes: howbeit, through the interceding of the Archbiſhops of Canterburie and Yorke, Odo and Wolſtan, the matter was mitigated before it came to the vttermoſt.

An.Do. 942. (3) The next yeere of his reigne, the ſaid Anlafe (whom ſome hold to haue beene the King of Norway) beeing dead, an other Anlafe, ſonne to King Sithrick, of whom wee haue ſpoken, intruded vpon the kingdome of Northumberland. Theſe heads, as Hidraes, ſpringing vp each after others, drew King Edmund againe into the North, who raging like a prouoked Lion, ſubdued, as hee went, thoſe townes where the Danes kept, and got from them Lincolne, Leiceſter, Darbie, Stafford, and Nottingham, compelling them to receiue Baptiſme, and to become his Subiects; ſo that the Country was wholy his vnto Humber. Theſe his proceedings cauſed Anlafe and Reinold the ſonnes of the Daniſh Gurmo, ſubduers of Yorke, to yeeld themſelues wholy to his deuotion, offering him ſubiection, and withall to receiue the Chriſtian faith; for performance whereof, they likewiſe receiued Baptiſme, vnto whom King Edmund was God-father, to Reinold at his Confirmation, and to Anlafe at the Font: but how ſoone they fell from both, the ſequell ſhewed; for caſting off the faith and fealty thus promiſed, they ſtirred the Northumbrians to another rebellion, yet with no better ſucceſſe then deſert; for they were forced into a perpetuall exile, and King Edmund adioined that Country to his owne gouernment, without the admittance of any Secondary or Vice-roy to rule there vnder him.

King Dunmaile. (4) Cumberland alſo, which ſeldome was quiet, hauing beene a Kingdome entire of it ſelfe, and now aided by Leolin King of Southwoales, he vtterly waſted; and apprehending the two ſonnes of Dunmaile King of that Prouince, commanded the eyes of thoſe ouer-bold Princes to be puld out, and gaue their inheritance to Malcolme King of Scots, to hold the ſame by fealty from him. Thus by power and policie clearing thoſe coaſts whence the ſharpeſt ſtormes had continually blowne, hee returned into the South, and there ſet himſelfe to ordaine lawes for the good of his people, the which, leſt time the conſumer of all things might chance to obliterate, were by the labours of the learned Lambert tranſlated into Latine, and inprinted in the yeere 1568. next, to ſhew his loue to God, and bountie to his Church, hee gaue the towne of Saint Edmundsbury with the liberties thereof, wholy to that Martyr, and to the Monks that liued in ſeruing at his Altars.

For ſo with others wee may ſee in this Monarch, who being ſafely returned from many great dangers of was, at peace in his Palace, came to a lamentable & vnexpected end: for at his Manor of Pucle-kerkes in the County of Glouceſter, whiles hee interpoſed himſelfe betweene his Sewer and one Leowe to part a fray, was, with a thruſt through the body, wounded to death the twenty ſixth of May, in the yere of our ſaluation 946. when hee had proſperouſly raigned the ſpace of fiue yeeres and ſeuen moneths, and his body, with no leſſe ſorrow then ſolemnity, was buried at Glaſtenbury.

His Wife.

Elfgine. (6) Elfgine, the onely wife of King Edmund, hath not her parents declared (for ought I finde) by any of our Writers: but this is affirmed, that ſhe was married vnto him in the firſt yeere of his raigne, which was the yeere of grace, 940. and that ſhe was his wife foure yeeres & vpward, after whoſe ſlaughter ſhe remained a mournfull widdow all the reſt of her life, which ſhe ſpent with ſo great vertue and opinion of the people, as by the Writers of that age ſhee is commended to poſteritie by the name of a Saint.

His Iſſue.

Edwy. (7) Edwy, the eldeſt ſonne of King Edmund, and Queene Elfgine his wife, was borne in the ſecond yeere of his fathers raigne Anno 942. When his father died, hee was but foure yeere of age, and in reſpect of his minority was not permitted to ſucceed him in the Kingdome, but forced to giue place to his vncle Edred, vnder whom he liued nine yeeres: and in the tenth, his vncle being dead, and himſelfe then growne to the age of thirteene, was admitted to the ſucceſſion of the Monarchy.

Edgar. (8) Edgar the ſecond ſonne of King Edmund, and of Queen Elfgine, was borne in the third yeere of his fathers raigne, the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus 943, and was but three yeeres old when his Father died; notwithſtanding, he proued afterward a Prince of great expectation, and in the ſecond yere of King Edwy his brothers raigne, beeing then but fourteene yeeres of age, hee was choſen King by the Mercians and Northumbrians, both which people hee gouerned vnder the title of King of Mercia, for the ſpace of two yeeres before his brothers death, and then ſucceeded him in the whole Monarchie.

CHAPTER XL.

An. Do. 946.

EDred, the sixth sonne of King Edward, borne vnto him by Queene Edgiua his third and last wife, at the age of twentie three yeeres succeeded his brother King Edmund in the nonage of his children in al his dominions, and was the twenty seuenth King of the West-Saxons, and the twenty eight Monarch of the Englishmen. Hee beganne his raigne in the yeere of Mans saluation 946. and was annointed, and crowned at Kingston vpon Thames in the County of Surrey vpon Sunday the seuenteenth day of August, by the hands of Otho Archbishop of Canterbury.

Policr. lib. 6. cap. 8.

(2) His Coronation robes scarsly put off; newes was brought him that the Northumbrians had reuolted and stirred a dangerous insurrection, notwithstanding the Couenants that his brother Edmund had made with Malcolme King of the Scots, to secure the same. Therefore lest delaies might proue dangerous, with a great Armie hee entred into the verge of Scotland, without sight of enemy, or any resistance. But peace beeing concluded betwixt Edred, Malcolme and the Northumbrians; yea and the same confirmed strongly by oath, yet was it little regarded of the last named Iurers; for no sooner was Edred returned, but that they sent into Ireland for Anlafe, the sonne of Gurmo the Dane, who had beene expelled the Country, as wee haue said.

Edred. Malcolme.

(3) Anlafe gathering a fleete and forces accordingly, came into Northumberland, where hee was with great ioy receiued and made their King, which title hee maintained for foure yeeres continuance, banding ~~against Edred, and~~ still holding him play, till lastly the Nothumbrians disloiall to both, tooke their feather out of Anlafe his plume, and sent him packing to the place, whence hee came, electing one Hericus King in his stead.

Anlafe cometh into Northumb.

VVil. Malmsbury

(4) Edred awaked with the wasts that they made, prepared a iourney into those parts, where with fire and sword hee bare downe all before him; and albeit it he was a man religiously bent, yet spared he not the Abbey of Rippon from flames, but laid all vnto ashes as he went, the enemy not daring to shew the face. In his returne, suspecting no perill, suddainely an hoast brake out of Yorke, and fell vpon the Rere-ward of his Army, marching but carelesly, and broken out of their array, whereby many perished before any complete order of resistance could bee made. The King seeing this bold attempt of these Rebels, stroke downe his standard, turning his face againe to the North, and threatened the reuenge, with the Countries spoile and their liues.

Rand. Higd. Simon Dunelm.

(5) In this plot of sedition Wolstan Archbishop of Yorke had sowne some seed of treason, both in the assistance of action, and counsell for the enterprise, very ill beseeming a man of his ranke: this Wolfe therfore hauing thus awaked the Lion from rest, was the onely man that fell in his pawes; for the Northumbrians expulsing their stateless Hericus with submissiue teares and golden showers, so pacified the King, that their offences were therewith cleane washed away: but hee good man (a Saint at the least) was mued vp in prison (against whom accusations daily came, and namely, that hee had commanded sundrie of the Burgesses of Thetford to bee slaine) where hee abode till hee was by Edred vpon a reuerent regard of his calling, released from thence: for as this King is commended for his lenity towards the vertuous; so is hee no lesse for his iustice towards the vicious: and for the practise of his Religion, as forward as any, suffering not onely his manners to be reproued and corrected, (a quality truely roiall, and best seeming Princes) but also (so much below the pitch of soueraigne Maiestie) his body to bee chastised at the will and direction of Dunstan Abbot of

(7) Elfred, the ſonne of King Edred, was borne before his Father was King; neither find I mention of his Mother, or any act by him done; onely in the ſixt yeere of King Edred his raigne, which was the yeere of grace, 952. he is mentioned for a witneſſe to his Fathers graunt of lands in Wittenham, to Ethelwolfe a Duke of England in thoſe daies, as appeareth by the Charter thereof, bearing date in the yeere aforeſaid.

Bertfrid. (8) Bertfrid an other, and as it ſeemeth, an elder ſonne of King Edred, was borne before his Father was King, without any mention alſo of his Mother, who liuing in the ſecond yeere of his fathers raigne, namely Anno 948. was written for a witneſſe in the ſame yeere, to his grant of lands in Bedlaking, to Cuthred one of his Barons, the Charter whereof is extant to be ſeene vnto this day.

An.Do.959.

EDgar, the ſecond ſon of king Edmund hauing raigned two yeares ouer the Merciansand Northumbrians, in the dayes of Edwy his Brother, to the great impairing of king Edwyes reputation and eſteeme; after his death at ſixteen yeares of age was choſen to ſucceeed in all his dominions, & was the thirtieth Monarch of the Engliſhmen, or rather now of whole England, all other titles of kingdome falling vnder his ſcepter, and becomming Prouinces annexed vnto his abſolute Monarchy.

(2) He beganne his raigne in the yeere of Chriſts Natiuity, 959. and was crowned (as ſome write) the ſame yeare at Kingſton, vpon Thameſis, by Otho Archbiſhop of Canterbury. But Randulphus Higden in his Polychronicon, referreth it to the twelfth yeere of his raigne: William Monke of Malmesbury to the thirtieth yeare of his age, and the Saxon Chronicle of of Worceſter Church, to the yeere of Chriſt, 972. and that in the City of Bath, hee was annointed and conſecrated with great ſolemnity by Dunſtan Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Edgar the Peaceable.

(3) The raigne of this King is ſaid to haue beene altogether in a calme tranquility, and therefore he was ſurnamed the Peaceable; his vertues were many, and vices not a few, the one gloriouſly augmented, and the other fairely excuſed, by thoſe Monkiſh writers, vnto whoſe profeſsions he was moſt fauourable: his Guides were Dunſtan Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Ethelwold Abbot of Glaſtenbury, and Oſwald Biſhop of Worceſter, three ſtout Champions againſt the maried Clergy, (for women in thoſe dayes were great bugs in their eies,) therefore the maried Prieſts he diſplaced, & brought in Monkes of ſingle life to poſſeſſe their roomes, whoſe ſinnes of incontinency grew after to be great, as the world did then witnes, which cauſed Treuiſa the tranſlator of Higden, to blame King Edgar, charging him to bee lewdly moued in following their counſell againſt married Clerkes.

VVil. Malmsbury.

(4) So doe Malmsbury and Higden taxe him with too fauourable affections towardes the Danes, who dwelled alike in euery town with the Engliſh, though formerly they had ſought the deſtruction of all, and ſtill lay in wait attending for the ſpoile of his true ſubiects, who apt enough vnto euil, learnd the beaſtly ſinne of quaffing, aud emptying their cups, which King Edgar was enforced to redreſſe, by enacting a law againſt exceſsiue drinking, ordaining a ſize by certaine pinnes ſet in the pot, with penalties to any that ſhould preſume to drinke deeper then the marke.

(5) His Policy was no leſſe prudent (but much more ſucceſſefull) for the deſtruction of Wolues, that in his daies did great annoiance to the land: for the tribute impoſed on the Princes of Wales by the Engliſh King Ethelſtan (as we haue ſaid) hee wholy remitted, and in lieu thereof, appointed certaine numbers of Wolues yeerely to be paid; and Ienaf, or Iage, Prince of North-Wales, did for his part pay him yeerly three hundred; which continued for three yeeres ſpace, but in the fouth was not a Wolfe to bee found, and ſo the tribute ceaſed.

(6) His Nauie roiall, containing three thouſand and ſixe hundred ſhips, he diuided into three parts, appointing euery of them to a ſeuerall quarter to waffe the Seas, and ſecure the coaſts from Pirats, and forraine enemies; wherein himſelfe euery ſummer would ſaile with thoſe in the Eaſt parts, vnto thoſe in the Weſt, and ſending them backe to their charge, would with the Weſt ſaile into the North, and with the northerne fleete compaſſe againe into the Eaſt, whereby the ſeas were ſcowred, & his kingdome exceedingly ſtrengthned.

Edgars honeſt vigilancy.

(7) The like cuſtome vſed he in the winter ſeaſon in his ieyſts, and circuits throughout his Country, ſo to take account of the adminiſtration of his lawes, and the demeanour of his great men, eſpecially of his Iudges, whom ſeuerely he puniſhed, ſo often as he found the execution of their places ballanced either with bribery or partiality; ſo that there was neuer leſſe robbery, deceit or oppreſſions, thē in the raigne of this worthy King.

(8) His ſtate thus flouriſhing in peace and proſperity, he cauſed diuers Princes to bind themſelues vnto his allegiance, but perchance it may iuſtly be doubted, whether in ſuch performance of homage and ſeruice, as Malmsbury, Florentius, Randulphus, Marianus, Houeden, and other writers affirme to haue beene at the City Cheſter, where (they ſay) Kennadie King of Scots, Malcolme of Cumberland, Maxentius an Arch-Pirate, with the petty King of Wales, Duffnall, Griffith, Huual, Iacob, and Iudithil, did with ores row his Barge vpon the riuer Dee, from his Pallace to Saint Iohns Church, and thence againe backe to his Pallace, himſelfe the while ſteering the helme, and ſaying in his glory, that then his ſucceſſors might trulie account themſelues Soueraigne Kings of England, when they enioyed ſuch a prerogatiue of ſublimity, and ſupreme honour: although (ſaith M. Fox) he might much better, and more Chriſtianlike haue ſaid, God forbid that I ſhould reioyce, but in the Croſſe of our Lord Ieſus Chriſt.

Edgars league with diuers Kings.

Gal 6.14.

(9) Warres he had none in all his raigne; onely towards the end, the Welſhmen moued ſome rebellion, which to preuent, hee aſſembled a mighty Army, and therewith entred into the Country of Glamorgan, ſharply puniſhing the ringleaders thereof; but his ſouldiers doing great harmes in the country, laden with ſpoiles for the returne, the King out of his bounty commanded all to be againe reſtored, whereby hee purchaſed ſingular loue and honour of the inhabitants.

Polychron.

(10) To his magnanimity was ioined much deuotion, but moſt eſpecially towards the Monks, for whom, and for Nunnes hee built and repaired forty ſeuen Monaſteries, intending to haue continued their number vnto fifty; as himſelfe teſtifieth in theſe words of his Charter, Monaſtery built by King Edgar.

Ex chart Reg.

The Monaſteries, aſwel of Monks as of Virgins, haue beene deſtroied, and quite neglected, throughout England which I haue now determined to repaire to the glory of God, for my ſoules health, and ſo to multiply the number of Gods ſeruants and handmaides: and now already I haue ſet vp forty ſeuen Monaſteries with Monks and Nunnes in them, and if Chriſt ſpare me life ſo long, I am determined in offering my deuout munificence to God to proceed to fifty, euen to the iuſt number of a Iubilee.

And by this his Charter did not onely approue the enlargement of S. Maries Monaſtery in Worceſter, and the reſtoring of Votaries in ſtead of maried Prieſts, but himſelfe either new founded or repaired many others, as the houſe of Ely, Glaſtenbury, Abington, Burgh, Thorney, Ramſey, VVilton, Wenton, Winchorne and Thumſtocke, with great coſt, and large endowments, hauing the Clergy in an high and reuerent eſteeme, and moſt of all his Confeſſor Dunſtan: but with this wheate, there were tares growing, though the late Monkiſh Writers bind them vp for good corne: for ſome men tell (ſaith Randulphus Higden) that Edgar in his beginning was cruell to Citizens, and lecherous to maidens, whereof theſe his actions enſuing beare ſufficient witnes.

(11) The firſt was commited againſt the virgine Wolfhild, a ſacred Nunne as ſome affirme, though others ſomwhat mitigating that ſacrilegious offence, haue reported, that ſhee to auoid his fleſhly and laſciuious luſt, was forced to take the habite of a Menchion vpon her, and in the ſame brought to his bed, wherein the chaſt S. Edith was begot, and for whom, ſay they, he vnderwent his ſauen yeeres penance without the wearing of his Crowne.

Polycr. lib. 6. cap. 9.

(12) A like offence hee committed againſt the virgine Ethelfleda, the daughter of Ordmar a Duke among the Eaſt Angles, who for her ſurpaſsing beauty was ſurnamed the white; on whom he begat his eldeſt ſonne Edward; for which fact as M. Fox affirmeth, hee did his ſeuen yeeres penance inioined by Dunſtan: and indeed by Oſberne it appeareth, that Edward was not legitimate, where he writeth, that the child begotten of the harlot, he baptized in the holy fountaine of regeneration, and ſo giuing his name to bee called Edward, did adopt him to bee his ſonne. With whom agree Nicolas Triuet in his Engliſh ſtory, written in French, Iohannes Paris in his French ſtory, written in Latine, both of them calling Edward a ſonne illegitimate; as alſo doth Vincentius and Antoninus, howbeit William of Malmesbury, Mathew Paris, Mathew of VVeſtminſter, Randulphus and others, will haue her his firſt and lawfull wife, and Edward in true matrimony to haue deſcended from them.

(13) An other inſtance of his laſciuious life is produced by the forenamed Writers, and thus both occaſioned and acted. It chanced Edgar to heare a Virgine and daughter to a Weſterne Duke, exceeding dingly praiſed for her incomparable beauty, the touch of which ſtring from his eare reſounded to his heart, and as a bait it drew him preſently into thoſe parts; where comming to Andeuer, commaunded the damſell to his bed: The mother tender of the Virgins honour, brought in the darke her maid, but not her daughter, who, as well pleaſed the King in his ſinnefull dalliance: the day approching, this late laid maid made haſte to ariſe: but the King loth to part yet with his ſuppoſed faire Lady, demanded why ſhe made ſuch haſt? Who anſwered him, that her taske was great, and hardly would her worke be done, if day ſhould preuent her ere ſhee roſe: but yet being ſtaied aboue her howre, vpon her knes ſhe made this humble requeſt, that ſhe might be freed from her ſhrewde dame, alleadging, it was not fitting, that the woman who had taſted the pleaſures of a Kings embracements, ſhould endure a ſeruitude vnder the rule of any other. The King perceiuing the deceit, and therewith moued to wrath, yet could not recall what hee had done (or rather vndone) and therefore turned his conceiued wrongs vnto a ieſt: but ſo, that hee both ſharpely checked the deceiuer, and kept this damſell, (whoſe nightworke and pleaſance had fully wonne him) for his Concubine, whereby ſhe ruled them that lately had the command of her: and to vſe the words of Malmsbury, he loued his Concubine moſt entirely: keeping true faith of his bed to her alone, vntill the time he maried for his lawful wife Elfrida the daughter of Duke Ordgarus.

Malm. de regibus.

(14) His laſt laſciuious Act, was as Dauids ioyned with bloud, and wrought in manner as followeth. Fames lauiſh report of beauteous Elfrida (the paragon of her ſexe, and wonder of Nature) the only daughter of Ordgarus Duke of Deuonſhire, ſounded ſo lowd in thoſe Weſterne parts, that the Eccho thereof was heard into King Edgars Court, and entred his eares, which euer lay open, to giue his eyes the ſcope of deſire, and his wanton thoughts the raines of will: to trie the truth whereof, hee ſecretly ſent his minion or fauourite Earle Ethelwolfe of Eaſt-Anglia, who well could iudge of beauty, and knew the diet of the King; with Commiſsion, that if the Pearle proued ſo orient, it ſhould bee ſeized for Edgars owne wearing, who meant to make her his Queene, and Ordgarus the Father of a King.

Duke Ordgarus.

Ethelwold.

Ethelwold a iolly young Gallant, poſted into Deuonſhire, and gueſt-wiſe viſited Duke Ordgarus his Court, where ſeeing the Lady ſurpaſsing the report, blamed Fames ouer-ſight for ſounding her praiſe in ſo baſe and leaden a Trumpet; and wholly ſurpriſed with her loue, himſelfe beganne to wooe the Virgin, yea, and with her Fathers good liking, ſo as the King would giue his aſſent. Earle Ethelwold returning, related that the maide indeed was faire; but yet her beauty much augmented by babling reports, and neither her feature or parts any wiſe befitting a King. Edgar miſtruſting no corriuall in his loue, nor dreaming falſe fellowſhip in wooing, did with a ſleight thought paſſe ouer Elfrida, and pitcht his affections the faſter another way. Earle Ethelwold following the game now a foot, deſired Edgars aſsiſtance to bring it to a ſtand, pretending not ſo much for any liking to the Lady, as to raiſe his owne fortunes to be her fathers heire; to which the King yeelded, and for his minion ſolicited Ordgarus, who glad to be ſhrowded vnder the fauours of ſuch a fauorite, willingly conſented; and his daughters deſtinies aſſured to Earle Ethelwold.

Edgar a ſuret for Ethelwold.

The mariage ſolemnized, and the fruits thereof a ſhort time enioyed; the fame of her beauty beganne againe to be ſpread; and that with a larger Epithete then formerly it had beene: Whereupon Edgar much doubting of double dealing, laid his angle faire to take this great gull: and bearing no ſhew of wrong or ſuſpect, inuited himſelfe to hunt in his Parks, and forthwith repairing into thoſe parts, did no a little grace his old ſeruant, to the great ioy of Ordgarus the Duke. But Ethelwold miſtruſting the cauſe of his comming, thought by one policy to diſappoint another: and therefore reuealing the truth to his wife, how in his proceedings hee had wronged her beauty, and deceiued his Soueraign, requeſted her louing aſsiſtance to ſaue now his endangered life, which lay in her power, and of the meanes he thus aduiſed:

Wolfhild. Ethelfled.

Lady Elfrida thus left to her ſelfe, began ſeriouſly to thinke vpon this curtaine Sermon, whoſe text ſhe diſtaſted, being taken out of an ouer-worne and threed-bare cloth prouerbe, as though her fortunes had been wholly reſiding, and altogether conſiſting in her parentage and apparrell, but nothing at all in any parts of her ſelfe.

Elfrida alone.

" Hath my beauty (thought ſhe) beene courted of a King

" a King, famouſed by report, compared with Helens
" and now muſt be hid? Muſt I falſifie and bely Na-
" tures bounties, mine owne value, and all mens re" ports, only to ſaue his credite, who hath impaired
" mine, and belied my worth? And muſt I needs de-
" foule my ſelfe, to be his onely faire foule, that hath " kept me from the State and ſeat of a Queene? I " know the name of a Counteſſe is great, and the " Wife of an Earle is honourable, yet no more then
" birth and endowments haue aſsigned for me, had " my beauty been far leſſe then it is. He warns me of " the end, when his owne beginnings were with tre-
" chery; tels me the examples of others, but obſerues
" none himſelfe: he is not iealous, forſooth, and yet I
" muſt not looke out; I am his faire, but others pitch,
" fire, wine, buſh, and what not? Not ſo holy as Wolf-
" hild, nor ſo white as Ethelfled; and yet that muſt now
" be made far worſe then it is. I would men knew the " heate of that Cheeke wherein beauty is bla-
" zed, then would they with leſſe ſuſpect ſuffer our " faces vnmaskt, to take aire of their eies, and wee no
" whit condemnable for ſhewing that which cannot " be hid, neither in me ſhall, become of it what will.

And thus reſoluing to bee a right woman, deſired nothing more then the thing forbidden, and made preparation to put it in practiſe. Her body ſhee endulced with the ſweeteſt balmes, diſplaied her haire, and beſpangled it with pearles, beſtrewed her breaſts and boſome with rubies and diamonds, rich Iewels glittering like ſtarres depended at her necke, and her other ornaments euery way ſutable. And thus, rather Angell, then Lady-like, ſhee attended the approach and entrance of the King, whom with ſuch faire obeiſance and ſemly grace ſhe receiued, that Edgars greedy eye preſently collecting the raies of her ſhining beauty, became a burning glaſſe to his heart; and the ſparkle of her faire, falling into the traine of his loue, ſet all his ſenſes on fire: yet diſſembling his paſsions, he paſſed on to his game, where hauing the falſe Ethelwold at aduantage, he ranne him through with a Iaueline, and tooke faire Elfrida to his wife.

Ethelwold ſlaine.

(15) Theſe were the vertues and vices of this King, little in perſonage, but great in ſpirit, and the firſt vnreſiſted Monarch of the whole Land, whom al the other Saxons acknowledged their ſupreme, without diuiſion of Prouinces or title. He raigned ſixteen yeeres and two moneths in great tranquility and honour, and died vpon tueſday the eighth of July, the thirty ſeuenth of his age, and yeere of Chriſt 975. whoſe body with all funerall ſolemnity was buried in the abbey of Glaſtenbury.

The fifteenth. ſaith Higden.

His wiues.

(16) Ethelfled, the firſt wife of King Edgar, was ſurnamed in the Saxon Engliſh Eneða, in Latine Candida, which with vs is White, becauſe of her exceeding great beauty. Shee was the daughter of a Duke amongſt the East-Angles, named Ordmar, and was married vnto him the ſecond yeere of his raigne, and the eighteenth of his age, being the yeere of Chriſts Natiuity 961. She was his wife not fully two yeeres, and died the fourth of his raigne, in anno 962.

Ethelfleds parents.

(17) Elfrida, the ſecond wife of King Edgar, was the widow of ſlaughtered Ethelwold, of whom wee haue ſaid. She was daughter to Ordgarus, and ſiſter to Ordulfe, both of them Dukes of Deuonſhiere, and the Founders of Tauiſtoke abbey in that Country: a Ladie of paſsing great beauty, and as ambitions as faire: for after the Kings death, ſhe procured the murther of King Edward her ſonne in law, that her owne ſon Ethelred might come to the crowne: and afterwards to pacifie his and her firſt husbands ghoſt, and to ſtop the peoples ſpeeches of ſo wicked a fact, ſhe founded the Abbeys of Ambresbery & Wherwell, in the Counties of Wiltſhire and Southampton.

Elfrida ſecond wife.

His Children.

(18) Edward, the eldeſt ſonne of King Edgar and Queene Ethelfled his firſt wife, was born in the fourth yeere of his fathers raigne, and a little before his mothers death, in the yeare of Chriſt Ieſus, 962. He was a child diſpoſed to all vertue, notwithſtanding great meanes was made by his mother in law for the diſinheriting of him, and the preferment of her owne ſon to the ſucceſſion of the Crowne; yet by prouident care taken in the life time of his father, he ſucceeded him after his death, as right heire both of his kingdome and conditions.

Edward the eldeſt ſonne.

(19) Edmund, the ſecond ſonne of King Edgar, and the firſt of Queene Elfrida his ſecond wife, was borne in the ſeuenth yeere of his fathers raigne, being the yeere of grace 965. He liued but foure yeeres; and died in his infancy, in the twelfth yeere of his fathers raigne, and was honourably enterred in the Monaſterie of Nunnes, at Ramſey in Hampſhire, which king Edgar had founded.

Edmund the ſecond ſonne.

(20) Ethelred, the third ſonne of Edgar, and the ſecond of Queene Elfrida his ſecond wife, and the laſt of them both, was borne in the eighth yere of his fathers raigne, and yere of ſaluation 966. He was vertuouſly inclined, beautifull in complexion, and comly of ſtature; at the death of his father being but ſeuen yeres old, and at his brothers murther ten: which deed he ſore lamented, to the great diſcontentment of his mother, who for his aduancement had complotted the ſame, and wherein at thoſe yeeres he vnwillingly ſucceeded him.

Ethelred the third ſonne.

(21) Edgith, the naturall daughter of King Edgar, had to her mother a Lady named Wolfhild, the daughter of Wolfhelm, the ſonne of Byrding, the ſonne of Neſting, the two latter bearing in their names the memory of their fortunes: the laſt of them being found in an Eagles neſt, by king Elfred as he was on hunting. This Edgith was a vailed Nunne in the Monaſtery of Wilton, and according to ſome Authors, made Abbeſſe thereof by her father at fifteene yeeres of age, ſaith her Legend. She died the fifteenth day of September, the yeere of her age twenty three; the ſixt of her brother King Ethelreds raigne, & of Chriſt Ieſus 984. By all which accounts it is manifeſt, that ſhe was borne before Edward, and by maſter Fox proued, that for him, and not for her, King Edgar did his ſeuen yeeres penance. She is greatly commended for her chaſtitie and beauty, which later ſhe ſomewhat augmented with more curious attire then to her profeſſion was beſeeming; for which Biſhoppe Ethelwold ſharpely reprooued her; who anſwered him roundly that God regarded the heart more then the garment, and that ſins might bee couered as well vnder rags as robes.

This Edgith, as Iohn Capgraue reporteth, after the ſlaughter of her brother Edward, the holy archbiſhop Dunſtan would haue aduanced to the Crown, & inueſted her againſt Ethelred the lawfull heire, had ſhee not by the late experience of Edwards fal, vtterly refuſed that title, which neither belonged to her right, nor was ſafe for her perſon to vndertake. Her body was buried at Wilton, in the Monaſtery and Church of Saint Deniſſe, which her ſelfe had cauſed to bee built.

Chapter XLIII.

An.Do.975. Simon Dunel. Roger. Houen.

GReat were the troubles & ſidings that preſently enſued the death of King Edgar, about the election of one of his ſons to ſucceed; Queene Elfrida with Alferus Duke of Mercia, and many other Nobles combined for young Ethelred, diſauowing Prince Edward as illegitimate, and therefore not reputable for ſucceſſion: againſt them and Ethelred ſtood Dunſtan and the Monks, holding their ſtates dangerous, & their new-gotten footing vnſure, if in the nonage of the King, theſe their oppoſites ſhould rule all, vnder him; whereas Edward was altogether wrought in their mould; whoſe title they abetted, as being lawfully borne, and begot in the nuptiall bed of Queene Ethelfleda. Their claimes thus banded amongſt theſe Stateſmen, began to be diuerſly affected among the Commons, and had put the game to the hazard, if the wiſedome of Dunſtan had not ſeene the chaſe; for a Councell being aſſembled to argue their rights, the Archbiſhop came in with his banner and Croſſe, and not ſtaying for further debating de iure, did de facto, preſent Prince Edward for their lawfull King; & the aſſembly conſiſting moſt of Clergy-men, perſwading peace, drew the approbation of the reſt, and ſo was the Prince admitted and proclaimed their Soueraigne.

Edward the ſon of Ethelfleda.

their further terrour, a fearefull Comet appeared; which men thought to bee ſignes from heauen, as ſent from God, for the ſinnes committed againſt the married Clergy, whoſe cauſe was much pitied, eſpecially of the Nobles, & whoſe complaints of wrongs they inſtantly vrged, that without deſerts they were expulſed from their ancient poſſeſſions; a thing which neither God nor good men euer allowed, and was contrary to the preſcript rule of Chriſt, that wils vs to doe as we would be done vnto; whereto the Monks anſwered, that Chriſt reſpected neither the perſon nor place, but onely them that tooke vp the Croſſe of Penance and followed him, as themſelues in their ſingle life pretended to doe. But they good men little knew the incombrances of wiuing; for otherwiſe they would haue felt, that the condition of the married, was more truly a ſuffering of the Croſſe and enduring of Penance.

(3) Theſe Church-men thus diuided and rent, were diuerſly ſided as affection did moue, and that not onely of the meaner ſort, but euen of the Nobles & great Ones; for the Mercian Duke Alferus fauouring the iuſt cauſe of married Prieſts, deſtroied the Monaſteries in his Prouince, caſt out the Monkes, and reſtored againe the ancient reuenewes to them & their wiues: contrariwiſe, in Eaſt-Anglia the Prieſts went to wracke, where the Monks were maintained by the authority of Edelwin their Duke, who in their quarrell, with the aſſiſtance of his brother Alfred, and of Brightnoth Earle of Eſſex, raiſed a mighty Army, and ſtood with that power for their defence.

(4) The fire thus blown from a ſparke to a flame, was feared to mount higher, if not quenched in time, and therefore by mediation, armes laid aſide, the cauſe was referred to be heard in Councell, & at Wincheſter firſt the aſſembly was held, where after long diſpute, and much againſt the Monkes, it was greatly ſuſpected their ſide had gone down, but that the matter was referred from them to the Roode, placed vp-on the refectory Wall, where the Councell ſate. To this great Oracle S. Dunſtan deſired them deuoutely to pray, and togiue diligent eare for an anſwere: who, with as great bounty, as they in deuotion, made it not ſquemiſh to giue them this aduice; God forbid it ſhould be ſo, God forbid it ſhould be ſo (ſaid he,) you iudged well once, and to change that againe is not good.

Dunſtans counſell.

This was authority ſufficient to ſuppreſſe the Prieſts, who now with their wiues went downe the wind; and indeed too blame they were to ſuſpect this their Iudge, who neuer was heard to giue wrong ſentence before; but they vnſatisfied men, thought once more to blow the coales, though therewith they were likely to burne their owne lips; for perſwading the people, that this was but a ſubtile practiſe of the Monks, in placing behind the wall a man of their owne, who through a truncke vttered thoſe words in the mouth of the Roode; it was therefore inſtantly deſired, that the cauſe might once more come to ſcanning.

This Synode being ſet; and the controuerſie propounded, a hote and ſharpe diſputation enſued, and a while was maintained with many bitter inuectiues; ill beſeeming ſuch perſons: But whether through the weakeneſſe of the foundation, or the ouer-preſſe of weight, or both, the ioyſts of this vpper-loft, wherein the Councell was held, ſuddainly brake, and downe fell the floore with all the people thereon, whereof many were hurt, and ſome ſlaine outright, onely Archbiſhop Dunſtan then preſident, and mouth for the Monks, remained vnhurt: for the Poſt whereon his chaire was ſet (and not without miracle) ſtood wholy vntouched.

Polychr. lib. 6. c. 12

Thus by this fall, fel the cauſe of the ſecular Prieſts and the Monkiſh foundations vnderpropped with more ſurer pillars, Dunſtan vnburdened or many imputations, the peoples affections drawne to the Monkes, and the Prieſts at liberty now to accompany their wiues without any cure, though not without care; and all this was wrought by the prouidence of Dunſtan, and his ſtrange preſeruation on the poſt; no leſſe wonderfull then that which with the like truth is related of him, how when a huge beame of a houſe was ſunke out of the frame, and like to ruinate the whole building, with onely making of the ſigne of the Croſſe thereon with his fingers, hee made it returne to his former place: ſo wonderfully potent was he in ſuch woodden miracles. To which, why ſhould wee not giue credite, ſince the very Harpe which he had touched, could worke miracles? as when of it ſelfe it ſounded melodiouſly that Hymne, Gaudent in cœlis animæ Sanctorum, &c. Yea ſith the bleſſed virgine Mary her ſelfe, is ſaid to haue come to ſolace him with her ſongs, Cantemus Domino Sociæ, &c. For, as for Angels ſinging familiarly vnto him, and Diuels in ſhape of dogs, foxes and Beares, whipped by him, that was but ordinary; as likewiſe his making the ſhee diuell to roare, when comming to tempt him to dalliance in ſhape of a beautifull laſſe, hee caught her by the noſe with hote burning pincers, and ſo ſpoilde a good face. But to leaue thoſe figments wherewith our Monkiſh-ſtories are ſtuffed to the deluding of their Readers, and diſhonouring of thoſe, whom thereby they thinke to magnifie; let vs looke backe to yong Prince Edward.

Ethelred. Monarch.32

CHAPTER XLIIII.

An.Do.979.

Ethelred the ſonne of King Edgar, and brother to king Edward the Martyr, at the age of twelue yeres entred his gouernment ouer the Engliſhmen, the yeere of mans ſaluation, nine hundred ſeuenty nine, and was the two and thirtieth Monarch ſince King Hengiſt: hee was crowned King at Kingſton vpon Thamiſis the fourteenth of Aprill, beeing Eaſter day, by the hands of Dunſtan Archbiſhoppe of Canterburie, who did it much againſt his will.

Wil. Malmsb. pecul. Hiſtor.

(2) Hee was a man neither forward in action, nor fortunate in proceedings, and therefore commonlie called the Vnreadie: his youth was ſpent in idlenes, feeding his ſenſes with all voluptuous baites; his middle yeeres with a careleſſe gouernment, maintaining ciuill diſſenſions; and his latter end deſeruingly in continuall reſiſtance of the bloud-thirſty Danes. With theſe imputations by Writers hee is taxed, though wee find no ſuch iuſt cauſe in recording his life; but to ſuch extreames are euen great Monarchs themſelues brought, that their breath and dignity once left and laid downe, they are ſubiect to the cenſures of euery affectionate and malignant reporter. And that this King lay lyable to ſuch mens humors, the working of Dunſtan euer againſt him, is a ſufficient witneſſe, who not onely did refuſe to act his Coronation, but would haue preferred Lady Edgith a baſtard before him to the Crowne, as wee haue ſaid. And beſides the generall quarrell of the Monkes and married Prieſts, to which later himſelfe and his Abetters were better inclined; his iuſt indignation conceiued againſt the Biſhop of Rochester, and that not pacified without the Biſhops ſubmiſſion and paiment of money, was cauſe inough for thoſe Monkiſh Writers to brand the Lords Annointed with their marks of infamie, vnto whom they impute the miſeries of thoſe times, and the deſtruction of the Engliſh by the intruding Danes.

(3) Theſe Danes had kept quiet euer ſince the diſliked raigne of King Edwy, without any notable attempts, for the ſpace of twenty two yeeres: but now perceiuing the hearts of the ſubiects to bee drawne from their Soueraigne, they thought it a ſufficient occaſion to forward their intendments; and omitting no time, in the ſecond of his raigne with ſeuen ſhips they arriued vpon the coaſt of Kent, ſpoiling the Country; but moſt eſpecially the Iland Thanet, from whence they did great hurt likewiſe to the towne of Southampton. An.Do.980.

The Engliſh led in the diſlike of young Ethelreds gouernment, were the rather drawne to impute theſe and other aduerſities to this vnfortunate Prince, by reaſon of a prediction of Dunſtan, who had propheſied, That they ſhould not bee free from bloud and ſword, till there came a people of an vnknowne tongue, that ſhould bring them to thraldome: and that opinion was skrewed deeper into their fearefull conceit, by a cloud appearing of bloud and fire, immediately after his vnaffected Coronation. Polycr. l. 6. ca. 13.

(4) The next yeere, thoſe rouing Danes entred the Britiſh Seas; and coaſting to Cornwall deſtroied there the Abbey of Saint Patricke, Porland in Deuonſhire, and many other places vpon thoſe ſhores; the like was done vnto Cheſhire by the Norway-Pirates, which broke into thoſe parts in the ſame yeare. An.Do.981. Simon Dun. Ran. Higden.

(5) And theſe calamities were ſeconded with others as fearefull; for in the yeare 982. the City London was miſerably deſtroied and defaced by fire; whoſe beauty then chiefly extended from Ludgate weſtward: for, that within the walles, and where the heart An.Do.982 Th. Rudburne. Iohn Stow.

heart of the City is now, was then neither beautifull, nor orderly built; what time also raged a ficknesse till then vnknowne in England, which was a strong burning feuer, and bloody fluxe, as also scarsity of victuals, and murraine among cattle. This hand of God thus correcting the sinnes of all, was receiued as sent for the offences of some few, and wholly imputed to the King and his Raisers; Dunstan still propheſying further woes to the land, when himselfe should be dead.

Poli.v.li.6.cap.13

(6) The Danes hereupon more boldly assaulted each shore, and in so many places at once, that the English were to seeke, where first to withstand. In the West they were encountred by Goda Earle of Deuonshire, as saith Simon Dunelmensis, by whom they were ouerthrowne, though with the losse of his life, as also of Sternwold a man of great esteeme and valour in those parts, who serued there vnder him.

(7) In the East their leaders Iustine and Guthmond warred with better successe; for at Malden in Essex they gaue Brightnod the Earle, a great and bloody battaile, wherein himselfe with most of his people were slaine. The Danes thus prospering, more boldly went forward; and where they set their tallants, there they held fast, and lay on the land like vnto Grashoppers. These euils King Ethelred could not redresse, his strengths being small, and his subiects affections lesse; therefore calling to Counsell his Statesmen & Peeres, demanded their aduice what was best to bee done. Some few of these proffered the King their assistance, but more of them perswaded vnto a composition, whereof Siricius Archbishop of Canterburie was chiefe; and in fine, ten thousand pounds paid to the Danes for their departure.

(8) This golden Mine once entred, was more eagerly digged into, by these still-thirsting Danes, who finding the branch so beneficiall at first, hoped the veine in following, would proue farre more bountifull, and therefore regardlesse of promise, the next yeere prepared themselues againe for England, and with a great fleete dispatched to sea: the newes whereof strucke such terror into the English hearts, that despairing of hope, they accounted themselues the bond-slaues of misery: The King therefore with much adoe prepared a Nauie, whereof hee made Elfrick Earle of Mercia Admirall; who setting from London vnto the seas, had power sufficient to put backe the enemy: but hee once a traitor could neuer prooue true; for, hauing beene banished, forgiuen, and now taken into fauour, found meanes to bee false, and to betray his charge; and sending the enemy intelligence of his power and intents, gaue the way to their escape; and another fleete of Danes encountring with the Kings, at first hee fainedly and faintly fought against; and lastly, turned to their side; through which treason many Englishmen died, and the Kings Fleete and power was greatly weakened; but hee escaping due punishment himselfe, left his sonne to answere the fault, whose eyes King Ethelred caused to be put out.

(9) About which time also another Danish Fleet entring Humber, wasted the Countries of Yorkshire and Lyndsey: against these King Ethelred sent his power, vnder the charge of three valiant but trecherous Captaines, namely, Frena, Godwin and Fredegist; for the battaile but begun, these with their followers fled away; which was the occasion of a great ouerthrow of the English; notwithstanding the country people not able to digest their intollerable dealings, fell vpon the Danes, slew some, and chased the rest. At what time also other of the Danes with ninety foure ships sailed vp the riuer Thamesis, and laid their siege against London, giuing it a great assault; but the Citizens thereof so manfully defended themselues, that they chased the Danes thence to their shame and great losse: yet fell they so foule vpon Essex, Kent, Sussex, and Hampshire, that the King was enforced to compound a peace, with the payment of sixteene thousand pounds: for confirmation whereof, Ethelred sent to Southampton for Anlafe these Norwegians King, and honourably entertained him at Andeuer, where the same time hee receiued Baptisme, King Ethelred taking him at the Font for his God-sonne, and with great gifts returned into Denmarke without any further harme done to the English.

(10) But God and destiny suffering it, (that would haue the Saxons to fall before the Danes, as formerly the Britaines had done before them) no couenant could be so surely made, but was as slackly in them performed; for albeit this Anlafe honourably kept both faith and promise, yet others of his Country continued their inuasions, and as an other Hydra shewed their still-reuiuing heads.

(11) For the nineteenth yeere of King Ethelreds most troublesome raigne, and of our saluation 997. the Danes with a great fleete sailed about Cornwall, and came into the mouth of Seuern, robbing, as they went, Deuonshire, Cornwall, and South-Wales: and marching further into the Continent, consumed Lydford, and the Abby of Saint Ordulfes at Essinstocke: thence passing through Dorsetshire with fire & sword, found not a man in the way to resist them, and wintering in the Wight liued by spoiles gotten in Hampshire and Sussex.

An. Do. 998.

(12) The next Spring they put into the mouth of Thamisis, and so by the riuer Medway arriued at Rochester: thither the Kentish with their strengthes repaired, but vnfortunately fought, and left the field to the Danes, who shortly after hoised their sailes, and with a merry gale arriued in Normandy.

An. Do. 999.

(13) King Ethelred thus rid of these his vnlooked for guests, sought to remoue those leigers that lay in Cumberland, whither hee repaired, and with sore warre wasted the Country, before whose sword the Danes were not able to stand; which somewhat encouraged the spirits of his people, and bettered their conceits towards him: but farre this sunne past not without a cloud, nor was his successe entailde to be fortunate.

An. Do. 1000

(14) For the next yeere, those Danes that departed from Kent, came now from Normandy with their full sailes, and landing in Exmouth, their first and greatest fury was against the City of Exceter, which when they fiercely besieged, they were so valiantly beaten by the Citizens, as that enraged aboue measure with the ignominy of that repulse, they thence as a sodaine floud bare downe all that stood in their way; and then plainely begann to appeare the rise of the Danes, which euery where lorded it, where they had to doe; and the fall of the Saxons, whose ouertopped Monarchy, and weake walles now wanted props to hold vp the weight; for the Captains of the English (saith Higden) wanting lore in deeds of Arms, their direction neuer prospered; if ships were made, they neuer sped well, but were either chased of the enemy, or destroyed by tempest; if the Nobles euer assembled to consult of the State, that time was rather spent in whetting the spleene each against other, then iointly agreeing how to redresse their present danger, or to represse the common enemy: for most of the Nobles were allianced into the Danish bloud, whereby not onely the secret of those consultations were reuealed, but being imploied in seruice, many of them reuolted to the enemy. The Clergy as backward as any, denyed the King their assistance, pleading their exemptions from warre, and priuiledge of the Church, when the land lay bleeding and deploring for helpe, and scandalized all his other proceedings for demanding their aide: to these were ioined scarsity, hunger and robberies. These miseries caused the summes of their compositions to bee augmented, whose last was sixteene thousand, now twenty thousand, immediately twenty four, then thirty, and lastly, forty thousand pounds, vntill the land was emptied of all the coine; the Kingdome of her glory; the Nobles of courage; the

(15) The Danes thus preuailing, did not a little glory in their fortunes; and grieued the poore Engliſh, whoſe ſeruice they imployed to eare and till the ground, whileſt themſelues ſate idle, & eate the fruit of their paines, abuſing the wiues and daughters of their hoſts where they lay, and yet in euery place for feare and reuerence were called the Lord-Danes (which afterwards becam a word of deriſion to ſuch ſturdy and lazy lozels) ſo that the like daies of miſery the land neuer felt. To redreſſe which, the carefull King Ethelred was farre too weake, & therefore intending to doe that by policy, which he could not by ſtrength, he deuiſed a deſperate ſtratagem that proued the deſtruction of the Saxons royall bloud, and conqueſt of the land to another nation.

Ethelreds bad policy.

(16) For ſeeking to disburden the Realme of theſe deuouring Danes, which by open force hee could no waies doe; hee attempted in a bloudy maſſacre to deſtroy them, giuing a ſecret commiſſion vnto euery City within his dominions, that at an appointed time they ſhould ſet vpon, and kill all the Danes; the day was the thirteenth of November, being the feſtiuall of S. Bricius, the yeare of Chriſt Ieſus 1002, and preſently after his marriage with Emma, the flower of Normandy; in confidence of which affinity, hee preſumed to do what he did. His commaund was accordingly performed, and with ſuch rigour, that in Oxford the fearefull Danes for refuge tooke into the Church of S. Frideſwide, as into a Sanctuary of venerable antiquitie and priuiledge among ancient Kings: but they in fury regarding neither place nor perſon, ſet the Church on fire, wherein were burned a great ſort of thoſe Danes with many rich ornaments, and the Library thereof vtterly defaced. At which time (if Malmsbury ſay true) King Ethelred himſelfe was in that City, and had ſummoned a Parliament both of Danes and Engliſh, with which euen the King was much grieued: and therefore at his very great coſt beautifully repaired the Church, and all the loſſes accruing by the fire, endowing it with large priuiledges and donations, as appeareth by his owne Charter, mentioning the tenour of that Daniſh ſlaughter.

King Ethelred ſeeing no truth in their promiſes, nor quietneſſe, in State, his land thus exhauſted of prouiſion and coine, thought it beſt to aduenture once for all, and to commit his cauſe vnto God, by the fortune of warre. To which end he gathered his power, and comming vnlooked for, when the enemy was altogether vnprepared, and taken at disaduantage, he had made an end of the quarrell if wicked Edrike had not perſwaded him from fight, and put him into a cauſleſſe feare with his forged tales. The Danes thus eſcaping returned to Kent, and the winter following lodged their ſhips in the riuer Thameſis, whence often they gaue aſſaies for London, though to little purpoſe.

(28) In the City lay vnfortunate King Ethelred, who (as Simon Monke of Durham reporteth) had with him, and vnder his pay Turkillus the Daniſh Prince before ſpoken of, and forty fiue Daniſh ſhipps to defend the coaſts. King Swaine at his firſt comming fiercely aſſaulted the City, hoping his fortunes would haue proued as before; but the preſence of the King, and London the eye of the land, made the Citizens aboue meaſure couragious, who beat the Danes from their walles, and ſallying forth of the Gates, ſlew them on heapes, ſo that Swaine himſelfe was in great danger, had hee not deſperately runne through the midſt of his enemies, and by flight eſcaped their ſwords; marching both day and night in great feare vntill hee had entred Bath, where Ethelmere Earle of Deuonſhiere with his Weſterne people ſubmitted themſelues vnto him. But this laſt ouerthrow, and want of victuals, cauſed him after he had receiued a certaine ſumme of money, to haſte into Denmarke, minding with more power, and better aduantage to proſecute the quarrell.

(31) This lamentable Oration deliuered from the passions of a iustly-pensiue King, touched the hearers to the heartes, and asmuch distracted their afflicted minds. To abide battle they saw it was booteleſſe, the treason of their leaders so many times defeating their victories; to yeeld themselues to the enemy, would but beginne their seruitude and misery; and to flee before them, their eternall ignominy and reproch.

Thus their opinions were canuased, but nothing put in practise, whereas meane whiles the Danes, went forward with victories, and had got the most part of the land, yea and London also by submission; wherewith vnfortunate Ethelred more and more dejected, sent his wife Emma with his two sonnes by her, vnto her brother Richard Duke of Normandy, and for his owne safest refuge committed himselfe vnto Turkil the Dane, in whose shippes hee remained a while at Greenewich, and from thence went into the Isle of Wight, where hee abode most part of the winter, and thence sailed into Normandy to his wife and brother, leauing the Danes lording it in his realme.

(32) These were the daies of Englands mourning, shee being vnable to maintaine her defenders, and yet enforced to nourish and cherish her deuourers: for the Danes in two factions most cruelly afflicted the land like two millstones crushing & grinding the grain. Swayn as an absolute King, extorted of the English, both victuals and pay for his souldiers: and Turkil on the other side, in defence of the English, commanded the like for his ships and men, so that the Danes had all, and the English maintained all. Neither were churches free from their spoils, (whom other Conquerors haue held most impious to violate,) but either suffered the flames of their consuming fire, or were forced to purchase their standings with great summes of money. Such composition King Swaine demaunded for the preseruation of S. Edmunds Monastery in Suffolke: which because the Inhabitants refused to pay, he threatned spoile both to the place, & to the Martyrs bones there enterred: in the midst of which iollity (saith Houeden) he suddainely cried out that he was strucke by S. Edmund with a sword, beeing then in the middest of his Nobles, and no man seeing from whose hand it came, and so with great horrour and torment, three daies after vpon the third of February ended his life at Thetford (others say at Gainesborough:) but with his death died not the title of the Danes, who immediately aduanced Canutus his sonne for their King.

Swains and Turkils domineering

Houeden. Annal. pars prior. Fabian. Chron. par. 6. cap. 200. Policron. lib. 6. cap. 16.

(33) The English that liked nothing lesse then bondage, especially vnder such tyrannizing intruders, thought now or neuer the time to shake off the yoake; and therfore with great ioy and haste sent into Normandy for their natiue King. Ethelred now not vnready for the recouering of his right, foreslowed no meanes either to hasten or strengthen the enterprize, and hauing the assistance of his brother of Normandy, in the Lent following landed in England, vnto whom resorted the people from all parts, accounting it their greatest ioy to see the face of their King.

An.D.1015.

(34) Canutus then at Gainsborough, Souldier-like mustered and managed his men, and holding it good policy to keepe that by bounty, which his father had got by tyranny, made no spare to purchase the hearts of the English; by which meanes those of Lyndsey became his Creatures, with an agreement to find him both horse and men against their owne King and Country.

Canutus winneth loue of the English.

Ethelred therefore now raging for reuenge, with a mighty host entered Lyndsey, where hee burnt all the Country, and put the inhabitants to the sword. Canute not able to resist this puissant Army, held the sea more safe for him then the land, and entring Humber, sailed to Sandwich, where being sore grieued at the miseries of these his confederates, requited King - Ethelreds friends with the like, and commaunded that those pledges which had beene deliuered by the Nobles vnto his Father, should haue their Noses slit, and their hands cut off: which cruelty acted, hee sailed to Denmarke, as hopelesse of any good issue in England.

He is chased by Ethelred.

Matth. West. Wil. Malm.

(35) But Turkil the Dane, retained (as we said) into king Ethelreds pay, seeing succesſe so sodainely altered, sore repented him of his reuolt from the Danes, and knowing now the time to recouer his reputation, with nine of his ships sailed into Denmarke, instantly importuning Canute to addresse againe for England; alleadging the feares and weakneſse of the people, the beauty and fertility of the land, an Eden, in respect of their owne barren seat, and (which did most moue) himselfe would assist, when the English least thought it. With these and the like hee spurred him on, who of himselfe was forward in a full curriere.

Turkil inciteth Canute against England.

Canutus therefore with the aide of his brother Harrold rigged forth a Nauie of two hundred saile, all furnished with souldiers and abiliments of warre, whose terror landed in England before him, and his power by report made greater then it was; and to encrease the terrour of this fearefull enemy, the sea with a Spring-tide brake into this land, and destroyed both townes and many inhabitants; a signe foreshewing (as was thought) the succesſe of that fleete, borne hitherward vpon those waues; and to increase the English miseries, thirty thousand pound was then collected by way of Tribute to pay the Danish auxiliary Nauy lying before Greenewich. The States also conuening in a grand Councell at Oxford to determine vpon the great affaires of the Kingdome, were diuided into factions, and two Noblemen of the Danes there murthered by practise of Edrick the Traitor. These (I say) were accounted ominous amongst the English, that made each mole-hill to seeme a mountaine, and euery shadow the shew of an enemy.

Money collected for the Danes.

(36) In the meane while Canutus had landed at Sandwich, and giuen a great ouerthrow to the English; entred Kent, and by his sword had made way through the Countries of Dorset, Sommerset, and Wilton.

VVit. Malms. Henry Hunt. Mat. Westminster. Simon Dunel.

Ethelred lying dangerously sicke at Cossam, the managing of these warres was transferred to Prince Edmund his sonne, who preparing to meete the enemie with his Army in the field, had sodainely notice that Edrik his brother in law meant to betray him into his enemies hands; which newes strucke a great astonishment vnto his heart, and caused him to retrait his host into a place of security; whereby Edrik perceiuing his treacherous purposes were discloſed, gaue more open proofe of his intendments, flying to the enemy with forty of the Kings shippes; whereupon all the west Countries submitted themselues vnto Canutus.

(37) By this time King Ethelred had recouered his sickneſse, and minding reuenge on his most wicked sonne Edrik, with purpose to trie his last fortunes by hazard of fight, summoned all his forces to meet him at a certaine day and place; where beeing assembled, hee was instantly warned not to giue battaile, for that his owne subiects meant to betray him.

Very louing and tender affectioned he was to his brother King Edward; for whoſe death hee made ſuch lamentation, that his mother beate him with a taper of waxe that ſtood before her, yea and ſo ſore that he could neuer after wel endure the ſight of a taper. Fauourable he was to the married Prieſts, and leaſt eſteemed the opulent and idle liues of the Monks, whoſe pennes therefore (as in ſuch caſes we euer find them partiall) haue been very lauiſh in his diſpraiſe, accuſing him with ſloath and vnreadineſſe of Armes, of voluptuouſnes and lechery, couetouſneſſe, pride, and cruelty: whereas in following the records of his life, laying aſide the Daniſh maſſacre, wee find no ſuch ſinnes, neither any mention of Concubine that euer he kept, or name of child vnlawfully begot, hauing had many by his wiues, which were as followeth.

His Wiues.

Elgiua the firſt wife, by ſome called Elſtede.

(40) Elgiua, the firſt wife of King Ethelred, was the daughter of an Engliſh Duke named Thored, who is reported in the hiſtory of that time, to haue done great ſeruice againſt the Danes. She was married vnto him when hee was ſeuenteene yeares of age, in the ſixt of his raigne, being the yeare of grace nine hundred eighty foure, and was his wife ſeuenteene yeeres, who deceaſed in the twenty foure of his raigne, and of Chriſt Ieſus, one thouſand and three.

Emme the ſecond wife.

(41) Emme, the ſecond wife of King Ethelred, was the daughter of Richard the ſecond Duke of Normandy, and ſiſter of Duke Richard, and Duke Robert father to William the Conqueror; her mother was ſiſter to Herfaſt the Dane, Grandfather of William Fitz-Osbert afterward Earle of Hereford. She was a Lady of paſſing beauty, and therefore commonly called the flower of Normandy, married vnto him in the twenty and fifth yeare of his raigne, and yere of Saluation, 1003. with whom ſhee liued thirteene yeeres, and ſuruiuing him was remaried to King Canute the Dane.

His Iſſue.

Ethelſtan the eldeſt ſonne.

(42) Ethelſtan, the eldeſt ſonne of king Ethelred and of Queene Elgiua his firſt wife, was borne about the eight yeare of his Fathers raigne, and yeere of Chriſt, 986: hee liued vnto the age almoſt of twenty fiue yeers, being then (by great likelyhood) cut off by vntimely death in the warres of the Danes, raging then moſt extremely, which was the thirtie third of his Fathers raigne, and of Chriſts Natiuity 1011.

Egbert the ſecond ſonne.

(43) Egbert, the ſecond ſonne of King Ethelred, and of Queene Elgiua his firſt wife, ſeemeth to haue beene borne two yeeres after his brother Ethelſtan, in the tenth yeare of his Fathers raigne, and yeare of our Lord 988. and to haue deceaſed in the very prime of his youth before the death of his father, or of his elder brother, and before he had done any thing in his life worthy of remembrance after his death.

Edmund the third ſonne.

(44) Edmund, the third ſonne of King Ethelred & of Queene Elgiua his firſt wife, was borne in the eleuenth yeare of his fathers raigne, and of Grace 989. and of all his fathers Children proued to be the only man that ſet his helping hand to the redreſſe of the eſtate of his Country diſtreſſed by the miſerable oppreſsions of the Danes: which hee purſued with ſuch exceeding toile, and reſtleſſe hazards of his body, as he was there fore ſurnamed Iron-ſide; and when hee had followed thoſe warres with great courage the ſpace of ſeuenteene yeeres vnder his Father, being come to twenty ſeuen of his owne age, hee ſucceeded him in his kingdome and troubles as preſently ſhall be ſhewed.

Edred the fourth ſonne.

(45) Edred, the fourth ſonne of King Ethelred and of Queene Elgiua his firſt wife, was born about the fourteenth yeare of his fathers raigne, being the yeere of Grace 992. His name is continually ſet downe, as a witneſſe in the teſtees of his fathers Charters, vntill the thirty fift yeare of his raigne, by which it appeareth that he liued vnto the two and twentieth yeere of his owne age, although I find no mention of him, nor of any thing done by him in any of our hiſtories; and it ſeemeth hee died at that time, becauſe his name is left out of the Charters after that yeere.

Edwy the fifth ſonne.

(46) Edwy, the fifth ſonne of King Ethelred, and Queene Elgiua his firſt wife, ſuruiued his father and all his brethren, and liued in the raigne of Canute the Dane, who being iealous of his new gotten eſtate, and fearefull of the dangers that might accrew vnto him by this Edwy, and ſuch others of the Engliſh bloud roiall, practiſed to haue him murthered; was was accordingly done by them, whom hee moſt fauoured, and leaſt ſuſpected, the yeare of our ſaluation, 1017.

Edgar the ſixth ſonne.

(47) Edgar, the ſixt ſonne of King Ethelred and of Queene Elgiua, his firſt wife, was borne about the twentieth yeere of his fathers raigne, beeing the yere of our Lord God nine hundred ninety and eight. He ſeemeth by the Teſtees of his fathers Charters, to haue beene liuing in the one and twentieth of his raigne, but beeing no more found in any of them after, may be ſuppoſed by all coniectures, to haue died in, or about the ſame yeere, beeing but the eleuenth after his owne birth, and the ſeuenth before his fathers death.

The eldeſt daughter.

(48) The eldeſt daughter of King Ethelred and Queene Elgiua his firſt wife, although her name bee not to be found in any writer of thoſe times, appeareth notwithſtanding, to be maried to one Ethelſtan, a Noble man of England, who was the principall Commander of Cambridg-ſhiere men at the great battle fought betweene them and the Danes, wherein the Engliſh-men had the ouerthrow; and this ſon in law of King Ethelred, with the reſt of the chiefe Leaders, were ſlaine in the yeere of Chriſts Natiuity 1010, beeing the two and thirtieth of his father in Lawes raigne.

Edgith the ſecond daughter.

(49) Edgith, the ſecond daughter of King Ethelred and Queene Elgiua his firſt wife, was maried to Edrik Duke of Mercia, who for his couetouſneſſe in getting ting was surnamed Streattone: This Edrike was the sonne of one Egelrik surnamed Leofwin, an elder brother to Egelmere the grandfather of Godwin Duke of the west-Saxons; and beeing but meanely borne, was thus highly aduanced by this King; notwithstanding hee was euer a traitor to his Country, and a fauourer of the Danes, betraying both him, and King Edmund his sonne to King Canute, that he thereby might gette new preferments by him, who worthily rewarded him as a traitor and put him to death.

Elfgine the third daughter.

(50) Elfgine, the third daughter of King Ethelred and of Queene Elgiua his first wife, was the second wife of Vtred surnamed the Bold, sonne of Earle Waldese the elder, Earle of Northumberland, by whom shee had one onely child, a daughter, named Aldgith, married to a Noble-man called Maldred, the sonne of Crinan; shee was mother of Cospatricke, who was Earle of Northumberland in the time of William the Conquerour, and forced by his displeasure to flie into Scotland, where hee abode, and was ancestor to the Earles of Dunbar and of March in that Country.

Gode the fourth daughter.

(51) Gode, the fourth and youngest daughter of King Ethelred and Queene Elgiua his first wife, was first married to one Walter de Maigne a Noble-man of Normandie, greatly fauoured by King Edward her brother; who liued not long after the marriage, and left issue by her a sonne named Rodulfe, whom King Edward his vncle created Earle of Hereford. This Earle Rodulfe, died the one and twentieth of December, in the thirteenth yeere of his vncles raigne, and was buried at Peterborough; leauing issue a young sonne named Harrald, created afterwards by King William the Conqueror, Baron of Sudeley in the Countie of Glouceſter, and Ancestor to the Barons of that place succeeding, and of the Lord Chandois of Sudeley now beeing. This Ladie Gode, after the decease of the said Walter de Maigne, was married to Eustace the elder, Earle of Bulloigne in Picardy, a man of great valour in those parts of France, and a most faithfull friend to King Edward her brother; which Earle was grand-father to Godfrey of Bulloigne, King of Ierusalem, albeit it seemeth he had no issue by this Lady.

Edward the seuenth sonne.

(52) Edward, the seuenth sonne of King Ethelred, and his first by Queene Emme his second wife, was borne at Islipe in the County of Oxford, and brought vp in France all the time of his youth, with his vncle Richard the third of that name, Duke of Normandy, mistrusting his safetie in England vnder King Canute the Dane, although hee had married his mother; but hee found the time more dangerous by the vsage of his brother Elfred, at his being heere in the raigne of king Harrald sonne of the Dane. Notwithstanding hee returned home, when Hardiknut the other sonne (beeing his halfe brother) was King, and was honourably receiued and entertained by him, and after his death succeeded him in the Kingdome of England.

Elfred the eight sonne.

(53) Elfred, the eight sonne of King Ethelred and his second by Queene Emme his second wife, was conueied into Normandie for feare of King Canute, with his eldest brother Edward, and with him returned into England to see his mother, then beeing at Winchester, in the second yeere of King Harrald surnamed Harefoote; by whose practize hee was trained towards London, apprehended by the way at Guilford in Surrey, depriued of his eie-sight, and committed prisoner to the Monastery of Elie: his Normans that came with him most cruellie murthered, and hee himselfe soone after deceasing, was buried in the Church of the said Monasterie.

CHAPTER XLV.

An. D. 1016.

EDmund, the third ſonne of King Ethelred, and the eldeſt liuing at his Fathers death, ſucceeded him both in his dominions, & in his troubled eſtate againſt the Danes; entring his gouernement in the moneth of Aprill, and crowned at Kingſton vpon Thameſis, by Liuingus Archbiſhop of Canterburie, the yeere of mans ſaluation. 1016. Notwithſtanding, a great part of the Engliſh, conſidering the puiſſance of the Danes, both feared and fauoured Canute, eſpecially, a great part of the Clergy, who at Southampton ordained him their King, ſwearing to him the fealty of true ſubiection; but the Londoners ſtood moſt firme to Prince Edmund, and were principall Actors for his election.

Polichron. lib. 6. cap. 17.

(2) In reuenge whereof, Canutus who had beſieged the City before the death of King Ethelred, cauſed his ſhips now to be towed, and drawne vp the Thameſis vnto the weſt ſide of the bridge, and from the riuer with a deepe and large Trench encompaſſed the City, ſhutting vp all entrance or egreſſe of any. But the Citizens manfull ſtood in reſiſtance, whereto the comming of their new King for their ſuccour, did not a little encourage them, and daunted the Danes, who now thought it beſt to breake vp their ſiege and bee gone: and the rather (ſaith the Author of Encomium Emmæ) for that King Edmund ſent Canute a peremptory challenge of ſingle combate, which he neither accepted, nor yet ſtaied the ſiege to trie his chance; but waying his anchors ſailed along the Coaſt to the ile of Sheepie, where hee wintred with his Nauie and men.

side prepared, and with ſuch ſmall power as his leaſure would admit to leauy, hee haſted into Dorſetſhiere, where Canute was forwarding his owne fortunes, and at Penham neere Gillingham, each met other in the field, wherein a ſore bataile was fought, and bloudy to the Danes, where many of them were put to the ſword, and the reſt to flight.

Polydor.

(4) Canute immediately tooke into Wincheſter to ſecure himſelfe from danger, and the reſt eſcaped towards Salisbury, and there begirt the City with a ſtrait ſiege. King Edmund as ready to ſaue, as they to deſtroy, made preſently thitherward with his ſmall and ouer-tired company; whom Canute, waiting for aduantage, followed with a great hoaſt, and in Worceſterſhiere, at a place called Sheroſtan, in the ſight of his enemy pitched his battaile. To the aide of Edmund came many of the Engliſh, ſo that his Army was greatly encreaſed, and their courages inhaunſed, which made the Daniſh ſouldiers ſomwhat to droope.

(6) But their bloud not cold, the next day they buckled together againe with no leſſe courage then before, till at length the Danes were going downe, & the Engliſh in great forwardnes of victory: which when the Traitour Edrik perceiued, he cut off the head of a ſouldier, whoſe name was Oſmearus, like vnto king Edmund both in haire and countenance, and ſhaking his bloudy ſword with the halfe-gaſping head, cried vnto the hoaſt of the Engliſh: Flie yee wretches, flie, and get away, for your King is ſlaine, behold here is his head, therefore ſeeke now to ſaue your owne liues.

Ie excuſe.

(7) But Edmund hauing preſent notice of this treacherous ſtratageme, and ſeeing his men ready to giue ouer the fight, haſted himſelfe where he might be beſt ſeene, encouraging his Army to ſtand to it like true Engliſhmen, and poſting from ranke to ranke, both performed the parts of a wiſe Generall, and vnderwent the dangers of the meaneſt ſouldier: his men ſeeing his preſence, & the apparant treachery of Duke Edrik, bent their bows againſt the traitour, and had ſhot him to death, had he not preſently auoided to the enemy: but the night approching, parted againe the battaile of this ſecond day: Duke Edrik excuſing his fact, as beeing meerely miſtaken in the countenance of the man, and thirſting to ſaue the bloud of the Engliſh, was taken againe into fauour, and bare himſelfe outwardly faire for his Country.

(8) The third day appearing, both the Armies prepared for battaile, but yet ſtood ſtill without any attempt, onely refreſhing their wearied, and almoſt tired bodies, and burying the dead ſlaine in the two daies fights before.

Canut marcheth to London.

(9) The night following, Canutus in great ſilence brake vp his campe, and marched very faſt towards London, againſt whoſe Citizens he carried great ſpleene, and moſt earneſtly deſired the conqueſt of the City, which in a ſort was ſtill beſieged by the Daniſh ſhips.

Diſlodged by Edmund.

(10) The Centinels the next morning certified King Edmund (who was addreſſing himſelfe for the battaile) of the ſuddaine departure of his enemies, whereupon hee as ready to preuent their deſignes, followed them by tract euen vnto London: where with ſmall adoe, hee remooued their ſiege, and entred the City in manner of triumph. The Danes thus diſcomfited, great hope was conceiued, that theſe faire proceedings would haue a proſperous end.

(11) Emund, therefore following the aduantage of their diſcouragements, two dayes after at Brentford bad them battaile, and that with their great ouerthrow; notwithſtanding, in paſsing the Thameſis at the ſame place, he loſt many of his men, who were drowned before they could recouer the ſhore: vpon which loſſe the Traitour Edrike plaied, who earſt had much feared the downfall of the Danes. For hereupon hee perſwaded his Brother in law King Edmund to come to truce with Canute, which as hee confidently affirmed, ſhould bee to the great benefite and contentment of Edmund: Canute himſelfe ſo plotting it, that by his meanes hee might continue his hopes, and bring his enemy into his danger.

Edrik wicked counſell.

(12) The affaires thus ſtanding, King Edmund returned into the Weſt, and Canute with ſpoiles vnto his ſhippes that were in Medway, not farre from Rocheſter, where hee a while lay ſtill to learne what Edmund meant to doe; who contrariewiſe louing nothing leſſe then to linger his buſineſſes, made preparation againſt thoſe truce-breakers that had waſted the Country in their returne, and with a great Army entred Kent, where he pitched downe his tents neere vnto Oteford.

Edmunds preparations.

Canute, who had prepared himſelfe in moſt warlike array to meete his approach, beganne the battaile in a furious manner, which continued very bloudy for foure houres ſpace, vntill the foote of his vaward beganne to ſhrinke, which when hee perceiued, hee drew his horſemen for their aid; but whileſt the one gaue haſtily backe, & the other made as ſlowly forward, the array of the whole Army was broken, and the Danes ſlaine on all hands: for it is reported that Canute loſt foure thouſand fiue hundred men, and King Edmund onely ſix hundred; the reſt of theſe Danes truſting to their legs: whom if Edmund had purſued in chaſe, it is thought, that day had ended the warres betwixt thoſe two Nations for euer. But Deſtiny, that would haue the Saxons downe, who had raiſed themſelues by the fals of the Britaines, made Edrike her inſtrument, and maſt of the Engliſh, who kept King Edmunds haſty foot from following his enemies, by guileſull vrging the danger of ambuſh, and the ouer-wearied bodies of his ſouldiers, ſo that Canute thereby had leaſure in ſafety to paſſe ouer into Eſſex.

A battaile betweene Edmund & Canute.

(13) Where beginning againe, with the increaſe of his power to deſpoile all the Country before him, brought feare to the inhabitants, and to himſelfe ſubmiſſion of many Engliſh. King Edmund therefore made preparation thitherwad, and at Aſhdone three miles from Saffron-Walden, gaue battaile to Canute, wherein a bloudy ſlaughter enſued, though a while with equall chance of foile or of victory, vntill laſtly the Danes beganne to giue backe; which when the euer-traiterous Edrik perceiued, hee went with his ſtrength, vnto their ſide, and maintained their battaile, which otherwiſe was at point to bee loſt, whereby the Danes regained the day, and the betraied Engliſh, the ouerthrow. There died of Edmunds Nobility, Duke Alfred, Duke Goodwin, Duke Athelward, Duke Athelwin, and Earle Vrchell, with Cadnoth Biſhop of Lincolne, and Wolſey Abbot of Ramſey, beſides other of the Clergy that were come thither to pray for the preſeruation of the King and his Army. The remembrance of which field is retained vnto this day, by certaine ſmall hilles there remaining, whence haue beene digged the bones of men, Armour, and the water-chaines of horſe-bridles.

Edmund put to retire.

(14) King Edmund thus traiterouſly forced to retire from the field, on foot marched vnto Glouceſter with a very ſmall Army, leauing Canute ouerſwollen in conceit for this his great victory, vnto whom then the Londoners ſubmitted, and ſo did many other great townes of Name; after which hee followed Edmund into the Weſt; who now like a Tygar robbed of her whelpes, ſeeking the reuenge of his loſt day, gathered a moſt puiſſant Army, meaning to trie the vttermoſt chance of Fate, or battaile. the others downefall; and now beeing ready to ioyne, a certaine Captaine of vncertaine name, ſtept forth (as is reported) betwixt the two Armies, and vttered in effect this ſpeech.

The advice of a Captaine for ſingle combat.

"(15) Manie battailes haue beene fought, and "too much bloud alreadie ſpilt for the ſoueraigntie "of this Land, betwixt theſe two fierce Nations, "and the valours of the Generals, Captaines and "Souldiers ſufficiently tried; wherein euen fortune "her ſelfe ſeemeth to haue beene conquered; for "if one Battaile were wonne, it was not long kept, "neither the loſer ſo weakened, but that hee had "both courage and power to winne the next. What "is the marke then that you aime at? is it honour "and fame? Titles indeed which accompany warre; "but neither long enioyed, nor much attained vn- "to by the common Souldiers, by whoſe valours "and bloud it is for the moſt part wonne. Let "him therefore that would weare the Diademe, "beare the hazard himſelfe, without the confuſi- "on of many men, and either trie the fortune "of a ſingle combat, who ſhall commaund, and "who obey; or diuide betwixt them the Kingdome, "which may ſuffice two, that hath maintained "ſeuen.

Matth. West.

(16) Some affirme that this ſpeech was Duke Edriks; But I hardly beleeue ſo good a motion ſhould proceede from ſo bad a man. By whom ſo euer vttered, it was acceptably receiued by Edmund and Canute, who thereupon in ſight of their Armies, entred into a ſmall Iland, embraced about with the armes of Seuerne, called Alney, adioyning vnto the City Glouceſter, where thoſe Princes in complete Armour at firſt aſſailed each other moſt dangerouſly on horsbacke, and after as valiantlie on foot. The Ironſide was ſtrong, and fought for his Kingdome; the Dane not ſo tall, but euery way as ſtout, fought for his honour, and ſo the combate continued with an abſolute reſolution, till at length Canute hauing receiued a dangerous wound and ſeeing himſelfe ouermatched in ſtrength, wiſhed a comprimiſe, and thus ſpake to Edmund with a loud voice.

Whereupon they both caſt downe their ſwords, imbracing as friends with the great ioy and ſhouting of both their Armies, who ſtood before doubtfully wauering betwixt hope and feare, and looking for their owne fortunes, according to the ſucceſſe of their Champions.

The Kingdome parted betweene them.

Thus was the Kingdome diuided betwixt thoſe two Princes; Edmund enioying that part that lay coaſted vpon France, and Canute entring vpon the reſt.

(17) Thus then the Saxon Monarchy ſpent to the laſt period, and their tottering Crowne faſt graſped with a hard Daniſh hand, was ſuddainely torne from the Ironſides helmet, by his complotted and haſtned death. For Duke Edrick a very compound of treaſons, glutted with the fauours of both theſe Kings, to ſerue himſelfe deeper into Canute his conceit, contriued the end of renowmed Edmund: who being retired to a place for natures neceſsity, was thruſt from vnder the draught into his body with a ſharpe ſpeare; which done, the treacherous Edrick cutting off his Soueraignes head, preſented it to Canute with theſe fawning ſalutations: All haile, thou now ſole-Monarch of England; for, here behold the head of thy Copartner, which for thy ſake I haue aduentured to cut off.

Canute, though ambitious inough of ſoueraignety, yet of Princely diſpoſition, abaſhed, and ſore grieued at ſo vnworthy and diſloiall an attempt, replied and vowed, that in reward of that ſeruice, the bringers owne head ſhould bee aduanced aboue all the Peeres of his Kingdome. Which high honour whiles this prodigious wretch greedily expected, (and indeed for a time, ſaith Malmesbuy, hee found ſome ſhew of fauour with the King:) ſoone after, by the Kings commaund, his head bad his ſhoulders farewell, and was placed vpon the higheſt Gate to ouerlooke London.

Wil. Malm'b.

(18) The traiterous death of this worthy Prince, as ſome affirme, was acted at Oxford; yet the Author that wrote Encomium Emmæ, and liued the ſame time, blancheth the matter, ſaying, that hee died a naturall death in London: God minding his owne doctrine, that a Kingdome diuided in it ſelfe, cannot long ſtand, and pitying the Engliſh, tooke away Edmund, leſt if the Kings had continued long together, they ſhould both haue liued in danger, and the Realme in continuall trouble.

His Iſſue

(21) Edward the eldeſt ſon of King Edmund, and Queen Algith his wife, was ſurnamed the Outlaw, becauſe hee liued out of England in Hungary as a baniſhed man, through the raigne of Canute, and of his ſonnes the Danes. But when his vncle King Edward the Confeſſor, had obtained the Engliſh Crowne, hee was by him recalled, and moſt honourably in his Court entertained, till laſtly, hee was taken away by death in the City of London, the yeere of Chriſt, one thouſand fifty ſeuen. Hee maried Agatha ſiſter to Queene Sophia, wife to Salomon King of Hungary, and daughter to the Emperour Henry the ſecond; by whom hee had Edgar, ſurnamed Etheling, confirmed heire apparant by Edward Confeſſor, his great Vncle; which title notwithſtanding, proceeded no further, for that hee was depriued thereof by Harold his Protector.

Margaret the elder, and afterward ſole heire vnto the Saxon Monarchy, married Malcolme the third of that name, King of Scotland, and commonlie called Canmore: from which Princely bed in a lineall neall deſcent, our high and mighty Monarch, King IAMES the firſt, doth in his moſt roiall perſon vnite the Britaines, Saxons, Engliſh, Normans, and Scottiſh imperiall Crownes in one.

Edmund. (22) Edmund, the ſecond and yongeſt ſonne of King Edmund, and of Queene Algith his wife, after his fathers deceaſe beeing a Child, was with his brother Edward ſent by Canute to Olaue King of Sweden his halfe brother, to the intent, that hee by murther ſhould make them both away: but this King taking pitty on the innocent Childrens eſtate, ſent them to Salomon King of Hungarie, to the intent to haue them ſaued, where they were receiued with great fauour and honour: and Mathew of Weſtminſter reporteth, that this Prince married the daughter of the ſame King; and other Writers of theſe times, that he died in the ſame Country without any iſſue of his body. Matth. Weſt.

(23) Theſe two ſonnes of the Ironſide thus poſted away, and the Crowne already ſet vpon the Danes head, had not the meanes of themſelues to diſplace it, nor the Engliſh, hearts to aſſiſt them to their right: ſo that they rather ſecured themſelues from violent deaths in this their exile, then made claime to that which was vnrecouerable; and left the Danes quietlie to poſſeſſe the land, which ſo long they had moleſted with their ſturdy Armes.

CHAPTER I.

THE Spirit of GOD, in his ſacred writings, to ſhew his all-commanding power ouer Kingdomes and Nations, compareth the tranſmigrations of people from country to country, vnto the transfuſion of wine from veſſel to veſſell: and thoſe that are at reſt with ſinne, to be ſetled vpon their lees, as Moab was, againſt whom hee curſed that hand that negligently did his worke of reuenge, and the ſword that was not ſheathed in their bloud. Euen ſo the ſinnes of the Saxons growne now to the full, and their dregs as it were ſuncke vnto the bottome, they were emptied by the Danes from their owne veſſels, and their bottles broken that had vented their red and bloody wines: in lieu whereof, the Lord then gaue them the cuppe of his wrath, whoſe dregs hee had formerly (by their owne hands) wrung out vpon other nations.

(2) For theſe Saxons that had enlarged their kingdomes by the bloud of the Britaines, and built their neſts high vpon the Cedars of others, as (the Prophet ſpeaketh) committed an euill couetouſneſſe vnto their own habitations, and were ſtricken by the ſame meaſure that they had meaſured vnto others. When as the Danes often attempting the lands inuaſion, and the ſubuerſion of the Engliſh eſtate, made way with their ſwords through all the Prouinces in the realme; and laſtly aduanced the crowne vpon their owne helmets; which whiles it ſo ſtood, was worne with great honour, eſpecially of Canutus the firſt and their greateſt.

Habb. 2.

(3) As touching this Nations originall, and firſt place of reſiding, ſeeing themſelues know nothing at all, wee cannot determine, but ſuppoſing them, with Franciſcus Irenicus, to be a branch of the ancient Germans, and knowing them by the teſtimonies of all others, to inhabite in the ſame Country among them; we need not to doubt, but that their conditions and cuſtomes were much alike. Of the former, what we haue obſerued, is already ſet downe, where we ſpake of our Saxons; and now of theſe latter, what is ſuppoſed for truth ſhall be produced.

(4) Theſe Danes ſo often mentioned by our hiſtorians, for the great afflicters of the Engliſh ſtate and peace, were a people deſcended from the Scythians, as Andrew Velley a learned Daniſh Writer reporteth: but Dudo of S. Quintin (an ancient Author) will haue them to come from Scandia, an Iland ſituated north-ward, not farre from the continent of Denmarke: which his opinion ſeemeth vnto ſome to be ſtrengthned by Ptolemie the Alexandrian, who in his Geography placeth the people Dauciones (the ſuppoſed Anceſtors of thoſe Danes) in this Iland Scandia, at ſuch time as himſelfe wrote, which was in the raigne of Hadrian the Emperour, and about the yeere of Chriſts natiuity 133. But whereſoeuer the roote had beginning, the branches did farre ſpread themſelues into the vpper Germany, and parts of Norway, and Sweyden, whoſe faire fruit more particularly filled that promontory, which tongue-like lieth into the Ocean on the North, being anciently called of the learned, Cimbrica Cherſoneſſus, where, (as Tacitus ſaith) was the vttermoſt end of Nature, and of the world; a ſtrange conceit indeed; and yet more ſtrange was their opinion, who were perſwaded that the ſound and noiſe of the Sunne was there heard at his daily riſing and ſetting in thoſe ſeas. But from more warrantable witneſſes it is reported, that this was the very place which the Iutes and Angles abandoned, when they remoued their Colonies for Britaine.

(5) In this place then the Danes laid firſt the foundation of their Kingdome; which, from the word Marc (ſignifying not a limit, but a region,) was named Den-marc. But touching the former part of that compounded name, the truth and original occaſion is not ſo ſoone found out: for the ſearching eye of Truth hath long ſince ſeene into the receiued fable of Danus their firſt King, and Giant-like ſonne of Humblus; though Verſtegan, of late, holds it more certaine in the ſearch of originals, to follow the grounded opinion that ancient Tradition hath held, then at randome to ſeeke them elſe-where: as theſe Danes (ſaith he) from Dan, and the Britaines from Brute; which truely for truth I hold much alike, and will herein make doubt, as many more of riper iudgement before me haue done.

(6) For Goropius Becanus deduceth the name Dane from Da-hen, ſignifying a Henne, or rather (as ſome will) a fighting Cocke; Iunius, from Den, ſignifying Firre-trees, which doe there abound. Andrew Velley from a people in Scythia named Dahæ, of whom Ioſephus maketh mention in his eighteenth booke, and placeth them by the Sacæ.

And Ionas Iacobus Venuſinus, a diligent ſearcher of Antiquities, out of Pomponius Mela, findeth the names of certaine Bays, opening into thoſe parts, which now the Danes inhabite, to haue beene ancientlie written CDAN and CDANONVM; which Orthographie and Pronunciation to the Latines was both harſh and hard, and therefo e they added a vowell, and wrote it CODANVM and CODANONIA, whereof (it may be thought) theſe people giuen much to piracies, were knowne and called by that name, as breaking out of thoſe Codanian ſeas. Some others, from Ptolomie, haue thought, that from his Dauciones placed in Scandia, and corruptly ſo written for Danciones; the name of theſe Danes hath beene deriued; whereto the neereneſſe of the place induceth much.

Theſe then thruſt out of their owne, fell vpon other lands with no leſſe danger then the falling of a ſword out of the ſheath, or rather, as the breaking in of a tempeſtuous ſea vpon the neighbouring grounds, ſore diſtreſſing their neighbour nations, & among them England not the leaſt, as ſhal be ſaid.

(8) And yet their name was not much notified to the world before the raigne of Iuſtinian the Emperour, about the yeere of mans ſaluation, 570. but then rouing vpon the coaſts of England, & France; in exerciſing Piracies, were noted by writers by the name Wiccingi, for that Wiccinga in the Saxon tongue, as Alfricus witneſſeth, doth ſignifie a Pirate; they were alſo called Pagani, for that they were not Chriſtians; but by the Engliſh Deniſcan, and alſo Heathon-mon, as being Ethnicks.

(9) The manner of their Religion, or rather ſuperſtition and Idolatry, was much like vnto the other Germans and Saxons, whoſe principall God and Nationall reputed-Patron, was THVR, vnto whom the fourth day of the weeke, for his ſeruice, was aſſigned, whereof as yet it beareth his name Thurſday; who in his robes was ſet vpon a ſumptuous bed, the Canopie whereof was beſpangled with ſtarres of gold; vnto him they performed their chiefe deuotions, and aſcribed all their fortunes in their affaires; as the foreſaid Dudo doth more particularly relate. They (ſaith he) ſacrificed vnto Thur, whom they worſhiped in olde time as their Lord, for whom they killed not many Sheepe, Oxen or other cattell, but offered vnto him mens blond, thinking that to be the moſt precious oblation of all others; whom, when the Prieſt by caſting of lots had deſtinated to death, they were all at once deadlie ſmitten vpon the head with oxe yokes; and euery one thus choſen by lot, hauing at one ſtroke his braines daſhed out, was laid along on the ground, and there with a narrow prying was ſought out the Fibra, or veine of the heart on the left ſide, whence drawing the blond, as their cuſtome was, and therewith beſmearing the heads of their deereſt friends, forthwith they hoiſe ſailes, thinking their Gods well pleaſed with ſuch ſacrifices, and fore-deeming happy ſucceſſe to their intended voyage.

(10) Ditmarus the Biſhop (ſomewhat ancienter then Dudo) recorded another deteſtable ſuperſtition vſed by the Danes, to purchaſe the fauour of their Gods. Becauſe (ſaith he) I haue heard wonderfull reports of the ancient ſacrifices which the Danes and Normans vſed, I will not let them paſſe vntouched. In thoſe parts there is a place, and the chiefe it is of that Kingdome, called Lederum, in a Prouince named Selon, where euery ninth yeare, in the moneth of Ianuary, after the time in which we celebrate the Nativity of our LORD, they all aſſemble together, and there they kill and ſacrifice vnto their Gods ninety and nine Men, and as many Horſes, with Dogs, and alſo Cocks, in ſtead of Hawkes, aſſuring themſelues that hereby their Gods are fully pleaſed and pacified. And thus much may ſerue for a taſt and view of their Cuſtomes, Names and Originals.

THE

THE DANES FIRST ATTEMPTS AGAINST ENGLAND.

CHAPTER II.

An.Do.787. THough many were the Piracies of the Danes on the coasts of France and this our Island in former times; yet their arriuall heere, which gaue first breath to their ensuing conquests, was not till the wane of the Saxon Monarchie, about the yeere of Christs Incarnation seuen hundred eighty seuen, in the raigne of Brightrik King of the West-Saxons: in whose dominions (after some proffer at Portland) they first came to land at Teigne-mouth in Deuonshire; being sent then with three Ships onely, to espie the wealth of this Countrie, the forces of the Inhabitants, the commodities of the Hauens, and aduantage of arriuall for a greater power, which was to follow them. The Kings Lieutenant and Prefect for that place, vnderstanding of their landing, went himselfe to demand the reason thereof; and attempting to lay hands on some to carry them to the Kings presence, he was there slaine; which they tooke as a fortunate presage of the victories wherewith they afterward ouer-ranne this Kingdome; though for the present the inhabitants inraged with the losse of their Chieftaine addressing them in great numbers to reuenge, forced some to lose their liues by the sword, the rest to saue themselues by flight to their ships.

Cambden in Dunmonij. Iohn Stow. Lambert in Peram. mentioneth their Landing at Tynemouth in the North, the neerenesse of the name (it seemes) deceiued him,

An.Do.800. (2) Notwithstanding their former preparations, they were contented to deferre their returne till the dayes of King Egbert; whose raigne (as elsewhere we haue touched) they disquieted with three seuerall inuasions; the first in the North, the second in Wales, the last in Kent; in all which, the King though with many losses, and hazards of his owne person, yet with great resolutions persisted, till hee had disburdened his land of so dangerous guests. But those Flesh-flies hauing once tasted the sweet, though often beaten off, would not long bee kept away, but could easily take, or make occasions of fresh attempts; insomuch that after their first footing they continued here their cruelties, rapine and spoile the space of two hundred and eighteene yeeres, neuer intermitting, till they had got the garland vpon their owne heads. The way whereunto was made vpon this ensuing occasion.

(3) Osbright a Northumbrian Viceroy, deputed by the West-Saxons, by chance, as hee followed his disport in Hunting, came to the house of a Noble man, named Beorn-Bocador, whose Lady of passing feature (in his absence) gaue him honourable entertainement, and intreated both himselfe and traine, to repose themselues there a while, after their wearisome delights. The Vice-roy already ensnared with her beauty, accepted her courteous offer, not so much to taste her meates, as to surfeit his eyes with her rare beauty, and lasciuiously to dote in his owne affections. The dinner ended, and all ready to depart, (as though some weighty matters were to be handled) hee commaunded an auoidance from the Presence, and taking the Lady into a withdrawing Chamber, vnder pretence of secret conference, greatly tending to the aduancement of her Lord & selfe, most vnnobly, being not able to preuaile by smooth perswasions, did by force violate her constant chastity. Which dishonour thus receiued, and her minde distracted like to Thamars, at her husbands returne, all ashamed to behold his face whose bed had so beene wronged, with flouds of teares she thus set open the sluces of her passions. 2 Sam. 13. 19.

" (4) Had thy fortunes accorded to thine owne
" desert, or thy choice proceeded as by vow was ob" liged, then had no staine of blemish touched thine
" honour, nor cause of suspition once approched thy " thought: or had my selfe beene my selfe, these " blushing cheekes had not inuited thy sharpe
" piercing eye to looke into my guilty and defiled
" breast, which now thou maist see disfurnished
" of honour, and the closet of pure chastity broken
" vp; onely the heart and soule is cleane, yet
" feares the tainture of this polluted caske, and " would haue passage (by thy reuenging hand)
" from this loathsome prison and filthy truncke.
" I must confesse our sexe is weake, and accompa" nied with many faults, yet none excuseable, how " small soeuer; much lesse the greatest, which shame
" doth follow, and inward guilt continually attend;
" yours, is created more inuiolable and firme, by " whose constancy as our flexible weakenesse is " guarded, so our true honours by your iust Armes
" should be protected. O Beorn, Beorn, (for husband
" I dare not call thee) reuenge therefore my
" wrongs, that am now made thy shame, and scan-
" dall of my sexe, vpon that monster, nay Diuell,
" Osbright, (O that very name corrupts my breath,
" and I want words to deplore my griefe) who " hath no law but his lust, nor measure of his acti" ons but his power, nor priuiledge for his loath-
" some life, but his greatnesse, whiles we with a selfe-
" feare, and seruile flatterie maske our baseneſse with " crouching obedience, and beare the wrongs of " his most vile adulteries. Thou yet art free from " such deiected and degenerate thoughts, nor
" hast thou smoothed him in his wicked and euer-
" working vices: be still thy selfe then, and truely
" Noble as thou art. It may be for his place thou ow-
" est him respect; but what? therewith the losse of ho" nour? thine affection, but not thy bed; thy Loue
" but not thy beloued, yet hast thou lost at once all
" these, and he thy only bereauer: thou wast my stay
" whilest I stayed by thee; and now being downe,

"reuenge my fall: the inſtinct of Nature doth pitty "our weakneſſe; the law of Nations doth maintaine "our honour; and the Sword of Knighthood is "ſworne-by, to be vnſheathed for our iuſt defence; "much more the lincke of wedlocke claimes it, which "hath lockt two hearts in one; but alas, that ward "is broken, and I am thy ſhame, who might haue "been thine honour. Reuenge thy ſelfe therefore both "on him and mee, elſe ſhall this hand let out the "Ghoſt that ſhall ſtill attend thee with acclamations, "till thou reuenge my ſtained bloud.

(5) Beorn vnwonted thus to bee welcommed, much amazed at his wiues maladies, with gentle words drew from her the particulars of her inward griefe, who reuealed (as well as ſhame, teares, and ſobs, would ſuffer) the manner of the deed, ſtill vrging reuenge for the wrong. Beorn touched thus to the quicke (to pacifie his diſtreſſed wife) did not a little diſſemble his wrath, and excuſing the fact, with the power of a Prince, that might command, and her owne weakneſſe, vnable to reſiſt the ſtrength of a man, commended much her loue and conſtancy; and alleadging his wrongs to be equall with hers (if not greater) in regard of their ſexe, willed her to ſet her ſtring to his tune, till fit opportunity would ſerue to ſtrike: But ſhee diſtaſting that ſweet conſort, wreſted her paſſion into ſo high a ſtraine, that nothing could be heard but reuenge and bloud.

(6) Beorn thus inſtigated by the continuall cryes of his Wife, whoſe rape already of it ſelfe had giuen ſufficient cauſe of wrath: firſt conſulting with his neereſt friends, was offered their aſſiſtance againſt that wicked and libidinous Prince, and then repayring to his Court, in preſence of them all, made knowne his vnſufferable wrongs, and with vtter defiance departed, threatning his death.

This Nobleman in his youth had beene brought vp in Denmarke, and is reported to haue beene allianced into the Daniſh royall bloud: Hee therefore accounted this Nation the ſureſt vnto himſelfe, and the fitteſt in will and power to enter his quarrell. So comming to Goderick King of that Country, made his caſe knowne, inſtantly deſiring his ayde againſt the villanie of Osbright.

Godericke glad to haue ſome quarrell to enter Britaine, leuied an Armie with all ſpeed, and preparation made for all things neceſſarie, ſendeth forth Inguar and Hubba two brethren, to command in chiefe, ouer an innumerable multitude of his Danes: which two hee thought at this time the fitteſt for the attempt, not onely for their well-approued reſolution and valour, but alſo for that hee knew them to be, on particular motiues (which vſually more affect then doth a common cauſe) implacably enraged againſt the Engliſh, on an occaſion vnfortunately hapning, but moſt lamentably purſued; which it will not be amiſſe here to annexe.

Flores Hiſtoriarum

(7) A certaine Daniſh Nobleman of the Royall lineage, named * Lothbroke, Father to this Inguar and Hubba, being vpon the ſhore, his Hawke in flying the game, fell into the Sea, which to recouer, hee entred a little Schiffe or Cock-boat, nothing foreſeeing the danger that immediately did enſue: for a ſodaine tempeſt ariſing, carried the boat into the deepe, and droue him vpon the coaſt of Norfolke, where hee came to land at the Port called Rodham, and no ſooner was ſeene, but was taken for a Spye; and preſently ſent to Edmund, KING then of that Prouince: But in his anſweres hee ſufficiently cleared that ſuſpition, and alſo declaring his Birth and misfortune, was honourably entertayned in the Court of that Eaſt-Angles King; whom Edmund King much eſteemed for his other good parts; but for his dexterity and expertneſſe in hawking, held him in a ſpeciall regard; inſomuch that his Falconer named Bericke, conceiued ſuch ſecret enuy and deadly hatred thereat, as hauing him alone in a wood, hee cowardly murthered him, and hid his dead body in a Buſh.

* That is, Leatherbrooke.

(8) Lothbroke, in the Kings preſence and Court, was ſoone miſt, and diligent inquiſition made, could not be found; vntill his Spaniell, which would not forſake his dead Maſters corps, came fawningly vnto the King, as ſeeming to begge reuenge on ſo bloody an act; which hee did more then once, and at length being obſerued, and followed by the trace, the dead body was found; and Bericke conuicted for the murther; his iudgement was to be put into Lothbrokes boat, and that without either tackle or Oare, as hee therein arriued, and ſo left to the ſeas mercy to be ſaued by deſtiny, or ſwallowed vp by iuſt deſert. Murther will out.

But behold the euent; the boat returned to the ſame place; and vpon the ſame coaſt arriued, from whence it had beene driuen, euen in Denmarke, where Bericke being knowne, and hands laid on him, to free himſelfe from the puniſhment of his butcherly fact, he added Treaſon to Murther, laying it to the charge of innocent King Edmund.

(9) In reuenge whereof, and likewiſe in Godericks quarrell, Inguar and Hubba, ſonnes to the murthered Prince, being now made Generals of the Army of the Danes; firſt arriuing at Holderneſſe, burnt vp the Country, and without mercy maſſacred all before them, ſparing neither ſexe, nor calling, nor age; and ſurprizing Yorke, which Osbright had taken for his refuge, there ſlew that luſtfull Prince, with all his forces, and poſſeſſed that City; and afterwards burſting into Norfolke, ſent this meſſage vnto King Edmund: That Inguar, the moſt victorious Prince, dread both by ſea and land, hauing ſubdued diuers Countries vnto his ſubiection, and now arriued in thoſe parts, where hee meant to winter, charged Edmund to diuide with him his riches, and to become his vaſſaile and ſeruant.

The KING aſtonied at this ſtrange and vnexpected Ambaſſage, conſulted with his Counſell, where one of his Biſhops (then his Secretary, and a principall man) vſed perſwaſions to him to yeeld, for preuenting greater miſchiefe; who notwithſtanding returned this Anſwere: Goe tell thy Lord, that Edmund the Chriſtian King, for the loue of this temporall life, will not ſubiect himſelfe to a Heathen and Pagan Duke. Wherevpon Inguar and Hubba, with the furious troupes of their Danes, purſued the King to Thetford, and (as Fabian ſaith) to Framingham, others to Halesdon; where he pittying the terrible ſlaughter of his people, yeelded himſelfe to their perſecutions; and for that he would not deny CHRIST, and his Chriſtian faith, was bound to a Tree or Stake, and with their arrowes ſo ſhot to death: whoſe body was afterward there buried, and therevpon tooke the name of S^t. Edmunds-bury, as wee haue formerly touched in his Raigne, *Lib. 7. (10) Whether theſe were the very true cauſes, or ſome other, which drew theſe Danes hither, moſt certaine it is, and too lamentable experience ſhewed, that hither they came (by Writers account) about the yeere of Chriſt eight hundred, and in the dayes of King Brightrick. Neither want there Authors who aſcribe certaine predictions to haue forerunne the yeere 800. made vnfortunate by their firſt attempts, fore-ſhewed ſeauen yeeres before, by ſhowers of bloud falling from heauen, and bloudy Croſſes markt therewith vpon the garments of men, reported by the learned Alcuinus, who was inſtructor to Charles the Great, and borne in the countie of Yorke, where this wonder happened: which himſelfe ſaw and teſtified vnto Ethelbert King of that Prouince, as Malmsbury hath written, and was thought by Houeden, Higdon, Fabian and others, to haue beene ſent for ſignes before their bloudy aſſaults, which beganne at the day-ſpring of the Saxons Monarchy, when it promiſed a moſt faire aſcent to their heires ſucceeding, but mounted to the higheſt, againe declined as the ſetting Sunne, and fell vnder the cloudes of their owne ruines, ſo carried by the iuſt reuenging hand of God: For thoſe Saxons hauing by bloud and warre vnſeated the Bloud reuenged with bloud.

Britaines

Britaines of their land and right, by bloud and warre, were by theſe Pagan Danes ſo vnceſſantly moleſted, that no place was freed from their tyranny, nor any ſtate ſure, long to hold that which they enioyed, nor their liues ſecured from a daily expectation of their ſauage ſwords.

(11) Whoſe many inuaſions and cruell proceedings againſt this land and nation, are already ſhewed in the raignes of theſe Saxon Kings, who then felt their heauy ſtrokes in warre, hauing nothing almoſt memorable otherwiſe, to enlarge their fames and ſtories with, beſides theſe their valours in reſiſting ſo mighty and almoſt vnrepugnable an enemie. Therefore omitting to repeat ſuch things as in their ſucceſſions are handled, we will fall neerer the time of the wiſhed harueſt of their full Conqueſts; ſomewhat remembring the Reader here, of thoſe bloudie affaires, which the Engliſh at ſeuerall times felt and endured.

(12) Such was the murther of holy Edmund, King of the Eaſt-Angles, with Daniſh arrowes martyred to death as hee ſtood bound vnto a ſtake, euer calling on the name of IESVS: Of Ella and Osbright Gouernours of Northumberland by them ſlaine, and that Prouince for a long time after by them enioyed, and made ſubiect to their furies: Of Burdred King of Mercia, by them expulſed, who with his QVEENE Ethelſwith, were forced to abandon their Kingdome, leauing it to the poſſeſſion of theſe Pagan intruders, and to ſeeke their ſecurities in forreine Countries, where at Rome in Italy hee dyed, and at Padua his Wife, as hath beene ſaid: Of Ethelred King of the Weſt-Saxons, that in one yeeres continuance fought nine bloudy battels againſt them, in the laſt whereof at Merton, hee receiued his deaths wound, and this Kingdome an vncureable blow: Of Elfred that moſt famous and learned King of the Weſt Saxons alſo, driuen by them to ſuch diſtreſſe, that hee was forced to leaue his Princely Court, and to remaine ſecret in a poore Cow-heards houſe vnknowne and diſguiſed, in the Iſle of Ethlingſey in the County of Sommerſet, and thence to aduenture himſelfe among the Daniſh hoſt, as a baſe Minſtrell and contemptible Make-ſport, till hee had perfectly learned their ſecrets, and after with his ſword, through the thickeſt of thoſe Enemies, made a way to his owne moſt glorious Monarchie.

Chapter III.

An.D.1017.

HE ſailes of the Danes thus ouer-filled with the gales of their ſwelling fortunes, and themſelues arriued at the Port of their long ſought ſoueraignty, caſt anker as it were at the hauen of their wiſhed deſire, and prepared themſelues to a ſetled reſt: for Canutus poſſeſt of halfe the Kingdome by compoſition with Edmund, now after his death ſeazed vpon the whole; and that all things (as was pretended) might proceed with iuſtice, and concord, he called a Counſell of the Engliſh Nobility at London; wherein was propounded, whether, in the agreement betwixt Edmund and him, any claime of title to the Crowne had beene reſerued for King Edmunds brethren or ſonnes. The Engliſh, that had paid a very deere rate for their ouerbold reſiſtance before, not daring now to buy, with too late repentance, the wrath of this Dane, abſolutely anſwered, No; and hauing learned to appeaſe Princes with flattery, offered their ſwords againſt any ſuch claimes, and tooke themſelues the Oath of alleagiance vnto Canutus; who being a very wiſe and politike Prince, thought neuer the better of them for ſuch their doings; whoſe truths thus failing towards their naturall Princes, could neuer (hee well knew) ſtand firme for him or his forreine poſteritie.

Polidor. li. 6. f. 18.

Feare makes flatterers.

(2) But being thus cleered of all other oppoſites, hee prepared with great roialty for his Coronation, which was performed at London, by the hands of Lyuingus ſurnamed Elſtane, Arbiſhop of Canterburie, in the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus 1017. being the ſecond King of Denmarke of that Name, the firſt of England, and the thirty fourth Monarch of this Land. His firſt deſignes for the eſtabliſhment of the Crowne to himſelfe and Daniſh iſſue, was a care to preuent others neere vnto the claime, and therefore, taking counſell with Earike, baniſhed Edwin, who for his melancholy and regardleſſe deportment, was commonly called, the King of Churles, ſon of King Ethelred, and brother of Edmund; notwithſtanding, hee was guilefully recalled, and treacherouſly murthered by his owne men, whoſe bodie they buried at Taueſtocke in Deuon-ſhire.

Canutus his care and pollicies to ſettle his crowne.

(3) One cloud thus ouerblowne, two others appeared, far more dangerous in Canutus ſight; namely Edward and Edmund the ſonnes of the Iron-ſide, whom albeit their young yeeres might haue freed from ſuſpition of conſpiracies, and their gentle diſpoſitions from enuying his glory, yet the bright raies of a Diadem ſo dazled his iealous eie, that euer he ſaw (to his owne ſeeming) the reflection thereof ſhine from their faces: but aſhamed (ſaith Higden) to lay hand on them himſelfe, ſent them to his halfe brother of Sweden, to be made away, as we haue ſaid. In the doubtfull times betweene Edmund and Canute, when the ſcale of warre was held of either hands alike, Queene Emma had ſent Edward, and Alfred (her ſonnes by King Ethelred) vnto her brother Duke Richard of Normandy; whereby (we ſee) the Land was emptied of the Engliſh bloud Roiall, and the Crowne left for the Dane without competition.

withſtanding, after good deliberation knowing him childleſſe of any lawfull ſucceſſor, vpon couenants agreed, that the iſſue of her body by him, ſhould inherite the Engliſh Crowne, the ſuit was granted, hoping alſo, if that failed betwixt them, to eſtabliſh her other ſonnes by King Ethelred.

Emma a very prudent Lady.

This prouident reſpect ſo pleaſed the ſubiects, that it both drew the hearts of the Engliſh vnto Canutus, and their loue vnto Emma in a ſurpaſſing meaſure, as the booke penned to her praiſe, and written in that age, intituled Encomium Emmæ, ſufficiently doth ſhew.

(5) Neither was her louing care limitted onely to her Sonnes, but further extended towards the Common-wealth, being much peſtred then with his Danes, that lay lazie and idle, as drones in the hiue, who at her inſtigations were ſent into Denmarke; and leſt they ſhould through diſcontents make any ſtirres either here or there, had a largeſſe (to buy their contentment) of foureſcore and two thouſand pounds.

(6) Canutus his next care for the maintenance of his owne ſafety, and the continuance of his new got Empire, was the eſtabliſhment of good lawes) which if duly executed, are the very ſinewes and ſtrongeſt guards of all States) to be adminiſtred and practiſed both on the Engliſh and Dane alike: wherefore calling a Parliament of his Peeres vnto Oxford, there eſtabliſhed many wholſom Acts both for the Clergy and Laitie to obſerue; ſome of which were divulged by the praiſe-worthy care of a ſtudious Antiquarie, and a few, as touching Religion, as a reliſh of the reſt, we thinke it not amiſſe to giue the Reader a taſte of.

(8) Theſe and many other were made, whereby ſinne was much reſtrayned, and this realme peaceably and iuſtly gouerned. As likewiſe ſundry other countries were by his godly and royall care; as in eſpeciall is recorded of a young Gentleman of the Daniſh royall bloud, named Odin, whom King Canute brought ouer with him into England, to be here trayned vp in learning, where he profited ſo well, as alſo by his trauaile through Fraunce (whereby hee much encreaſed both his knowledge and experience) that hee attained the ſurname of SAPIENT, and the Philoſopher, and therefore was called Odin-char. for the deere eſteeme wherein all men held him. This man by preaching in Finland, Zeland, Scandia, and Sweuland, conuerted great multitudes to the Faith of CHRIST.

Earle Goodwines good ſeruice to Canutus.

Canute ignorant of this acted enterpriſe, had notice in the morning that the Engliſh were fled, for that their ſtation was left, and not a man found: wherefore following the tract, euen to the enemies campe, by ſtreames of bloud, and dead bodies of the Vandals; hee ſaw the great ouerthrow that the Engliſh had giuen them, for which hee euer after held them in great eſtimation.

(10) Albertus Krantius, the Daniſh hiſtorian, reporteth that Olanus King of Sweyden, hauing aſſiſted Canute againſt Edmund the Ironſide, and ſeeing himſelfe to be neglected in the compoſition betwixt them, moued ſuch ſtirres in Denmarke, that Canutus was forced thither againe; where by the proweſſe of his Engliſh hee repulſed Olanus, who laſtly was ſlaine by his owne ſubiects.

(11) William of Malmesbury and Mathew of Weſtminſter record, that in the yeere 1032. he vndertooke an expedition into Scotland, with proſperous ſucceſſe againſt Malcolme the King thereof, with two other Princes called Melbeath and Ieohmare. But being at length ouerburdened as it were with his owne greatneſſe, and ſurfeited with glory, which ſomtimes he had ſo greedily deſired (as euen the greateſt earthly delights haue their fulneſſe) hee reſolued on a more placable courſe of life, and to affect a higher and heauenly glory, which hath neuer ſatiety or end. And therefore his deuotion being great vnto Godward, on a zealous intent, (ſuch as S. Paul commended in the deuout Iſraelites) hee tooke a iourney tto Rome, to viſite the ſepulchers of S. Peter and Paul in the fifteenth yeere of his raigne; and thence ſent his letters to his Engliſh Biſhops and Nobility, beginning thus.

(12) Canute King of all England, Denmarke, Norway and Sweyden, to Ailnothus Metropolitan, &c. Wherein hauing firſt ſet downe the reaſon of his pilgrimage to Rome, which was eſpecially to honour S. Peter. as hee had beene taught by Wiſemen, that S. Peter had receiued from Chriſt the great power of binding and looſing, and was alſo the Key-bearer of heauen-gates, for which cauſe (leſt S. Peter ſhould not open the ſame vnto him when he ſhould come thither) he held it moſt behouefull for him to procure his Patronage more then all the reſt of Saints; then making relation of his honourable entertainement with the Emperour, Pope, and other forreine Princes, ſheweth what complaint hee had made againſt the exceſſiue exactions and huge ſummes of money extorted by the Pope from the Engliſh Arch-Biſhops, at ſuch time as they receiued their Palles from Rome; for redreſſe whereof, and of other abuſes, the Pope in a ſolemne aſſembly of foure Arch-Biſhops, twenty Biſhops, and an innumerable multitude of Princes and Nobles obliged himſelfe: And thence proceedeth in vowing the whole remainder of his life and reigne, to the onely ſeruice of God, and due adminiſtration of Iuſtice to his people; to which end, hee firſt giues command to his Counſellours, that thence forward they dare not, for whatſoeuer reſpect, to giue way or conniuence to any the leaſt iniuſtice in his Kingdom; and next to his Officers of Iuſtice, that as they tender his roiall fauour and their own liues, they ſwerue not from Equity in execution of their places, in reſpect of any man whoſoeuer, no not, for the enriching of the Kings owne Coffers, becauſe (ſaith hee) I hold it not needfull, that treaſure ſhould be heaped together for mee, by any vniuſt exactions: and ſo concludeth with a ſtrict charge to all his Biſhops and Iuſtices, vpon their allegiance both to God and himſelfe, to take order in his abſence, that Gods Church, and his Miniſters, be not defrauded of their Tithes and rights, whereof hee vowes at his returne to take a moſt ſeuere account.

Moſt rich and royall Iewels hee gaue the Church of Wincheſter, whereof one is recorded to bee a Croſſe, worth as much as the whole reuenew of England amounted to in one yeare: vnto Couentry hee gaue the Arme of S. Auguſtine the great Doctor; which hee bought at Papia in his returne from Rome, and for which hee paid an hundred talents of ſiluer, and one of gold.

(15) The magnificent greatnes of this glorious King, ſo ouerflowed in the mouthes of his flatterers, that they extolled him, with Alexander, Cyrus, and Cæſar, and to be poſſeſſed with power more then humane: To conuict theſe his fawning ouerprizers, being then at Southampton, he commanded (ſaith Henry of Huntington) that his chaire ſhould be ſet on the ſhore, when the ſea beganne to flow, and then in the preſence of his many attendants; ſpake "thus to that Element. Thou art part of my do-"minion, and the ground whereon I ſit is mine, nei-"ther was there euer any that durſt diſobey my com-"maund, or breaking it, eſcaped vnpuniſhed; I "charge thee therefore preſume not into my land, nei-"ther wet thou theſe robes of thy Lord: but the Sea (which obeyeth onely one Lord) giuing no heed to his threats, kept on the vſuall courſe of tide, firſt wetting his skirts, and after his thighes; when ſuddainely riſing to giue way for the ſtill-approaching waues, he thus ſpake in the hearing of all: Let the worlds inhabitants know, that vaine and weake is the power of their Kings; and that none is worthy the name of King, but hee that keepes both heauen, earth and ſea in obedience, and bindeth them in the euerlaſting law of ſubiection. After which time he would neuer ſuffer the Crowne to bee ſet vpon his head, but preſently crowned therewith the picture of our Sauiour on the Croſſe at Wincheſter: vnto ſuch ſtrong illuſions were thoſe godly Princes led, by the guides that euer made gaine of their deuotions.

His humility.

(16) From the Example of this Canutus (ſaith Peter Pictauienſis Chancellor of Paris) aroſe the cuſtom to hang vp the Armor of worthy men in Churches, as offerings conſecrated vnto Him in whoſe battails they had purchaſed renowne, either by victory and life, or in their Countries ſeruice attained to an honourable death. And ſurely, howſoeuer this King is taxed of ambition, pride and vaine-glory, for which ſome haue not ſtucke to ſay, that he made his iourney to Rome, rather to ſhew his pompe and riches, then for any humble deuotion or religious intent, yet by many his intercurrent actions and lawes of piety enacted, hee may iuſtly be cleared of that imputation; as alſo by the teſtimony of Simon Monk of Durham, who reporteth his humility to be ſuch, that with his owne hands hee did helpe to remoue the body of S. Aelphegus at the tranſlation of it from London vnto Canterbury, whom the Danes (notwithſtanding his Archiepiſcopall & ſacred calling) before had martyred at Greenwich: and by the teſtimony of Guido, Polydore, Lanquet, and others, he was a Prince of ſuch temperance and iuſtice, that no other in this Weſt of the World was ſo highly renowned, or might be compared vnto him in heroicall vertues, or true humility.

(17) Saxo Grammaticus, and Albertus Krantius, the Writers of the Daniſh hiſtories, deduce Canutus by a lineall ſucceſſion through the line of their Kings in this manner: Hee was (ſay they) the ſonne of King Swaine, (ſurnamed Tiugſ-keg) by Sigred his wife, the widow of Erick, by whom ſhe had Olafe Scotconning, King of Sweyden: vnto which Swaine ſhee bare alſo Oſtrid a daughter, the mother of Thira, the mother of King Swaine the yonger. The elder Swaine was the ſonne of King Harold, ſurnamed Blaatand, by Gonhild his Queene, who bare him alſo Iring King of Northumberland; and Gonhild Queene of North-Wales. The father of Harold was King Gormond, whoſe Queene was Thira the daughter of King Ethelred, the twenty third Monarch of England, who bare vnto him the ſaid Harold, and another Canute, both moſt valiant Princes; which two Gallants inuading this land, were (for their braue reſolutions) by their Grand-father proclaimed heires apparant to all his dominions: the credite of which relations I leaue to my forenamed Authors; but Canute (the elder brother) died very ſoone after, being deadly wounded in the ſiege of Dublin in Ireland; where perceiuing death at hand, hee gaue ſtrict charge to his attendants, to keepe the ſame very ſecret till the City were taken, that ſo neither his owne Army ſhould be daunted, nor the enemy encouraged by the loſſe of the Generall. Gurmo, his aged Father, (to digreſſe but in a word) ſo incredibly loued him, that he had vowed to kill with his owne hands any perſon whoſoeuer that ſhould tell him the newes of his ſonnes death: which when Thira his mother now heard of, ſhee vſed this policie to make it knowne to the King her husband. Shee prepared mourning apparrell for him, and all other things fitting for funerall exequies, laying aſide all Regall robes, and ceremonies of princely ſtate, without intimating any cauſe of this ſad ſolemnity; which the old King no ſooner perceiued, but he lamentably cried out, woe is me, I know my ſonne is dead; and with exceſſiue griefe hee preſently died. But to returne from that Canutus, to cloſe vp the raigne of this our Monarch in hand.

(18) In whom the Daniſh glories hauing aſcended to the higheſt, beganne now againe to decline towards their wane by the death of this great King; who, after hee had in great glory raigned aboue nineteen yeeres, deceaſed at Shaftesbury in the county of Dorſet, the twelfth of Nouember, the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation, 1035. and was buried in the Church of the old Monaſtery at Wincheſter, which being after new built, his bones with many other Engliſh Saxon Kings were taken vp, and are preſerued in guilt coffers fixed vpon the wals of the Quire in that Cathedrall Church.

His Wiues.

(19) Alfgiue, by moſt writers, a concubine to King Canutus, was the daughter of a Mercian Duke named Elfhelme, who is ſaid to haue beene Earle of Northampton; and her Mothers name was Vlfrune, Inheritrix of the Towne Hampton in Stafford-ſhire, from her called Vlfrun-Hampton, now Woller-hampton: This Lady Alfgiue to make Canutus more firme to her loue, her ſelfe being barren, is reported to haue fained Child-birth, and to haue laid in her bed the ſonne of a Prieſt, whom Canute tooke to be his owne, and named him Swaine; him afterwards hee created King of Norway, which lately hee had conquered from Olaffe called the Martyr. others, ſhee vſed in bringing forth Harold her ſecond Sonne, who was (ſay they) the ſonne of a Sowter; notwithſtanding I thinke the condition of the Mother, who liued in diſdaine, and died in diſgrace; rather cauſed this report to be blazed, then any ſuch baſeneſſe of birth in the ſonnes.

(20) Emma, the ſecond wife of King Canute, was the widow of King Ethelred the Vnready; and from the time of her firſt marriage was called in England, Elfgiue, after the name of moſt of the former Queens, which had ſucceeded Saint Elfgiue. Shee was married vnto him in the moneth of Iuly, and yeere of Chriſt Ieſus one thouſand and ſeauenteene, being the firſt yeere of his raigne: whoſe wife ſhee was eighteene yeeres, and ſuruiuing, kept ſtill at Winchester, vnto which Church ſhee gaue nine Manours, according to the number of thoſe firy Plow-ſhares that ſhe was forced to goe vpon, for her purgation, in the raigne of Edward her ſonne, as ſhall be ſaid. This Church ſhee adorned with many goodly veſtures, and very rich Iewels: and deceaſing in this City the ſixt of March, the yeere of Grace one thouſand fiftie and two, and ninth of her ſonne king Edwards raigne, was buried in the Church of S. Swithine neere vnto Canutus her huſband.

His Iſſue.

(21) Sweyn, the eldeſt ſonne of Canute by Lady Alfgiue, was borne before his father was King of England, and before his fathers death, was conſtituted King of Norway, lately conquered from King Olaffe the Martyr; where hee beganne his Raigne, in the yeere of mans ſaluation one thouſand thirty and fiue, being the eighteenth of his fathers Raigne in England; and after he had with diſlikes ruled that Realme, the ſpace of fiue yeeres, hee was reiected of the Norwegians his ſubiects, and deceaſing without heire of his body, left the Kingdome to the natiue heire, Magnus, the ſonne of Olaffe, who had beene wrongfully diſpoſſeſſed by Canute.

Albert. Kruntius.

(22) Harold, the ſecond ſonne of King Canute and of Lady Alfgiue, was alſo borne before his father obtained the Engliſh Crowne, & for his exceeding ſwiftnes was ſurnamed Hare-foote: He remained with his father in England, after he had diſpoſed of Denmarke to Hardi-canute, and Norway to Sweyne, his brethren, expecting ſomething in reuerſion. But perceiuing at his fathers death, that England was alſo appointed to his brother Hardi-canute, hee tooke the aduantage of his abſence, and aſſumed the Soueraignety of this Kingdome to himſelfe.

(23) Hardi-Canute, the third ſonne of King Canute, and his firſt by Queene Emma his wife, was borne about the beginning of his fathers Raigne, and towards the end of the ſame, was conſtituted King of the Danes, and deſigned to ſucceede him after his death in the Kingdome of England: But being abſent then in Denmarke, was diſappointed by his brother Harold, who ſucceeded his father, after whoſe death he alſo ſucceeded him.

(24) Gunhilda, the daughter of King Canute, and of Emma his Queene, was the firſt wife of Henry the Third Romane Emperour, ſonne of the Emperour Conrad, the ſecond of that name, ſurnamed Salike: Shee was a Lady of a ſurpaſſing beauty, which either mooued her husbands minde vnto iealouſie, or the ouer-lauiſh report thereof to breede ſurmize of incontinencie; for accuſed ſhee was of adulterie, and to defend her cauſe by combat, none could be found, till laſtly her Page, brought with her from England, ſeeing no other would aduenture for her innocencie, entred the liſt, himſelfe but a youth, in regard of the other Combatant being a Giant-like man; yet in fight at one blow, cutting the ſinewes of his enemies legge, with another he feld him to the ground, where preſently with his ſword, he tooke his head from the ſhoulders, and ſo redeemed his Ladies life. After which hard vſage, the Empreſſe Gunhilda forſooke her husbands bed, and by no meanes could bee brought againe vnto the ſame, but tooke the holy vaile of a Nunne in the Towne of Burges in Flanders; where ſhee ſpent the reſt of her life, and after her death was buried in the Collegiate Church of S. Donation, being the principall of that Towne, where her Monument remaineth beſides the North dore of the ſame Church vnto this day.

(25) Another Lady of the like ſanctity, is reported to be the daughter of King Canute, & the ſecond wife of Godeſcalke Prince of the Vandals, by whom he had Henry King of that Nation. They both are ſaid to haue ſuffered Martyrdome for the faith of Chriſt; he firſt at the City of Lenzim, and ſhe after at Michelenburg, being moſt cruelly tortured to death with whips. Peter de Ichan.

Floriatensis.

ANVTVS being dead, and Hardicanute his sonne by Queen Emma, then in Denmarke; Harold his elder (but base-brother) foreslowed not the opportunity offered; for seeing himselfe in his fathers life time neglected, and by Will at his death, England with that of Denmarke heaped vpon Hardicanut: as quicke in apprehension, as hee was of footmanship (whereof arose the surname Hare-foot,) made strong his side by the Londoners, and Danes, Mercians & Northumbrians very many, yea and some great Personages amongst them, affecting his claime: but Goodwin of Kent, who had the Queene and her treasure in keeping, stood in his way, pretending himselfe Guardian of her Children, & the Will of Canutus, who appointed his sonne by her to succeed.

(2) The opposition grew strong, and the factions ripened, euen ready to seede, onely the lingering of Hardi-canute gaue leaue vnto Harold to better his side by daily supplies, and the feares of ciuill sedition moued the Nobility to argue with words and not weapons, the title depending betwixt these two brethren. At Oxford they met, where the presence of the one, downe-peized the absence of the other, so that their voices went onely with Harold, and presently proclaimed and consecrated him King.

(3) He beganne his raigne the yeere of Christs humanity, 1036. and was very solemnly crowned at Oxford by Elnothus Arch-bishoppe of Canterbury, though for a time, hee was very vnwilling to performe that seruice; for it is reported, that hee hauing the regall scepter and Crowne in his custody, with an oath refused to consecrate any other for King, so long as the Queenes children were liuing; For (said he) Canutus committed them to my trust and assurance, and to them will I giue my faith and allegiance. This Scepter and Crowne therefore I here lay downe vpon this Altar; neither doe I denie, nor deliuer them to you; but I require by the Apostolike authority, all Bishops, that none of them presume to take the same away, neither therewith that they consecrate you for King: as for your selfe if you dare, you may vsurpe that which I haue committed to God on this his Table.

Notwithstanding that great thunderclap was allaied with the showers of golden promises, of his iust and religious Gouernment intended, though present experience manifested the contrary.

Encom. Emma.

(4) For saith the auncient Writer of the booke called Encomium Emmæ: Harold no sooner was established King, but that he sought meanes how to rid Queen Emma out of the way, and that secretly, for openly hee durst not attempt any thing against her: Shee in silence kept her selfe quiet, looking for the issue of his designes. But Harold malitiously purposing, tooke counsell how hee might traine into his Haye the sonnes of Queene Emma, that so all occasion of dangers against him might at once for all be cut off: many proiects propounded, this lastly tooke effect; that a letter should be counterfeited in Queen Emma's name, vnto her sonnes Edward and Alfred, to instigate them to attempt the crowne vsurped by Harold, against their right, the tenure whereof wee haue thought good here to insert.

" (5) Emma, Queene onely in name, to Edward "and Alfred her sonnes, sendeth motherly gree- "tings. Whilest seuerally wee bewaile the death "of our Soueraigne, my Lord and your Father, and "your selues (deare sonnes) still more and more dis- "possessed from the Kingdome, your lawfull inhe- "ritance; I greatly maruaile what you determine to doe,

"doe, ſith you know, that the delay of attempts "giues the vſurper more leaſure to lay his foun- "dation, and more ſafely to ſet thereon his in- "tended buildings; for inceſſantly hee poſteth "from Towne to Towne, and from City to City, "to make the Lords and Rulers thereof his, either "by threates, prayers, or preſent rewards. But "this in priuate they ſignifie, that they had rather "one of you their Natiues ſhould raigne ouer them, "then this Vſurper and Daniſh ſtranger. Where- "fore my deſire is, that either of you ſecretly, and "with all ſpeed come vnto mee, whereby wee may "aduiſe together what is to be done in this ſo great "an enterpriſe: then whoſe good ſucceſſe, I deſire "nothing more. Faile not therefore to ſend word by "this my meſſenger, how you meane to proceed: "and ſo fare ye well, my deereſt bowels, and very in- "wards of my heart.

(6) Theſe letters thus carried and cunningly de- liuered, were digeſted as ſauouring of no falſhood; and by the bringers, others returned, that Alfred ſhould come ſhortly ouer to attend his mothers deſignes: theſe newes brought vnto Harold, the coaſts were fore-laid, and longing expectation atten- ded the prey. Alfred as forward to ſet on his voyage, made Baldwin Earle of Flanders his; and ſome few Bullogners increaſing his Fleet, hee tooke the ſeas for England: where comming to ſhore, Earle Good- win met him, and binding his aſſurance with his corporall oath, became his liege-man, and guide to Queene Emma; but being wrought firme for Ha- rold, trecherouſly led theſe ſtrangers a contrary way, and at Guilford lodged them in ſeuerall com- panies, making known to the King what hee had done: who forthwith apprehended them, euen in their beds, and in the morning as chained priſoners, committing them to ſlaughter, (contrary to the wonted manner of military decimation,) did ſpare and exempt onely euery tenth man for ſeruice or ſale: Prince Alfred himſelfe was ſent priſoner to the Iſle of Ely, where hauing his eyes inhumanely put out, liued not long after in torment and griefe.

Encom. Emmæ.

Rand Higden, in Polychr. lib. 6. cap. 21.

(7) Some adde vnto the former, an other, much more horrible kinde of cruelty, as that his belly was opened, and one end of his bowels drawne out, and faſtned to a ſtake, his body pricked with ſharpe needles, or poinards, was forced about till all his entrails were extracted, in which moſt ſauage torture hee ended his innocent life.

Wil. Coxton.

(8) Harold thus freed from one, the other hee thought would no further attempt; and therefore the more boldly ſet himſelfe againſt their mother Queene Emma, whoſe goods he confiſcated, and ba- niſhed her out of the Realme: who thus diſtreſſed, was honourably receiued, and for three yeeres ſpace maintained by Baldwin Earle of Flanders.

Henry Hunting.

(9) The Dane then ſeeing his hazards thus preuen- ted, ſought ſo to ſecure himſelfe, and with ſixeteene ſhippes of the Daniſh Fleete kept the ſeas, which continued euer in a readineſſe, and waffed from Port to Port; to the maintenance whereof, hee charged the Engliſh with great payments, to their no little grudge and repining; whereby he loſt the loue of his ſubiects before it had well taken root in their hearts.

(10) Neither yet held hee on long in theſe diſ- royall courſes, for that his ſpeedy death did cut off the infamy of a longer life; and is ſaid to haue died at Oxford in the moneth of Aprill, the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus 1040. after hee had raigned foure yeeres and ſome moneths: whoſe body was at firſt interred at Weſtminſter, hauing beene neither in warres ſo har- dy, nor in gouernement ſo proſperous, as his Father Canute, before him had beene, nor left behind him ei- ther wife or children, to ſuruiue his perſon, or reuiue his name.

CHAPTER V.

An.D.1040.

Simon Dunel.

Mat. Weſtminſter.

THE States of the land, as well Engliſh as Danes, that had ſtood for Harold, both in obtaining and keeping the Crowne, now ſeeing him fallen, thought it beſt to make way for their peace, before Hardicanute by his ſword ſhould purchaſe their ſubiection; therefore with all haſt they ſent into Denmarke, with proffers of the Scepter, and their forward allegiance only vnto him. Thoſe parts beyond ſeas, were not then ſo ſubiectiue, as to build his hopes there, vpon any ſure ground; for the Norwegians had thruſt out his halfe-brother Sweyne, and had elected Magnus the ſon of Olaffe for their King; ſo that ſmall aſſurance could he perceiue of any quiet common-weale among them: and therefore fore-ſlowing not the offer, immediately imbarked his men of warre, and with ſo fauourable a winde tooke ſeas, that hee arriued vpon the coaſt of Kent, the ſixt day after hee had ſet ſaile out of Denmarke; and with great pompe conueyed to London, was there proclaimed Englands King.

(2) Hee beganne his Raigne in the yeere of Grace one thouſand and forty, and was crowned in London by Elnothus Arch-biſhoppe of Canterbury, being the thirty ſixt Monarch of the Engliſh men: his raigne was ſpent in doing nothing, vnleſſe you will ſay, in doing euill he did ſomething.

(3) For no ſooner had he a power to command, but he forthwith commanded the body of his halfe-brother the deceaſed King, to be digged vp, and with ſpitefull diſgrace to be throwne into Thamiſis, where it remained vntill a Fiſherman found it, and buried it in the Church-yard of S. Clement without Temple-Barre, commonly called Saint Clement-Danes, for that (ſaith Stow) it was the burying place of the Danes: this cruelty ſhewed, was pretended for the hard vſage of Queene Emma his mother, though partly ſpiced with reuenge for his vſurpation of the Crowne againſt him.

Iohn Stow in his Suruey of London.

(4) Yet worthily is hee to be commended, for the reuerent regard hee bare to his Mother, and louing affection to his Brother; for no ſooner was he riſen out of the throne of his Coronation, but that hee ſent honourable Embaſſage vnto Earle Baldwine, with many thankes to him, for her princely vſage, and for her to returne into England to her former eſtate, and place of Queene. His brother Prince Edward comming ouer to viſite them both, was moſt honourably receiued, retained, and diſmiſſed; and theſe are the vertues regardable in this King.

(5) But his vices were more, and concerned more perſons; for a great Epicure hee was, and giuen much vnto Cuppes, whereby he trained the body to belly cheere, and ſenſe to be ſubiect to ſloath and drunkenneſſe; foure times euery day were his tables ſpred, and plenteouſly with all Cates furniſhed, euer commanding that his courtiers, gueſts, and ſeruants, ſhould rather leaue, for ſuperfluity, then call, for lack: which howſoeuer it was in him accounted for Roiall bounty, yet it cauſed in the people (who vſe to praiſe the Soueraignes vertues, but imitate his vices) a riotous looſeneſſe, and the Common-weale to lie ſicke of conſumptions bred by ſuch exceſſe of thoſe groſſe humours in her body.

(6) This wrought in him a careleſſe neglect of gouernment in State, ſo that the whole managing thereof was committed to his mother Queene Emma, a woman extreamely couetous, and to Goodwin, the rich and politicke Earle of Kent; who ſeeing the preſent ſtate carried wholly away with preſent pleaſures ſures, thought that a fitte ſubiect for him to worke vpon; for the King not married (vnleſſe it were to his lewd will) and Edward likely to ſucceede, of an ouer-ſoft temperature; he thought theſe both might proue aduantageous to his ambition, and therefore bethought him, how the Crowne might be worne by him or his.

Goodwins diuelish policy.

(7) Therefore, to ſeparate the hearts of the ſubiects from the Prince (then which, there can be no greater a wound vnto both,) hee cauſed the King to impoſe heauy tributes vpon the Engliſh, onely to pay the Danes in his Fleete, appointing euery common Souldier and Mariner, to receiue eight markes in money,& euery officer and Maſter twelue; which amounted to the ſumme of thirty two thouſand,one hundred forty ſeauen pounds: for the payment whereof,there was ſo great a grudge, that two of the Collectors, Thurſtane and Feader were ſlaine by the Citizens of Worceſter; which cauſed their City to be burnt, and part of the country ſpoiled by the Kings commaund, and their Biſhop Alfred expulſed the See, till with money he had purchaſed his peace. This Biſhops hands (as was ſaid) were deep in the murther of Prince Alfred,the Kings halfe brother,whom wee ſpake of; yea, and Goodwin himſelfe was put to his purgation by oath, for the clearing of his ſuſpitions in that treacherous and brutiſh fact: which oath was the lighter vrged, and the eaſier receiued for his rich and bounteous gifts,immediately before preſented to the King, and that was a Shippe, whoſe ſterne was of gold, with foureſcore Souldiers therein placed, all vniformely and richly ſuited: On their heads they all wore guilt Burgenets, and on their bodies a triple guilt habergion, a Sword with guilt hilts girded to their waſtes, a Battaile-axe (after the manner of the Danes) on their left ſhoulders, a Target with guilt boſſes borne in their left hands, a Dart in the right, their armes bound about with two bracelets of gold containing ſixteene ounces in weight.

(8) Aimundus Bremenſis writing the Stories of thoſe times; ſheweth,that the three ſonnes of Canute were poſſeſſed of the three Kingdomes,England,Denmarke,and Norway, though the father by Will, had diſpoſed of the firſt otherwiſe; which moued Hardi-Canute much to maligne the roialty of Harold,whoſe Crowne by birth and couenant belonged to him; and therefore with great preparation, intending to recouer his right, hee entred the Sea, and came into Flanders,where hauing notice of the vſurpers death, his rage was ſtaied, and hee peaceably came in, and receiued the Crowne.

Idem cap. 109.

(9) And that Sweine (called the Younger) King of Denmarke, to aſſiſt his Vncle Hardi-Canute againſt Harold the vſurper of Englands Crowne, with a great Armie prepared thitherward; and taking the Seas, were by tempeſts driuen vpon the coaſts of Hadeloe, where his Armie doing ſome hurt,was ſet vpon and diſcomfited by the ſouldiers of the Arch-biſhoppe: himſelfe amongſt them being taken priſoner, and brought into the preſence of the Arch-biſhop, was by him moſt honourably receiued,and conueied vnto Breme, who there entered a league with him, and with gifts and other complements, after a few dayes, ſuffered him to depart; who likewiſe hearing of the death of King Harold, returned backe to his owne Country,where ſhortly after he was much moleſted by Magnus, the ſonne of Olaf, then raigning King ouer the Norwegians.

(10) Hardi-Canute in England, hearing of thoſe ſtirres; thought it his part to aid his Nephew King Sweyn, againſt the inuaſions of Magnus: and therefore hee ſent one Sueno his kinſeman,with an Armie of the Engliſh, to re-eſtabliſh King Sweyn in his Throne. Theſe entred Norway, and the Field againſt the Norwegians,but by them were ſo ouer-laid, that hee left Magnus the vanquiſher, and returned againe for England; but before hee could arriue the Shore, King Hardi-Canute was dead, with whom dyed the iſſue of that warre; whoſe death was ſuddaine, and after this manner.

Yea, ſo farre were all ſorts from bewailing him, that in regard of the freedome from the Daniſh yoke, which they attained by his deceaſe, euer ſince among the common people; the day of his death is annually celebrated with open paſtimes in the ſtreetes (as the old Romanes kept their fugalia, for chaſing out of their Kings,) which time is now called Hocktide or Hucxtide, ſignifying a time of ſcorning or contempt,which fell vpon the Danes by his death.

CHAPTER VI.

An. D. 1042. Henry Hunting.

EDward, the Third of that Name before the Conqueſt, halfe-brother to the deceaſed Hardi-Canute, and Sonne to King Ethelred by Queene Emma his wife, was by the prouident care of a Mothers affection, (when the variable ſucceſſe of Warre, doubtfully depended betwixt Edmund the Engliſh, and Canutus the Dane) ſent into Normandy to Duke Richard her Brother, there to be ſecured from all domeſticall ſtirres: and now, before the dead corps could be interred, with a generall conſent of the Nobles was elected their King.

(2) I know well that in the legend of this holy mans life, more things are recorded, then with ſafetie of truth may be either beleeued, or deliuered; as that he was choſen King by conſent of Parliament, when as yet he was in his mothers wombe, Ethelred his Father at the ſame time hauing many other ſonnes aliue; as alſo when the deſtroying Danes had extinguiſhed by their warres almoſt the whole Royall iſſue of the Engliſh, the holy Monke Brightwold, of Glaſtenbury deploring their loſſe, and the lands miſerable eſtate, had in viſion this Edward, then an Exile, preſented vnto him by the Apoſtle S. Peter himſelfe, who then annointing him King in his ſight, telling him that his Raigne ſhould be peaceable, and twenty three yeeres for continuance; Brightwold yet vnſatisfied who ſhould next ſucceed, demanded the reſolution, and was anſwered by Peter, that the Kingdome of England was Gods owne Kingdome; for whoſe ſucceſſors himſelfe would prouide. With ſuch vaine predictions our otherwiſe true Stories are ouer-charged; which moued Comineus the worthy French Hiſtorian, to taxe the Engliſh with ouer-much credulitie that way.

(3) But

(3) But moſt true it is, that the Engliſh Nobility diſclaiming all Daniſh ſubiection, preſently vpon the death of King Harold, enacted, That none of their bloud ſhould any more raigne ouer them: putting this their decree in execution by caſſiering all Danes from the Caſtles, Forts, and Garriſon Townes throughout all the Land, whence ſome euen of their Bloud Royall were forced to depart. Then ſending ſecuritie into Normandy, with proffer of the Crowne vnto Prince Edward, had his conſent, and aſſiſtance of Duke William his coſen germane.

(4) This Edward (as elſewhere hath been ſaid) was borne at Iſlip neere vnto Oxford, and tenderly educated by Queene Emma his Mother; and after his Fathers death, for ſafety ſent into France; where; by his ſweet conuerſation hee gained the loue of all, and as much himſelfe affected thoſe ſtrangers, which was ſome blemiſh of policy in the face of his gouernment, when he had got the Diademe, as being of diſpoſition ouer-ſoft, and euer too pliant (an imperfection in a Soueraigne) to take the impreſſe of any ſtampe. In which mould, the aſpiring Goodwin Earle of Kent, did caſt the fabricke of his owne deſignes; who had made away Alfred, his younger, but of a more reſolute ſpirit, that ſo the baſis of his owne piller (whoſe top in time he hoped to crowne) might be ſet, if not vpon, yet with the neereſt to the Throne.

Rand. Higden. Marian Scotus.

(5) Hee therefore, the formoſt both in will and power, vſed both to eſtabliſh Prince Edward in his right, being ſeconded by Leofrick Earle of Cheſter, and Liuingus Biſhop of Worceſter, and indeed with the generall aſſiſtance of all the Engliſh; who now were ſo iealous of all forraine powers, that they forbad an ouer-great traine of Normans, (though comming for his aid) to attend their new-choſen King.

Alfred Beuerel. John Rouſe.

(6) His Coronation was at Wincheſter, with great concourſe of people, and the celebration performed by Edſine, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, vpon the very day of Chriſt his reſurrection, (being alſo a new-riſing day to the Engliſh Nation) the yeere of grace 1042. himſelfe being aged then towards forty, and was in number the thirty ſeuenth Monarch of England, where he raigned with ſuch Iuſtice and Piety, that hee obtained the venerable name of Saint, and vnto poſterities is diſtinguiſhed from the other Edwards, by the adiunct Confeſſor.

Rand Higden, in Polycr. lib. 6. cap. 24.

(7) In the entrance of his gouernment to witnes his loue to his people, he ſought euery way the furtherance of their wealth, and afterwards remitted the moſt heauy Tribute of forty thouſand pounds yearly, gathered by the name of Dane-gilt, which had bin impoſed by his Father, and payed for forty yeeres continuance, out of the lands of all, except onely the Clergie, becauſe, (ſay our ancient lawes,) the Kings repoſed more confidence in the prayers of holy Church, then in the power of Armies. Then, from the diuers Lawes of the Mercians, Weſt-Saxons, Danes, and Northumbrians, he ſelected the beſt, and made of them one body certaine, and written in Latine, (that all men of any learning might know whereon to relye) to be the touch of his Common-wealths Pleas, and the ſquire by which he would haue euery right to be meaſured; being (in a ſort) the fountaine of thoſe, which at this day wee terme the Common Lawes, though the formes of pleading and proceſſe therein, were afterward brought in by the Conqueſt.

Camb. Britan. de Danis.

(8) The raigne of this King, by moſt writers records, was more ſpent in peace & works of true piety, then in wars and bloud, though ſome diſſentions happened both domeſticall and forreine: for about the yeere one thouſand forty fiue, and third of his Raign, a royall Nauy was rigged in Sandwich hauen, againſt Magnus King of Norway, who then intended to inuade England, and indeede had ſo done, if the wars of Sweyn king of Denmark had not diuerted his purpoſe.

Albert. Kranius. Aimundus Bremenſis.

(9) This Sweyn was the ſonne of Duke Wolfe, by Oſtryd his Ducheſſe, ſiſter to Hardi-Canut, who as I find written in the manuſcript of Aimundus Bremenſis, being in poſſeſſion of two kingdomes, prepared his Nauy for the conqueſt of England alſo: But, (ſaith he) King Edward gouerning that Kingdome with great Iuſtice and Loue, choſe rather his peace with proffers of Tribute, and promiſes that after his death the Crowne ſhould be his, yea though himſelfe ſhould haue children: howbeit this ſeemeth not to ſound for truth; for Sweyn ſending his Ambaſſadors vnto Edward to craue ayde againſt Magnus (his grieuous and mortall Enemy,) could obtaine none; and Harold Harfager, the ſucceſſor of Magnus, and enemy to Sweyn, preſently thereupon ſent vnto Edward for a league of amity, which was ratified firmely betwixt them.

(10) Neither may we thinke that euer he meant his Crowne that way; for that beſides the decree enacted againſt all Daniſh claims, his deſire to eſtabliſh it in the Engliſh bloud is moſt manifeſt, by ſending for Edward his Nephew, the ſonne of Edmund Ironſide, remaining in Hungary, and that ſo long out of England, that hee was called the Outlaw; who comming ouer, brought with him his wife Agatha, and children, Edgar a ſonne, and Margaret and Chriſtian his daughters; him Edward meant to haue made heire to the Crowne, had he not beene preuented by haſty death, whereupon the King deſigned young Edgar, his ſonne, the heire apparent, and gaue him the ſurname of Adeling, a name of great honour appropriated to the Princes of the bloud, and men capable of the Crowne.

(11) Beſides theſe former attempts, certaine Daniſh Pirates entred the Port of Sandwich, which with all the Sea-Coaſts of Eſſex they ſpoiled, and in Flanders made Merchandize of their prey. The Iriſh likewiſe with thirty ſixe ſhippes entred Seuern, and with the aſſiſtance of Griffith King of South-Wales burnt or ſlew all that they found; againſt whom Alfred Biſhop of Worceſter went and fought, but with ſuch ſucceſſe, that many of his Souldiers were ſlaine, and the reſt put to flight; which made the Welſhmen far more bold, and Reſe the brother of Griffith, make many incurſions to fetch preyes out of England, till at length hee was ſlaine at Buleuden, and his head preſented to King Edward at Glouceſter.

(12) His domeſticall moleſtations, were chiefly by Earle Goodwin and his ſonnes; and thoſe firſt ſpringing vpon this following occaſion. Euſtace the elder, Earle of Bulloigne, who had married Goda, ſiſter by the fathers ſide to King Edward, came into England to viſite him then lying at Glouceſter, and returning homeward, at Canterbury his Herbinger dealing roughly with a Burgeſſe for lodgings, cauſed his owne death; which when his Lord heard of, thirſting for reuenge, he ſlew eighteene Citizens in the heat of his furie: The Canterburians in as great a rage got them to armour, and ſlew twenty of his retinew, wounding many more, and made the Earle to recoile; whoſe grieuous complaint comming to the King, he commanded Goodwin to ſee execution done vpon the offenders. Earle Goodwin not haſtie to follow his commiſſion, aduiſed the King to examine the cauſe before he maſſacred his true ſubiects at the inſtigation of Strangers; whereat King Edward was highly offended, and Goodwin thereby gained great loue of the Commons. This occaſioned Robert Gemeticenſis a Norman, firſt made Biſhop of London, and after Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to ſpread the Curtaine of diſfauour betwixt Goodwin and the King, vrging his refuſall as an Act of Contempt, wherein more dangers might lie hid then were to be ſuffered; whereupon Edward called an aſſembly of Eſtates, appointing a day of meeting at Glouceſter.

(13) The Commons (whoſe common guiſe is, deadly to hate all ſtrangers, though many times well deſeruing) now ſeeing Earle Goodwin in danger for their good, were eaſily drawne to aſſiſt him and his cauſe, and in war-like manner guarded his perſon, at Beuerſtane not farre from the King. The Eſtates aſſembled, and Goodwin ſent for, he refuſed to come, pretending ſeruice againſt the Welſh, then ready to make inroades, and that his preſence was more needfull full there, then at Court; albeit the Welsh-men cleared themselues by sending their Ambassadors vnto the King. The suspitions increasing, great preparation on both sides was made; to assist the King came Leofricke the worthy Earle of Chester, Siward the stout Earle of Northumberland, and Rodulfe Earle of Hereford his sister Godas sonne, by her first husband Walter de Maigne.

Rand. Higden. Malt. West. Simon Dunel.

(14) To Goodwin repaired his people of Southerie and Kent, and to him were brought by Swaine his sonne, the men of Oxford, Sommerset, Hereford, Gloucester, and Berkshires; vnto whom, Harold his other sonne, ioyned those of Essex, Norfolke, Suffolke, Cambridge, and Huntingdonshires, so that his host was exceedingly great, and his minde therby so inflated, that from Langton, where hee lay, hee sent a bold and Traiterous demand to the King, to haue Earle Eustace of Bulloigne with all his French and Normans (that kept then in the Castle of Douer) to be deliuered vnto him, and his sonnes: which beeing (as good reason was) refused, the Battaile was prepared, and brought to the very point of hazard and ruine of all: For in that quarrell were assembled the greatest Peeres, and Lords of the Land, the Kings loue swaying very much with many, but yet the hatred towards Strangers possessing the hearts of more. The beginning thus doubtfull, and the end like to proue dangerous; the matter both with great foresight and prouidence was referred vnto Parliament, to be holden at London with all conuenient hast, whereunto pledges were both giuen and receiued on either parts.

(15) King Edward strongly guarded with an Army of the Mercians and Northumbrians, entred London, and Goodwin with his sonnes in war-like manner came into Southwarke to his owne house. But his Army wauering, and (as bad causes & consciences make men doe) suspecting the worst, by little and little shrunke away from him; which knowne to the King, he presently pronounced sentence of banishment vnto Goodwin and his fiue sonnes, without further proceeding by way of Parliament, as was determined. Goodwin therefore with great riches and his three sonnes, Swaine, Toslie, and Girth, sailed into Flanders, and Harold with his brother Leofwine, from Bristow passed into Ireland; who were no sooner gone, but the King proclaimed them Out-lawes, and gaue the Earldome of Harold vnto Algar, the son of Leofricke, Earle of Chester. This Leofricke is he, which at his Countesses request freed the Citie Couentrie of their importable tribute imposed, as we haue elsewhere said.

Booke 1. chap. 27.

(16) In the second yeere of Goodwins banishment, both himselfe and those his sonnes with him, hauing gotten ships conuenient for warre, in manner of Pirats came vpon the coasts of Kent and Sussex, doing much harme, and returning with spoiles: the like did Harold and Leofwin from Scotland, vpon the westerne coasts of Sommerset and Deuonshires, who thence coasting about the point of Cornwall, ioyned their Fleet with their Fathers, in the Ile of Wight.

Henry Hunt.

Simon Dun.

(17) Against them King Edward prepared, & himselfe, though aged, with a Nauie of sixtie ships well furnished for warre, meant to haue made an end of that businesse, by the destruction of his aduersaries: but the Nauies ready to ioyne battell, God tooke the cause into his owne hand, and with a thicke fogge so ouer-spread the seas; that one Fleet could not thereby see another; in which, Goodwin and his complices by contrary windes were driuen to the place from whence they came. King Edward still in iealousie of Goodwins returne, rigged forth forty tall shippes, to secure the seas, which kept not so strong a watch, but that Goodwin got by them, solliciting the people of Kent, Sussex, and Surrey vnto his aid, and entring Thamesis, did the like vnto them in London, who accepted of his arriuage, though king Edward lay there: so that without disturbance his Nauie fell vp with the tide, through the south Arch of the Bridge, & a mighty army to his aid mustred vpon the same side of the riuer.

(18) The Nobilitie then seeing side against side, and all of them meere English, ready to hazard their bloud in the quarrels of strangers, wrought so with Edward and Goodwin, that they came vnto peace, and pledges were againe deliuered for the performance, whereof Wilmot the sonne of Earle Goodwin, and Hacun the sonne of Swaine his eldest, were sent to Duke William of Mormandy, so great a trust he euer reposed in strangers. This Swaine, vpon a remorse of conscience for the bloud he had spilt, and especially for the slaughter of Beorne his cosen & intercessor, who sued to the King for his peace, vndertooke a pilgrimage to Ierusalem, and in his returne died in Licia, whether through an extremity of cold, or by the hands of Saracens, that spoiled all they met, it is vncertaine.

Wil. Malmesbury. Ran. Higden. Matt. Westminster. Simon Dyn.

(19) Goodwin now restored, and in great credit with the King, cast the eye of disdaine vpon the Arch-Bishop Robert (as commonly Fauorites emulate each others,) and himselfe being a man eloquent and politicke, so possessed the King both against him and his Normans, that he requited his owne banishment, with al theirs out of England, some few excepted, that were fauoured by the English: and now promising himselfe much honour and authority; was sodainely cut off by the stroake of death, surprizing him as he sate at Table with the King vpon Monday in the Easter weeke, but died not till the Thursday following, which happened at Winchester, where hee was buried.

(20) Besides these former forraine and ciuill molestations, other calamities happened to the land; for in the yeare of Grace 1047. and moneth of Ianuary, there fell so great a Snow, which couered the ground vnto the middle of March, that Cattell & Fowles perished abundantly: and on the first day of that Month the yere following, a strange and terrible Earth-quake happened; which seemed to rent the ground asunder, and withall such Lightnings, as burnt vp the Corne growing in the fields, wherby an excessiue Dearth followed: so that his raigne was neither so peaceable nor prosperous, as Brightwold the Monke dreamed it should be. But as all these were scourges sent from God vpon the Land for sin, so both Prince, Pastors, and people, had all seuerally their part thereof, as being ioyntly the causers of the same.

Rand. Higden.

(21) For the King, in case of these Strangers, put the Land more then once in danger to be lost: and himselfe refraining the bed of his vertuous wife, committed thereby the offence forbidden by the Apostle, and caused her his Queene, either to commit or be accused to haue committed adultery. The Clergie likewise altogether vnlearned, wanton and vicious: for the Prelates neglecting the offices of Episcopall function, which was to tender the affaires of the Church, and to feede the flocke of Christ, liued themselues idle, and couetous, addicted wholly to the pompe of the world, and voluptuous life, little caring for the Churches & soules committed to their charge: and if any told them (saith Higden) that their liues ought to be holy, & their conuersation without Couetousnesse, according to the sacred prescript, and vertuous examples of their Elders, they would scoffingly put them off with, Nunc aliud tempus, alij pro tempore mores; Times haue mutations, So must mens fashions: and thus, (saith he,) they plained the roughnes of their doings with smoothnes of their answers. Briefly, the whole people were so loose and riotous, that as Gernasius Dorobornensis recordeth, they fell so fast to commit wickednesse, as to be ignorant of sinfull crimes, was then held to be a great crime it selfe. And by the testimony of Malmesbury, the sinnes of those times euidently foreshewed a generall destruction: for the Englishmen (saith he) transformed themselues into the strange manners of the French, and that not onely in speech and behauiour, but in their deedes, and Charters: their vse was then to goe fantastically appointed, their garments reaching but to the mid knee, their heads shorne, and their beards shauen all but the vpper lip, which grew with long mustaches; continually wearing massie bracelets of gold about about their armes, carrying markes vpon their skin pounced in of ſundry Colours; and the Clergie contenting themſelues with triuiall literature, could ſcarcely hacke and hew out the words of the Sacrament. Theſe then were Englands dolorous times both of blindneſſe and lewdnes, drawing downe Gods wrath for their deſtruction.

(22) But howſoeuer this King is reported to be louing and facile towards ſtrangers, (which in it ſelfe is a princely vertue if it be opportunely and warily vſed:) yet to his owne Mother, and Wife, vnnaturally ouer-rigorous, impriſoning and bereauing them both of all Prince-like honour. Againſt Queene Emma, his Mother, were inſtigators Robert Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and Earle Goodwin of Kent, the two greateſt fauorites of the King. The cauſes obiected were, her marriage with Canute the Capitall enemy of England; her regardleſneſſe of ſuccouring himſelfe and his brother in their exiles, whom (as was alleadged) ſhe contriued to haue made away; and that vnder colour of priuate deuotions, ſhe had vſed the company of Alwine Biſhop of Wincheſter ouer-familiarly, to her great diſhonour and the Kings diſgrace: for theſe and the like, hee tooke away all her Iewels, and other ſubſtance, and committed her to ſafe cuſtody in the Abbey of Werwell.

(24) Neither were this Kings proceedings better with his owne Wife, howſoeuer ſome haue cloaked that Fraud (ſo the Apoſtle tearmes it) vnder the faire robe of Chaſtity. For hee marrying Editha, a Lady incomparable both for beauty and vertue, in whoſe breſt (ſaith Malmesbury) there was a Schoole of all Liberall Sciences, refuſed her bed: but whether it were for his debility, or hatred to Goodwin her father, or loue of Virginity, I determine not; but am fully perſwaded, that the accuſation of Adultery wherewith Robert the Arch-biſhop did charge her, was more vpon enuy to her father, then truth of ſo foule a fact in her, whoſe vertues were ſo many, and ſo memorable, by report of Authors, that were eie-witneſſes themſelues; for Ingulphus that had often-times conference with her, doth thus of her relate.

There was giuen (ſaith he) vnto King Edward for his Queene and Wife, the daughter of Goodwin, a moſt beautifull Damoſell, EGITHA by name, excellent well learned; in her demeanure, and whole courſe of life a Virgine moſt chaſt, humble, and vnfeinedly holy, no way fauouring of her Fathers or Brethrens barbarouſneſſe, but mild, modeſt, faithfull, and innocent, nor euer hurtfull to any; inſomuch, that this verſe was applied to her:

Sicut Spina Roſam, genuit Godwinus Egitham.
From prickled ſtalke as ſweeteſt Roſe:
So Egith faire, from Godwin growes.

All theſe notwithſtanding, the King expulſed her his Court and Bed, and that with no little diſgrace; for taking all her goods from her, euen to the vttermoſt farthing, committed her priſoner to the Monaſterie of Wilton, attended onely with one maid, where ſhe, for a whole yeeres ſpace almoſt, in teares and praiers expected the day of her releaſe and comfort: All which vnprincely, and vn-Spouſlike vſage, as the King pretended, and ſaid, was, becauſe ſhe onely ſhould not liue in comfort, when as her Parents & Brethren were baniſhed the Realme: an vniuſt ſentence ſurely, and vnbefitting a Saint, thus to puniſh the ſinnes of the fathers vpon their children, contrary to the preſcript rule of God, who by his Prophet complaineth againſt ſuch iniuſtice, and regulateth it with this iuſt verdict, That ſoule that ſinneth ſhall die: and for her pure and vnuiolated chaſtity, himſelfe on his death-bed ſpake, ſaying, that openly ſhe was his wife, but in ſecret embracings as his owne ſiſter.

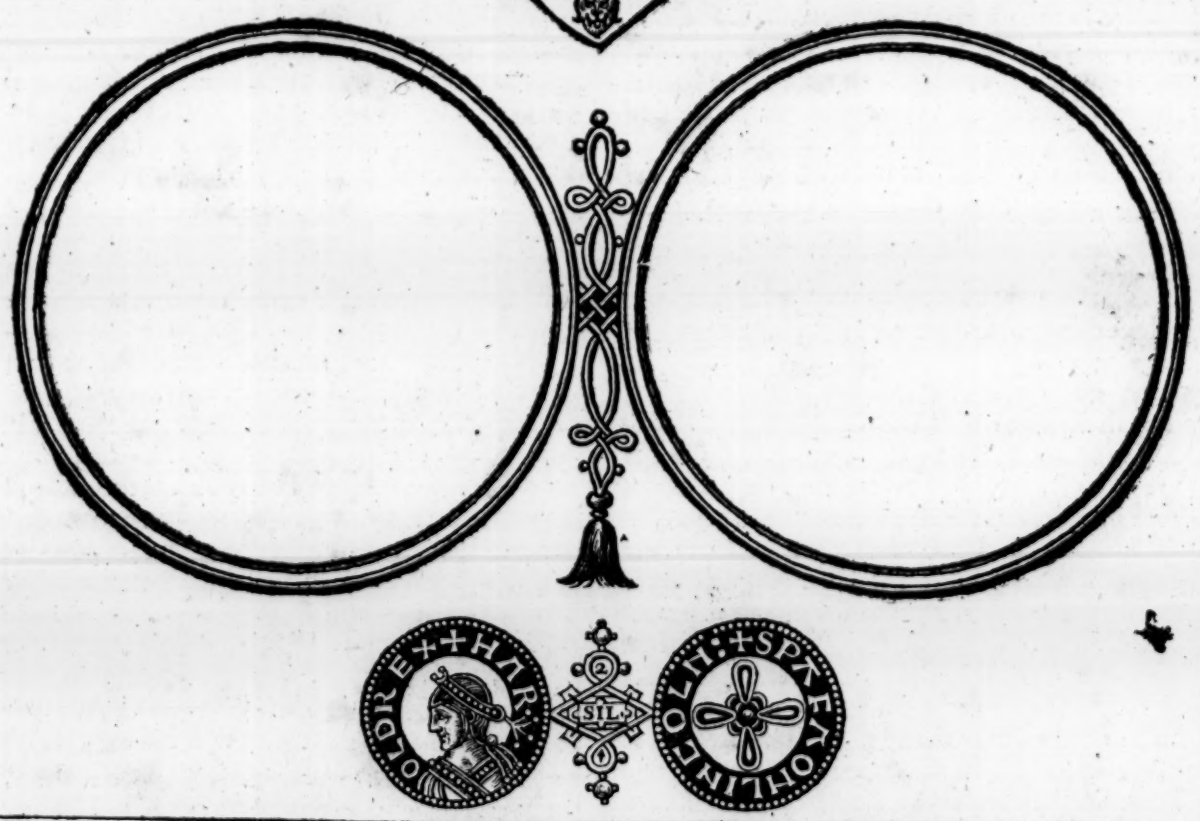
HAROLD THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, THE SONNE OF EARLE GOODWINE, AND THIRTIE EIGHT MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN, HIS LIFE, RAIGNE, ACTS, WIVES, AND ISSVE.



CHAPTER VII.

THe people sorrowing for the death of their King, and the States-men perplexed for choise of a new; Edgar Athelings title was worthy of more vnpartiall respect then it found: for him they held too young for gouernement: besides, a stranger borne, scarce speaking English: and withall, the prophecies of Edward touching the alienation of the Crowne; the Interest of the Danes; and the claim that Duke William made, (both by gift and consanguinity,) bred great distraction of desires, and opinions; but nothing concluded for setling the State; no man either assuming or proffering the Diadem, because none had the power, or right, to adorne therewith his owne head. In this Calme conference a sodaine gale arose, which blew all the sailes spread for that winde into one Port. And that was Harold sonne to Earle Goodwin, a man (duly prizing his

Whose kingly state before wee touch, it shall not be amisse to lengthen his short raigne with his Acts and Life, as he was a Subiect, both with, and against his Lord and Predecessor.

Vita S. Edward.

(2) That hee tooke part with his Father against Eustace of Bullogne, and King Edwards hasty commission, wee haue shewed; himselfe then enioying the Earldom of Oxford, and so affected by those of Essex, Suffolke, and Norfolke, Cambridge & Huntington-shires, that they sided in his cause against the King; But these designes failing, (as commonly it is seene all attempts of Subiects against their Soueraignes doe) hee learned by banishment, what was the losse of true honour, and by forbearance of battaile (when halfe the Kingdome stood for him) his dutie obliged vnto the Common-wealth. And growne againe into fauour with the King, carried himselfe answerably vnto both.

An.D.1055. (3) Some iealousie conceiued; Edward without any cause, banished Algar the son of Leofrike Earle of Chester, who with the help of the Irish and Welshmen, vnder the conduct of Gruffith ap Llewelyn Prince of North-Wales (who had married his daughter,) did much hurt to the English, putting Rodulph Earle of Hereford to flight, with the slaughter of fiue hundred men, spoiled the City, burnt the Minster and became Masters of mis-rule in those parts. Against these was Harold sent, and with such manhood pursued his flying enemies, that passing through North-Wales, vpon the Snow-downes hee pitched his Field: The Earle, and Prince Gruffith, not daring to abide his presence, fled thence vnto South-Wales, and againe tooke into Hereford; whereof Harold hauing intelligence hasted thither-ward (leauing sufficient in the Snow-downes to mate the Welsh,) and recouering the City, with a deepe trench and high rampire fortified it about, where for the sauing of more bloud (and not vngratefull to Algar, who without grudge had resigned to him his Earldome, and whole Reuenewes at his returne from exile) a peace was concluded, and at Harolds request, Earle Algar and Prince Gruffith, were pardoned.

Matt. West. Simon Dunel.

An.D.1058 (4) But Algar being againe accused, & again aided by his old associate Gruffith, recouered his Earledome by force, whereat King Edward was highly displeased, but most against Gruffith, who euer was ready to assist any against him: wherevpon Harold, the second time appointed Generall, with a great host entered North-Wales, without sight of enemy, where he onely burnt down the stately Palace of Prince Gruffith, and so returned to the King. (6) All now in quiet, and Harold withdrawne to his Mannor of Bosham, vpon the riuage of the sea in the confines of Sussex, there for his recreation, one day hee tooke into a Fishers boate with small attendants, neither those very skilfull Mariners; when no sooner were they lanched into the deepe, but a contrary winde came about, and droue the boat vpon the coast of Ponthieu in France, where hee was taken by the Country people, and presented to Guido their Earle, who a while retained him his prisoner, in hope of gaine by his ransom, but Duke William requiring it, hee was conueied into Normandy; where he cunningly perswaded the Duke, that his secret comming out of England, was purposely to enter a league of amity with him. The Duke then hauing present wars with the Britaines in France, tooke this his new friend and guest with him for his companion at Armes; whose ready policies followed with forward practise, wan him great estimation with the Duke; whereupon betwixt them a couenant was made for the reseruation of the English Crowne to the Norman, if it chanced King Edward to die without children; and the same ratified by Harolds corporall oath, with the affiancing of Lady Adeliza, the Dukes fift daughter, then a childe, and Harold a widdower; which afterwards fell to his owne destruction, and the lands subuersion, as shall be said.

(7) His last imploiment by holy King Edward, was against the tumultuous Northumbrians, which had expulsed Tosto their Earle, and Harolds owne brother, where a peace was concluded without shedding bloud, but with condition that Tosto should lose his Earledome: whereupon in great displeasure, he with his wife and children fled into Flanders, and euer after hated the person, and emulated the glory of Harold. The originall of these two brethrens quarrels beganne at Windsor, where in the presence of the King they fell from words vnto blowes, and that in such manner, as if rescue had not come, Tosto had died; for which disgrace, hee secretly hied him into the Marches of Wales, and neere the City Hereford at Portaslyth, where Harold had a house then in preparing to entertaine the King, he slew all his brothers seruants, and them cutting peece-meale into gobbets, salted some of their limmes, and cast the rest into vessels of the meath and wines, sending his brother word, that hee had furnished him with poudred meats against the Kings comming thither; which barbarous act caused deseruedly his name to be odious vnto his Northumbrians, and was lastly repayed with his owne death.

(8) Now albeit some Heralds make Harold by birth but a Gentleman of one, and the first descent, which, were it so, should no whit blemish him who was more truely enobled with princely vertues; yet therein also it may seeme he is mis-esteemed, seeing his Father was Goodwin a Duke by degree, the son of Wolnoth, and he the sonne of Egelmar, who was the sonne of Egelricke, surnamed Leofwine, and brother of Edricke Duke of Mercia, that married the daughter of King Ethelred of England, of whom wee haue spoken.

The mother of Harold was Githa the daughter of Duke Wolfe, and sister to Sweyne the yonger, King of Denmarke, by Estrich his wife, who was sister to Canute the great King of England; and himselfe the second sonne of her borne; whose elder brother was Sweyne, that dyed on pilgrimage in his returne from Ierusalem, and his yonger were Tosto, Wilnod, Girth, and Leofricke.

(9) A former wife Earle Goodwin had, whose name was Thira, the sister of Canute, a woman solde vnto wickednesse, for making merchandize of Englands beauteous virgins into Denmarke; shee solde them there at deere rates, to satisfie her owne vnsatiate auarice, and the lusts of the lasciuious Danes, till a iust reward of Gods wrath fell on her by a thunderbolt falling from heauen, wherewith she was slaine, to the great terrour of the beholders. One sonne by her Earle Goodwin had, who when hee was past childes age, riding vpon a horse (the gift of his Grandfather the King,) proudly giuing him the

(10) Edwards life ended, and nothing determined touching his ſucceſſor, Harold the ſecond day after, being the day of his buriall, made himſelfe King, none of the Nobility diſliking what hee had done; for courteous hee was of ſpeech and behauiour, and in martiall proweſſe the onely man, as Wales well witneſſed more then once; friended by affinity with many of the Nobles, and by his new marriage with Edgitha the daughter of Algar (ſiſter of the Earles Morcar and Edwin, and late wife to Gruffith ap Lhewelyn Prince of Wales) he expected to be both ſided and aſſiſted, if his cauſe came either to triall or voice.

Ran. Higden. Polych. lib. 6. ca. 29.

(11) And the time hee well ſaw, fitted his entrance; for Sweyne King of Denmarke (moſt dread by the Engliſh,) was intangled with the Sweden wars; and William the Norman (that made claime from King Edward) at variance with Philip the French king; the friends of Edgar in Hungarie, and himſelfe a ſtranger, ouer-young for rule: all which concurrents made Harold without deliberation, or order from the State, to ſet the Crowne on his owne head, regardleſſe of all ceremony and ſolemne celebration; for which his act, as a violator of holy rites, he too too much offended the Clergy.

Mat. Weſtminſter.

(12) The day of his Coronation was vpon Friday, the fifth of January, being the feaſt of the Epiphany, and yeere of Saluation 1066. none either greatly applauding, or diſapprouing his preſumption, except onely for the omiſſion of manner and forme; to redeeme which, and to re-gaine the good will of all; no ſooner attained hee the ſeate roiall, but he remitted or diminiſhed the grieuous cuſtomes and tributes which his predeceſſors had raiſed, a courſe euer powerfull to winne the hearts of the Commons; to Church-men hee was very munificent and carefull of their aduancements; and to grow more deepely into their venerable eſteeme, he repaired their Monaſteries; but moſt eſpecially that at Waltham in Eſſex, which hee moſt ſumptuouſly new built, and richly endowed, giuing it the name of Holy Croſſe; vpon occaſion that ſuch a Croſſe found far weſtward, was brought thither by miracle, vt tradunt: and therefore hee choſe out this place to poure forth his ſupplications, before hee marched to meete Duke William in the field. Moreouer, to ſatisfie ſuch Nobles as affected young Edgars iuſter title, he created him Earle of Oxford, and held him in ſpeciall fauour: in briefe, vnto the poore, his hand was euer open, vnto the oppreſſed hee miniſtred iuſtice, and vnto all men was affable, and meeke: and all to hold that vpright which on his head hee had ſet with an vn-euen hand: and depriued him of, vnto whom he was Protector.

(13) Three ſeuerall reports are affirmed of Edwards diſpoſe of the Crowne: the firſt was to the Norman Duke, who made that the anker-hold of his claime; the ſecond was to young Edgar, vnto whom hee was great vncle; and the laſt vnto this Harold himſelfe: for ſo ſaith Edmerus, and alſo Marianus, who liued at the very ſame time, and writeth that Harold thereupon was ſacred and crowned by Aldredus Archbiſhop of Yorke; ſo that hereby hee is freed by ſome from the imputation of intruſion and wrong.

(14) His State thus ſtanding, and his ſubiects contentment daily increaſing, preſently it was ſomewhat perplexed by an Ambaſſage ſent from the Norman, putting him in minde of his couenant, and oath, as well for the cuſtody of the Crowne to his behoofe, as for the ſolemnization of the marriage contracted betwixt his daughter and him.

(15) Harold, who thought himſelfe now ſurely ſeated in the hearts of his Subiects, and therefore alſo ſure in his Kingdome, anſwered the Ambaſſadors, That hee held their Maſters demaund vniuſt, for that an oath extorted in time of extremity, cannot binde the maker in conſcience to performe it, for that were to ioyne one ſinne with another; and that this oath was taken for feare of death or impriſonment, the Duke himſelfe well knew: but admit it was voluntarily, and without feare; could I (ſaid he) then a ſubiect, without the allowance of the King, and the whole State, giue away the Crownes ſucceſſion, to the preiudice of both? ſurely a Kingdome is of a better account then to be ſo determined in priuate onely betwixt two. With which kinde of anſweres he ſent the meſſengers away.

Subiects loue the Soueraignes ſtrength.

(16) The Norman, who till then thought England ſure to be his, and had deuoted his hopes from a Duke to a King, ſtormed to ſee himſelfe thus fruſtrated on the ſodaine, and in ſtead of a Crowne to haue ſcornes heaped on his head; therefore nothing contented with this ſleight anſwere, returned his Ambaſſadors againe vnto Harold, by whom hee laid his claime more at large; as that King Edward in the Court of France had faithfully promiſed the ſucceſſion vnto him, and againe afterwards ratified the ſame to him at his being in England, and that not done without conſent of the State, but confirmed by Stigandus Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury, the Earles Goodwin and Syward, yea, and by Harold himſelfe, and ſo firmely aſſured that his Brother and Nephew were deliuered for pledges, and to that end ſent vnto him into Normandy: that hee had no way beene conſtrayned, hee appealed to Harolds owne conſcience, who beſides his voluntary offer to ſweare, contracted himſelfe to Adeliza his daughter (then but young, and now departed life) vpon which foundation the oath was willingly taken.

Guneticenſis.

(17) But Harold who thought his owne head as fit for a crowne as any others, meant nothing leſſe then to lay it downe vpon parley; and therefore told them flatly, that howſoeuer Edward and he had tampered for the Kingdome, yet Edward himſelfe comming in by election, and not by any title of inheritance, his promiſe was of no validity; for how could hee giue that whereof he was not intereſſed, nor in the Danes time was euer like to be? And tell your Duke (ſaid he) that our kingdome is now brought to a ſetled eſtate, and with ſuch loue and liking of the Engliſh, as that they will neuer admit any more a ſtranger to rule ouer them. And as touching the contract with his yonger daughter, he wel ſeeth, that God hath taken away that occaſion of alienating the Crowne; and ſurely his Law hath likewiſe prouided remedy againſt ſuch raſh vows; whoſe precepts I mean to follow: and therefore (ſaid he) will your Duke to weigh my eſtate with his owne, both his and mine now in quiet, is ſufficient for two, and either of them employment enough for one mans Gouernment, and therefore both of them too much to be well gouerned by one, ſeeing that God himſelfe had ſet a ſea betwixt them. With theſe and the like ſpeeches hee ſhifted off the Dukes Ambaſſadors; without all princely entertainements, or courteous regard.

(18) The meſſengers returned, and Harolds anſweres declared, William lion-like enraged, caſteth his thoughts about plotting reuenge, and making ſome oddes euen that might impeach his deſignes, prepared all things for open warre. Harold likewiſe not ſleeping his buſineſſe, made ready his Fleete, muſtered his ſouldiers, and planted his Garriſons along the Sea-coaſt. But in theſe his proceedings, behold a great and fearefull Comete appeared (ſeldome a ſigne to Princes of fortunate ſucceſſe) vpon the twenty fourth of Aprill, and laſted onely ſeuen dayes, which drew the mindes of the Engliſh, into great ſuſpenſe, now ready to enter into a double warre.

Toſto the cruell Earle of Northumberland, and brother to Harold, expulſed by his people, and preſcribed by King Edward, fled into France, where by the inſtigations of William, whoſe wiues ſiſter hee had married (both of them the daughters of Balwine Earle of Flanders,) hee got for his reuenge a Fleet furniſhed with men at Armes; and thus prepared, his firſt fury was ſhewed in ſpoiling the Ile of Wight; then coaſting the ſhore, ſhrewdly endammaged Kent, whence hoiſing ſaile, fell foule vpon Lincolneſhire; where Morcar and Edwine Earles of Cheſter and Yorkeſhire, aided with the Kings Nauie, droue him from thence, though with ſome loſſe of their men.

(20) Toſto for more ſuccour fled into Scotland, where of King Malcolme he had but colde comfort, himſelfe being buſied with ciuill broiles; but howſoeuer his expectation there failed, yet his purpoſes were continued with the aſſiſtance of Harold Harfager (that is, the Faire-lockes) King of Denmarke, who with three hundred ſhippes had entred the riuer Tyne for Englands inuaſion, after his conqueſt of the Iles of Orknes. Toſto therefore ioyning his Fleet to theſe Danes, in warlike brauerie, both of them enter the mouth of Humber, and drawing vp the riuer Ouſe, at Rich-hall landed their men, making ſpoile of the Country whereſoeuer they came. To meet with theſe, the foreſaid Earles Edwin and Morcar, in a tumultuous haſt raiſed their powers, but were ſo ouerlaid by the Norwegians, that many were ſlaine, and more drowned, in paſſing ouer that riuer.

Math. Weſtminſter. & alii Dan.

(21) The enemy grown proud by this late victory, haſted towards Yorke, the chiefe Citie of the North; where planting his ſiege, it was preſently yeelded vp, and hoſtages deliuered vpon both parts for the performance of couenants. The Danes thus proſpering, had moſt ſtrongly encamped themſelues; for backed they were with the German Ocean, flanked on the left hand with the riuer Humber, wherein alſo their Fleet rid at Anker, and had on their right hand and afront the riuer Derwent; ſo that it ſeemed impoſſible to raiſe this ſiege.

(22) But Harold thinking the coaſts cleere from all danger, the Equinoctiall at hand, and Nauigation now paſt, the victuals in his Fleet ſpent, and notice from Earle Balwin of Flanders, that Duke William meant not his voyage that yeare, was about to diſband his Army. When this ſodaine newes from the North pierced his eare, no neede it was then to bid him make haſte thither, the caſe ſtanding ſo neere him as it did. Therefore recalling his Army, poſted to Yorke, and from thence marched againſt the Norwegians, who lay ſecured with ſuch aduantage, as wee haue ſaid. Notwithſtanding Harold couragiouſly ordered his battell, and aſſaied to paſſe the Bridge called Stamford, built ouer Derwent, which one onely Dane made good for a time againſt his whole hoſt, and with his Axe ſlew forty of his men, till laſtly this Dane was ſlaine with a dart.

Wil. Malmsbury Henry Hunting. Mat. Weſtminſter.

(23) The Bridge gotten, and the Engliſh reduced into their rankes, Harold moſt boldly ſet vpon his enemies euen in their Campe; where the battaile with equall valour and fortune, was maintained a time, till laſtly the Norwegians diſarraied and ſcattered, were ſlaine out-right; and among them the two Chiefetaines, Harfager and Toſto, with many others of worth and account, loſt their liues. Olaue the ſonne of this Harfager, and Paul Earle of Orkeney, who kept their Fleet & Seas, whileſt his Father and followers fought vpon land, were brought to King Harold, who to haue their liues ſpared, abiured the Land, thenceforth to attempt no hoſtilitie againſt the Engliſh peace; and with twenty ſmall veſſels to carry away their ſlaine and hurt, were ſuffered to depart, bringing heauy newes into Denmarke of the loſſe of their King, and ouerthrow of his Army.

Mat. Weſtminſter.

(24) By this victory thus happily obtained, fell vnto Harold an exceeding rich booty, both of gold and ſilner, beſides the great Armado of Toſto and Harfager; whereby his minde was ſoone ſet aloft, and hee began to grow both proud, and odious vnto his Army, the rather, for that he diuided not the ſpoiles vnto them that had deſerued it; a wrong that the common Souldier doth continually murmure at, and commonly endure.

(25) Now in this current of King Harolds fortunes, William the Norman had the more leiſure to ſtrengthen his owne, and often conferring with his Captaines about Englands inuaſions, found them euer reſolute and cheerefull that way; the difficulty onely reſted, how to prouide money enough, the very ſinewes whereby the vaſt body of an Army muſt be knit, & ſtrengthened: for a ſubſidy being propounded vnto the aſſembly of the Norman States, it was anſwered, that a former warre againſt the French had empoueriſhed much of their wealth, that if new wars were now raiſed, & therein their ſubſtance ſpent to gaine other parts, it would be therby ſo waſted, as that hardly it would be ſufficient to defend their own; that they thought it more ſafety to hold what he had, then on hazard of their own to inuade the territories of others; and that this warre intended, iuſt though it were, yet ſeemed not neceſſary, but exceeding dangerous; beſides (ſay they) the Normans were not by their allegiance bound to Military ſeruices in forrein parts, and therefore ſuch paiments could not be aſſeſſed vpon them. And although William Fitz-Oſberne, a man in high fauour with the Duke, & as gratious among the people, endeauoured by all meanes to effect it, yea, and (to draw on others by his example) proffered to ſet out forty tall Ships, vpon his owne Charges towards this warre; yet would it not be: Therefore Duke William bethought him on another way.

(26) The wealthieſt men among all his People he ſent for, and ſeuerally one by one conferred with, ſhewing them his right and hopes of England, wherin preferment lay euen to the meaneſt amongſt them, onely money was the want, which they might ſpare; neither ſhould that be giuen, nor lent without a plentifull increaſe: with ſuch faire words he drew them ſo on, that they ſtroue who ſhould giue moſt, & by this policy he gathered ſuch a maſſe of money, as was ſufficient to defray the warre. Then went hee to his neighbour Princes, namely to the Earles of Anion, Poictou, Mayne, and Bolloigne, promiſing them faire poſſeſſions in England; yea and vnto Philip the French King, in caſe he would aide him, he voluntarily offered to become his vaſſall and Leige-man, and to hold England by oath and fealty vnder him. But it being thought nothing good for the State of France, that the Duke of Normandy, who already was not ſo pliable to the French King as was wiſhed, ſhould be bettered in his eſtate by the addition of ſo mighty a Kingdome (the power of Neighbour Potentates being euer ſuſpected of Princes) ſo far was the king from yeelding any help, that he ſecretly maligned, & openly diſſwaded this his attempt of inuading England. This French iealouſie, the Norman ſoone perceiued, which made him to caſt about yet another way.

(27) For making his claime knowne vnto Alexander the ſecond, then Pope of Rome, with the wrongs done vnto Robert Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, by Harold and his Father, (a text that might not be read without a gloſſe,) hee was ſo fauoured of his Holineſſe (whoſe See was euer glad to intereſt it ſelf in diſpoſing of Crownes) that he both allowed well of his enterprize, and ſent him a conſecrated Banner, (Saint Peter himſelfe had none ſuch in his Boate) to be borne in the Ship, wherein himſelfe in that expedition ſhould take ſaile for England: an Agnus Dei, and one of the haires of Saint Peter, that bleſſed Apoſtle, in whoſe vertue was no little truſt: and accurſed all them that ſhould oppoſe themſelues againſt him: for euen then the Popes had began to vſurpe authority ouer Princes, and with their leaden blades to hacke into the ſteely ſwords of Emperours.

(28) Thus furniſhed on all ſides, he aſſembled his forces, and with a mighty Nauy came to the Towne of Saint Valeries; which ſtandeth vpon the mouth of the Riuer Some: where a long time he lay wind-bound to his great diſcontentment, and with many vowes importunating the fauour of that locall Saint, heaped daily a number of gifts and oblations vpon his Altar; till laſtly his deſire was obtayned, and then with three hundred Ships fraught full of his Normans, Flemings, Frenchmen, and Britaines, waighed Anchor, and with a gentle gale of wind arriued at Peuenſey in Suſſex, vpon the twenty eight day of September, where Landing his men, to cut off all occaſion or hope of returne, hee fired his owne fleete, and vpon the Shoare erected a Fortreſſe to be if neede were, a retiring place for his Souldiers.

(29) At his arriuage from Sea, as our Hiſtorians report, his foot chanced to ſlippe, ſo that not able to recouer himſelfe, he fell into the mud, and all to bemired his hands; which accident was preſently conſtrued for a lucky preſage: for now (ſaid a Captaine) O Duke, thou haſt taken poſſeſsion, and holdeſt that land in thy hand, whereof ſhortly thou ſhalt become King: As Caſar is ſaid to haue done, when hee entred into Africa, who from ſhip-board at his landing fell into the ſands, and merily ſaid, I doe now take poſſeſſion of thee, O Africa.

(30) From Peuenſey Duke William departed towards Haſting, where raiſing another fortification, divulged to all, the cauſes of his comming, as pretending to reuenge both the death of his Normans, ſlain by the treachery of Goodwin and Harold, and the wrongs and baniſhment of Robert Gemeticus Archbiſhop of Canterbury, pretenſes very ſlender, and enforced out of ſeaſon: but ſurely had not a third ſate neerer his heart, the two former would haue paſſed without the ſpleene of reuenge; namely, the donation of King Edward deceaſed, whereon hee built his claime to the Engliſh Crowne. And there alſo by his Edict, hee ſtraitly charged his ſouldiers not in hoſtile manner, to wrong any of their perſons, who ſhortly were to become his Subiects.

(31) Harold in the North hearing of theſe newes, haſted with his Armie (whoſe Armour yet reaked with the bloud of the Norwegians) towards the ſouth, and with ſuch power as poſſibly he could make, entreth London, where immediately a meſſenger from Duke William was preſented vnto him, demanding no leſſe then the Kingdome, and Harolds vaſſalage; vrging the ſame with ſuch inſtant boldneſſe, that Harolds furious indignation could hardly forbeare, againſt the law of Armes, to lay violent hands vpon the Ambaſſador; ſo great a pride and confident hope had entred the heart of this late Victor: to ſhew both, with very great boldneſſe, hee diſpatcheth his Ambaſſadors to William, and by way of irefull checkes menaceth him, vnleſſe forthwith hee departed backe into Normandy, when preſently muſtering his men at London, hee found them much leſſened by his battaile againſt the Norwegians; notwithſtanding, many Nobles, Gentlemen, and others, whom the loue of their natiue Country inflamed, did ingage themſelues for the field, againſt his common and dangerous enemy. Hee therefore with an vndaunted courage, led forth his Armie into Suſſex (againſt the importunate ſuite of his mother, who ſought by all meanes to ſtay him) where on a large and faire plaine, ſcarce ſeauen miles from the enemy, he pitched downe his battailes, and ſent forth his Eſpials to deſcry his power.

(32) Theſe comming into danger, were caught by the Normans, and preſented to their Duke, who commanded them forthwith to be led from Tent to Tent, to be feaſted, and diſmiſſed, without any harme or diſhonour done. Theſe returning to Harold told what they had ſeene, commending the Duke in his Martiall Prouiſions, and his clemency to themward, only ſaid they, his Souldiers ſeem to be Prieſts, for their faces were all ſhauen, whereas the vſe of the Engliſh was then to reſerue onely the vpper-lippe vncut, retaining or renewing the olde manner of the ancient Britaines, ſo deſcribed by Caſar: but King Harold, who had bin in that country, well knowing their errour, replied that they were men of great valour & ſtout Souldiers in fight. Vpon which ſpeech, Gyrth, his younger brother, a man much renowned for martiall exploits, tooke occaſion to aduiſe the King from being preſent at the danger of the Field: for (ſaid he) "it ſtands not with the rule of policy, to hazard all "in the triall of one battell, nor to depend vpon the "euent of war, which euer is doubtfull, victory being "as often gotten by fortune, as valor; mature deliberation doth often produce the ſafeſt iſſues, and a pro- "uident delay is held to be the greateſt furtherer of "martiall proiects; neither will any thing ſtrike grea- "ter terror into the Normans, then thou to be leuying, "and enrolling a new Army, whereby they may euer "expect, and feare ſucceeding Battailes. Againe (ſaid "hee) thou beſt knoweſt what oath thine own mouth "hath made vnto William; if lawfull, and willingly, "then with-draw thy ſelfe from field, leſt for that thy "ſinne the whole Hoſt periſh; for there can be no "power againſt God. I am free from ſuch guilt, and "therefore may the bolder fight, and either defeate "this dangerous enemy, or more cheerefully dye in "the defence of my country; and if thou wilt commit "the fortune of Battaile into my Gouernance, aſſure "thy ſelfe I will performe to thee the part of a lo- "uing Brother, and to my Countrimen of a valiant "Captaine.

Caſar in Comment.

(33) This wiſe aduice notwithſtanding, deſtiny ſo driuing him, he gaine-ſtood, imputing it a part of diſhonour, and not befitting a Souldier, (as hee alwaies had beene,) to leaue the field Coward-like, when greateſt glory was to be wonne, or in caſe of fortunate ſucceſſe, to be depriued of a part, and therefore reprooued his brother for making this motion, and with diſdainefull ſpeeches, vnder-valued and embaſed the worth of the Normans.

(34) Duke William now entred the field, & both the hoſts ſtanding ready for fight, the Norman, to ſpare the effuſion of Chriſtian bloud, vpon a pious affection, ſent a Monke as a Mediator for peace, with offers to Harold of theſe conditions, either wholly to reſigne the Kingdome vnto him, and from thence forth to acknowledge the Duke for his Soueraigne: or elſe in ſingle combat to trie the quarrell with him, in ſight of the Armies; or laſtly, to ſtand to the arbitrement of the Pope, touching the poſſeſſion and wearing of the Engliſh Crowne. But Harold, as one whom the heauens would depreſſe, accepting neither domeſticke counſell, nor the Normans offers, referred the deciding of the matter vnto the Tribunall of God, and anſwered, that it ſhould be tried the next day with more ſwords then one.

(35) The next day was the 14. of October, which vpon a credulous errour, hee held euer to be fortunate, becauſe it was the day of his Natiuity, and with hopefull aſſurance, deſired greatly the approach of the ſame: His ſouldiers likewiſe as men whoſe heads were to be crowned with the Laurels of victory, gaue themſelues to licentious reuels, and in riotous banquets, with clamour, and noiſes, ſpent the night; whereas contrariwiſe, the Normans, more wiſely, and ſeriouſly weighing the buſineſſe in hand, beſtowed the time in prayers and vowes, for the ſafetie of their Armie, and victorious ſucceſſe: neither had the morning ſooner ſpread it ſelfe but their battell was ordered, and prepared for fight.

(36) Harold alſo with the like forwardnes, marſhalled his battaile, placing in the Vant-guard the Kentiſhmen (who by an ancient cuſtome had the front of the battaile belonging to them) with their heauy axes, or halberts. The Middleſex-men and the Londoners were in that ſquadron, whereof himſelfe with his brother had the leading.

(37) His enemies Vanward was led by Roger of Mount-gomery, & William Fitz-Oſbern, the ſame conſiſting of Horſmen out of Anion, Perch, & little Brittaine.

Their

Their Maine-Battaile consisted of Poictouins and Germanes, Geffrey Martell, and a Germane Pensioner commanding them: In the Rere-guard was the Duke himselfe, with the whole manhood of Normans, and the flower of his Nobility and Gentry; all which battallions were intermingled with companies of Archers.

(38) The Normans without any confused, or disorderly shout, sounded the battaile, and aduanced forward, discharging a fierce volley of arrowes like a tempestuous haile, a kinde of fight both strange, and terrible vnto the English, who supposed their enemy had beene already euen in the middest amongst them; when presently a furious charge was giuen to the Va-ward of the English, who resolutely had determined to couer the place with their bodies rather then to giue one foot of ground, and bending all their forces, kept themselues close together, whereby they valiantly, and with the slaughter of many, put backe the enemy: which was so farre from daunting the Normans, that by it they were more whetted to re-enforce themselues vpon them: when with an horrible noise, the battailes of both sides gaue the stroke; and now come foote to foote, and man to man, coped together in a most cruell fight. The English standing thicke, and close, as if they had beene stucke one to another, abode the brunt and charge of the Normans, and with such welcomes, that after many a bloudy wound receiued, they were at point to recoile, had not Duke William, whose crown lay now at stake, both brauely performed the part of a Leader, and with his presence, and authority restrained them. The fight thus continuing, the Normans horsemen brake into the troupes of the English and sore distressed the Souldiers on foote, yet notwithstanding they still held out, and kept their array vnbroken: for Harold (no lesse carefull to keepe, then the other to gaine a diadem,) as a most valiant Captaine bare himselfe worthily euery where. The Duke well perceiuing that with fine force, and true valour, no good end could be got, betooke himselfe to a stratageme, and commanded his men to sound the retreat, but kept them still in such order of array, that they gaue backe in as good discipline as they came on.

Wil. Malmsbury. Henry Hunt.

(39) The English supposing the Normans to haue fled, and themselues the masters of the field, began in eager pursuit carelesly to vntwist, and display their ranckes; when on the sodaine, the Normans hauing their wished opportunity, and winding about, charged the enemy a fresh; who now being scatteringly disranked, and out of all order, were slaine down on all sides, not able to recouer their battaile: many thus borne downe, and slaine, none by flight sought to escape the field, but rather to maintaine their honour in Armes, cast themselues into a round, choosing there to die in the cause of their Country, then cowardly to forsake the Standard of their King: and therefore with bold resolutions encouraging one another, they turne head and resist a long time: but showers of arrowes like a stormy tempest falling thicke among them, one, most fatall, and vnlucky for the English, wounded Harold into the braines through the left eye; so that falling from his horse to the ground, was vnder his owne standard slaine.

(40) And yet Giraldus Cambrensis (I know not by what inducement,) relates the issue of this Battaile somewhat otherwise, affirming, that Harold with losse of his Eye, but not of his life, from the field fled to the City of Westchester, and there long after led a holy life, and made a godly end, as an Anchoret in the Cell of Saint Iames, fast by the church of S. Iohn. With Harold died his Brethren Gyrth, and Leofwine, with most of the English Nobility, besides the slaughter of sixty seauen thousand, nine hundred seuenty foure of their Souldiers: Bremensis saith an hundred thousand.

(41) Duke William in this Battaile had three horses slaine vnder him; God (saith Marianus) so defending his person, that though multitude of darts were throwne against him, yet not a drop of his bloud was spilt by the Enemy, and this Battaile wonne with the losse onely of sixe thousand, and thirteene of his men. Whose wodden bowes (as Iohn Rouse is of opinion) gained the Normans that great victory; for the Arrowes shot leuell, or directly forward, wounded the English that stoot in the front, and vpright; the other shot on high, galled at the fall, those that were more remote, and the backes of such as stooped to shunne the danger.

(42) This battaile was fought in Sussex, 7. miles from Hastings, vpon Saturday the fourteenth of October, and yeere of Grace 1066. Wherin the dolefull destruction of the English fell, and the glorious Sun of the Normans, euen in the shutting of the day did arise; when perished the Royall bloud of the Saxons, whose Kings first had made this Kingdome into Seuen, and afterward of them so glorious a Monarchy, that it was not inferiour to any in Europe, and her Monarchs so renowned for princely magnanimity, as that many of them were ranked with the best in the world: But now the all-ordering hand of God (vnto whose becke not onely this Ball of the Earth, and the Rulers thereof, but euen the Heauens themselues, and all the powers thereof must bow) either for the sinnes of the English, which were many, and great, or to graffe one more faire and longer-continuing bud vpon this dried, and decayed stock, brought that forreine ofspring into this his nursery of Britaine; whose branches, as the vine, haue spread both fruitfull and farre; and whose rootes are fastened as the trees of Libanon: the Kings thereof, euen from the loynes of this Great Conquerour, holding on a royall succession for the space of these fiue hundred forty fiue yeares, their issues topped with the highest Cedars of the world, and their branches spread thorowout all Christendome; which wee pray may still proceede and continue, whilest the Sun and Moone haue their being.

Hose 14. 6.

(43) This victory thus obtained, Duke William wholly ascribed vnto God, and by way of a solemne supplication or procession gaue him the thankes; and pitching for that night his Pauilion among the bodies of the dead, the next day returned to Hastings, there to consult vpon his great, and most prosperously begun enterprise, giuing first commandement for the buriall of his slaine Souldiers.

(44) But Morcar, and Edwin, the vnfortunate Queenes Brethren, by night escaping the battell, came vnto London, where with the rest of the Peeres, they began to lay the foundation of some fresh hopes, posting thence their messengers to raise a new supply, & to comfort the English (who through all the Land were stricken into a fearefull astonishment with this vnexpected newes) from a despairing feare, shewing the chance of warre to be mutable, their number many, and Captaines sufficient to trye another Field. Alfred, Arch-bishop of Yorke, there present, and President of the Assembly, stoutly, and prudently gaue his counsell forthwith to consecrate, and crowne young Edgar Atheling (the true heire) for their King; to whom consented likewise both the Sea-Captaines, and the Londoners. But the Earles of Yorkeshire and Cheshire, Edwin and Morcar (whom this fearefull state of their country could not disswade from disloyaltie and ambition) plotting secretly to get the Crowne to themselues, hindred that wise and noble designe. In which while, the sorrowfull Queene their sister was conueied to Westchester, where, without state or title of a Queene, she led a solitary and quiet life.

(45) The Mother of the slaine King did not so well moderate her womanly passions, as to receiue either comfort, or counsell of her friends: the dead body of her sonne she greatly desired, and to that end sent to the Conqueror two sage Brethren of his Abbey at Waltham, who had accompanied him in his vnfortunate expedition: Their names (as I finde them recorded in an olde Manuscript) were Osegod and Ailric, whose message to the Conqueror not without abundance of teares, and feare, is there set downe in the tenor as followeth.

"(46) Noble

"(46) Noble Duke, and ere long to be a moſt great and "mightie King; we thy moſt humble ſeruants, deſtitute "of all comfort, (as we would we were alſo of life) are "come to thee as ſent from our brethren, whom this dead "King hath placed in the Monaſterie of Waltham, to at-"tend the iſſue of this late dreadfull battaile, (wherein God "fauouring thy quarrell, hee is now taken away, and dead, "which was our greateſt Comforter, and by whoſe onely "bountifull goodneſſe, we were relieued and maintai-"ned, whom hee had placed to ſerue God in that Church. "Wherefore we moſt humbly requeſt thee (now our dread "Lord) by that gracious fauour which the Lord of Lords "hath ſhewed vnto thee, and for the reliefe of all their "ſoules, who in this quarrell haue ended their daies, that "it may be lawfull for vs, by thy good leaue, ſafely to take "and carry away with vs the dead body of the King, the "Founder and builder of our Church and Monaſterie: as "alſo the bodies of ſuch others, as who, for the reuerence "of him, and for his ſake, deſired alſo to be buried with vs, "that the ſtate of our Church, by their helpe ſtrengthened, "may be the ſtronger, and indure the firmer. With whoſe ſo humble a requeſt, and abundant teares, the victorious and worthy Duke moued, anſwered.

"(47) Your King (ſaid he) vnmindfull of his faith, "although hee haue for the preſent endured the worthy pu-"niſhment of his fault, yet hath he not therefore deſerued "to want the honour of a Sepulcher, or to lie vnburied: "were it but that hee died a King, howſoeuer he came by "the Kingdome, my purpoſe is for the reuerence of him, and "for the health of them, who hauing left their wiues and "poſſeſſions, haue here in my quarrell loſt their liues, to "build here a Church and a Monaſtery, with an hundred "Monkes in it to pray for them for euer; and in the ſame "Church to bury your King aboue the reſt, with all ho-"nour vnto ſo great a Prince, and for his ſake to endow "the ſame with great reuenewes.

(48) With which his courteous ſpeech and promiſes, the two religious Fathers comforted, and encouraged, againe replied.

"(49) Not ſo, noble Duke, but grant this thy ſeruants "moſt humble requeſt, that we may, for God, by thy leaue "receiue the dead body of our Founder, and to bury it in "the place which himſelfe in his life time appointed; that "wee cheered with the preſence of his body, may thereof "take comfort, and that his Tombe may be vnto our Suc-"ceſſors, a perpetuall Monument of his remembrance.

(50) The Duke, as he was of diſpoſition gratious, and inclined to mercy, forthwith granted their deſires: whereupon they drew out ſtore of gold to preſent him in way of gratulation; which he not onely vtterly refuſed, but alſo offered them plenty to ſupply whatſoeuer ſhould be needfull for the pompe of his funerall, as alſo for their coſts in trauaile to and fro; giuing ſtrait commandement that none of his Souldiers ſhould preſume to moleſt them in this their buſineſſe, or in their returne. Then went they in haſte to the quarry of the dead, but by no meanes could finde the body of the King, for that the countenances of all men greatly alter by death; but being maimed and imbrued with bloud, they are not knowne to be the men they were. As for his other regall Ornaments, which might haue ſhewed him for their King, his dead corps was deſpoyled of them, either through the greedy deſire of prey, (as the manner of the Field is) or to be the firſt bringer of ſuch happy newes, in hope of a Princely reward; vpon which purpoſe many times the body is both mangled & diſmembred: and ſo was this King after his death by a baſe Souldier, gaſht and hackt into the legge, whom Duke William rewarded for ſo vnſouldier-like a deed, caſhiering him for euer out of his wages and warres. So that Harold lying ſtript, wounded, bemangled, and goared in his bloud, could not be found or knowne, till they ſent for a woman named Editha (for her paſſing beauty ſurnamed Swan-ſhals, that is, Swanſ-necke, whom hee entertained in ſecret loue before hee was King, who by ſome ſecret markes of his body to her well knowne, found him out; and then put into a coffine, was by diuers of the Norman Nobility honourably brought vnto the place, afterward called Battle-Bridge, where it was met by the Nobles of England, and ſo conueied to Waltham, was there ſolemnly, and with great lamentation of his mother, royally interred, with this rude Epitaph, well beſeeming the time, though not the perſon.

Heu cadis hoſte fero, Rex à Duce Rege futuro,
Par paris in gladio, milite & valido.
Firmini iuſti lux eſt tibi, luce Calixti;
Pronior hinc ſuperas, hinc ſuperatus eras.
Ergo tibi requiem depoſcat vtrumque perennem:
Sicque precetur eum, quod colit omne Deum.

A fierce foe thee ſlew; thou a King, he King in view;
Both peeres, both peereleſſe, both feard, and both fearles;
That ſad day was mixt, by Firmin and Calixt,
Th'one helpthee to vanquiſh, th'other made thee languiſh,
Both now for thee pray, and thy Requiem ſay;
So let good men all, to God for thee call.

(51) This Kings raigne was not ſo full of dayes as of great troubles: being but the ſpace of nine months and nine dayes, in whom was completed the Period of the Saxons Empire in Britaine, after they had continued from their firſt erected kingdome by Hengiſt in Kent, the ſpace of ſixe hundred and tenne yeares, without any reuerſement or interruption ſauing the ſmall Inter-Raignes of theſe three Daniſh Kings, of whom wee haue ſpoken. And although Aimund of Breme, in the fauour of his Danes, ſharpely taxeth this Harold as being an impious man, and that by vſurpation hee aſpired to the Crowne, yet doth Ealred the Abbot of Rinauxe, (the Legender of S. Edwards life) much commend him for his courteous affability, gentle department, and Iuſtice, and for his warlike proweſſe none matchable vnto him; and was reputed (ſaith he) verily a man paſſing well furniſhed with all vertues befitting a Soueraigne commander, and born euen to repaire the decaied ſtate of England; had he not, in the haughtineſſe and opinion of his own valour and prudence, ſo much adicted himſelfe to his owne reſolutions, and too much neglected the wiſe deliberations of his beſt friends and Counſellers.

His Wiues.

(52) The firſt wife of Harold, whom he had married and buried before he was King, I find not named by any of out writers; but that he had ſuch a one, appeareth, where it is recorded that hee was a Widower, what time he contracted the Conquerors daughter; and that alſo he had children of ſuch age, that they made warres againſt King William in the ſecond of his Raigne; which it is probable, he had not by Editha, his Swanſ-necke, but were legitimate, and by this lawfull, though nameleſſe Mother.

(53) Aluith, the ſecond wife to King Harold, was the widow of Gruffith ap Lhewelyn King of North-Wales, the ſiſter of Edwine and Morcar, Earles of Yorkeſhire, and Cheſter, and daughter of Algar ſonne of Leofricke, ſon of Leofwine, all Earles of Cheſter, Leiceſter and Lincolne: She was married vnto him being then but Duke, in the laſt yeare of Edward Confeſſors raigne, and of Grace 1065. neither did ſhee long enioy him, or her Queenly title, after his aſpiring to the Crowne; for being reſident in London when he was ſlaine, from thence ſhee was conueyed by her brethren to Weſtcheſter, where ſhe remained in meane eſtate, and in good quiet (which vſually moſt attends the meaneſt) without any princely ſhew or name, during the reſt of her life, which laſted a great part of the Conquerours raigne.

His Iſſue.

(54) Goodwine the eldeſt ſonne of King Harold, being growne to ſome ripeneſſe of yeares in the life of his Father, after his death and ouerthrow by the Conquerour queror, tooke his brother with him, and fled ouer into Ireland: from whence he returned, and landed in Sommerſetſhire, ſlew Ednoth (a Baron ſometime of his Fathers) that encountred him, and taking great preyes in Deuonſhire and Cornewall, departed till the next yeare. When comming againe, he fought with Beorn an Earle of Cornwall, and after retired into Ireland, and thence went into Denmarke, to King Swayn his Coſen-German, where he ſpent the reſt of his life.

(55) Edmund, the ſecond ſonne to King Harold, went with his Brother into Ireland; returned with him into England, and was at the ſlaughter and ouerthrow of Ednoth and his power in Sommerſetſhire; at the ſpoiles committed in Cornwall and Deuonſhire; at the conflict with the Corniſh Earle Beorn; paſſed and repaſſed with him in all his voyages, inuaſions and warres, by ſea and by land, in England and Ireland; and at the laſt departed with him from Ireland to Denmarke; tooke part with him of all pleaſure and calamity whatſoeuer, and attending and depending wholly vpon him, liued and died with him in that Country.

(56) Magnus, the third ſon of King Harold, went with his brothers into Ireland; and returned with them the firſt time into England, and is neuer after that mentioned amongſt them, nor elſewhere, vnleſſe, (as ſome doe coniecture) hee be that Magnus who ſeeing the mutability of humane affaires, became an Anchoret, whoſe Epitaph pointing to his Daniſh originall, the learned Clarenciaux diſcouered in a little deſolate Church at Lewes in Suſſex, where in the gaping chinks of an Arch in the wall, in a rude and ouerworne Character, certaine old imperfect verſes were found, which hee ſuppoſeth ſhould be thus read;

M. Ferret. Camb. in Suſſex.

Clauditur hic Miles Danorum regia proles,

Deponens Magnum, prudentior induit agnum,

*He * Magnus hight; great name, note of great place;*
*But Magnus left, an * Agnus milde he prou'd,*
From world bereft an Anchorite belou'd.

(57) Wolfe the fourth ſon of King Harold, ſeemeth to be borne of Queene Algith his ſecond Wife, for that hee was neuer mentioned among his other brethren, and hauing better friends by his mothers ſide, was left in England, whereas they were forced thence; neither is he ſpoken of, during all the raigne of the Conquerour, and therefore at his entrance may probably be thought to haue beene but an Infant: yet after his death he is named among his priſoners with Earle Morcar (his vncle, if Queen Algith were his mother) and was by King William Rufus releaſed, and honoured by him with the Order of Knighthood.

(58) Gunhild a daughter of King Harold is mentioned by Iohn Capgraue (the Writer of the Engliſh Saints) in the life of Wolſtan Biſhop of Worceſter, reporting her to haue beene a Nunne in a Monaſtery of England; who, among the many miracles done by the ſaid Wolſtan, (which he numbreth by tale, according to the ſuperſtitious manner of the time wherein hee liued) declareth, how he reſtored this Lady to her perfect eye-ſight, whereof by a dangerous infirmity, ſhee was almoſt wholly, and in moſt mens opinions, vncurably depriued.

Iohn Capgraue.

(58) Another daughter of King Harold not named by any Story-writer of our own nation, is mentioned by Saxo Grãmaticus, in his Daniſh hiſtory, to haue come into Denmarke with her two brethren; to haue beene very honorably entertained by King Swaine the yonger, her kinſman: and afterwards to haue been as honorably placed in marriage with Gereſlef, called in latine Iariſlaues, and of the Danes Waldemar, King of the Ruſſians: and by him to haue had a daughter, that was the mother of Waldemar, the firſt of that name King of Denmark, from whom all the Daniſh Kings for many ages after ſucceeded.

THE SVCCESSION OF ENGLANDS MONARCHS, FROM THE ENTRANCE OF THE NORMANS, VNDER WILLIAM THE CONQVEROR: VNTILL THE REGALL RIGHTS OF THE WHOLE ILAND WERE BY GODS PROVIDENCE VNITED VNDER ONE IMPERIALL DIADEME, IN THE PERSON OF OVR PRESENT SOVERAIGNE KING IAMES, SOLE MONARCH OF GREAT BRITAINE: THEIR SEVERALL ACTS, ISSVES, RAIGNES, ARMES, SEALES, AND COINES.

THE NINTH BOOKE.

CHAPTER I.

WHat hath beene ſpoken touching the Originals, Lawes, and Cuſtomes of the Saxons, and Danes, the ancient conquerors, and poſſeſſors of this our Iland, may in like ſort be ſaid of the Normans (being a branch from the ſame root) of whom wee are now to write, ſauing only that the name is not ſo ancient, & therefore their Manners may be thought more ciuill. Through the miſty-darke times of which Stories, together with that of the Romans, and of our Britaines, (wherin no brighter Sun did ſhine vnto vs) by the aſſiſtance of the all-ſeeing power which bringeth light out of darkeneſſe, I am laſtly approached to theſe times of more light, and vnto affaires of more certaine truth: whoſe Current, to my ſeeming, is made now Nauigable, by the many writers that haue emptied their full channels into this Sea, wherein, though in reſpect of my owne defects, and that ſo many Maſter-Pilots haue ſailed before me, it may ſeeme but preſumption to direct another courſe, with a purpoſe to better what they haue ſo well performed; yet to make a compleate Hiſtory from the firſt to the laſt: giue me leaue to continue, as I haue begunne.

2 Cor. 4. 6.

(2) Theſe Normans then, being antiently a mixt Nation with the warlike Norwegians, Swedens, & Danes, tooke their Name of that Northeren Climate from whence they came firſt, which was that Coaſt of Germany, anciently called Cimbrica Cherſoneſus, and Norway, for that it tendeth in reſpect of ſituation ſo farre Northward; and from hence, and the parts adjacent, the Saxons, Iutes, Angles, and lately the Danes, made their incurſions into this Land.

(3) This Tract therefore as, the womb of conception, by the diſpoſe of the Omnipotent, after it had produced thoſe Nations which formerly made Conqueſts of Britain, now again brought forth (as it were) her laſt-borne Beniamin, who deuouring the prey in the morning, hath diuided the ſpoile in the Euening, & hitherto continued their glorious fame atchieued; which I pray, may extend to the laſt period of Times being: For theſe Normans, firſt by force got footing in France, with the Dominion and Stile of a Duke, and next the Diadem of this faire Empire, the laſt and moſt famous Monarches of the ſame.

Gen. 49. 27.

(4) Theſe, formerly practizing Piracies vpon the Coaſts of Belgia, Frizia, England, Ireland, and France, proceeded in their hardy courſes euen to the Mediterranean Sea: inſomuch that Charles the Great, ſeeing their roauing tall Ships, and conſidering the bold attempts they vndertooke, with a deepe ſigh, and abundance of teares, is reported to haue ſaid: Heauie am I at the very heart, that in my owne life time, theſe Pirates dare to come vpon my Coaſts, whereby I foreſee what miſchiefe they wil worke vpon my Poſteritie. Which indeede proued ſo great, that in their publike Proceſſions, and Letanies of the Church, this Petition was added, From the rage of the Normans, good Lord deliuer vs. This feare, and praier notwithſtanding, they draue the French to ſuch extremitie, that King Charles the Bald was forced to giue vnto Haſting a Norman Arch-pirate, the Earledome of Charters, for to aſſwage his furie exerciſed vpon his People; and again, King Charles the Groſſe, granted vnto Godfrey the Normane, part of Neuſtria, with his Daughter in mariage: Yet all this ſufficed not, but that the Normans by force of Armes ſeated themſelues neere vnto the mouth of Sein, taking all for their owne that lay compriſed betwixt that Riuer and the Riuer Loyre: which * Countrey afterwards tooke the name of Nor-manny from theſe Northern Gueſts, at what time king Charles the Simple, confirmed it vnto Rollo their Captaine.

(5) This Rollo, as ſay the Daniſh Hiſtorians, was the ſon of Guion, a great Lord in Denmark, who with his brother Gourin were appointed to depart the Country (according to the Daniſh cuſtomes) to ſeeke their aduentures abroad, and leaue more roome for the reſt at home; but theſe refuſing the order, made warre vpon the King, in which, both Guion the Father and Gourin the ſonne, were ſlaine, and Rollo forced to flye for ſafeguard of his life, with whom went a number of Gallants to ſeek Fortunes Court, and not a few miſdoers or out-lawed-men: whoſe Acts in England regiſtred by Albertus Krantius, ſeeing they vary from our owne hiſtorians in circumſtances of times, and names, I haue choſen in this place to inſert, leauing the credit thereof to him the Reporter.

Rollo. Albert. Krantius.

Polych. lib. 6. cap. 1.

(6) Rollo, a Noble-man of Denmarke (ſaith he) and too powerfull in his Kings eye, was forced with a Nauy to aduenture his Fortunes into forreine parts, whoſe firſt arriuage, as he ſaith, was in England, where many of the Daniſh nobility had formerly tried their valours, and ſome of them attained to the Scepter, if not of the whole, yet of a great part of that kingdom. Indeed, (ſaith hee) England from the beginning was not gouerned by one King, as now it is, for the Angle-Saxons had their prouince, and the Mercians theirs, both gouerned by Prouinciall Deputies, but the Northumbrians had a King; as the Scots and Picts also, in the same Iland, had kept their own limits vnder the like Gouernment. Amongst these Northumbrians the Danes had their chiefest abiding, and in this Prouince Rollo the Dane brought first his men on Land, where making warre vpon that Nation, he built both Castles and Fortresses to fortifie himselfe, his Nany lying vpon the Seas: and proceeding forward into the Continent, tooke great booties both of men, cattle, and other spoiles, lading their ships as they lay at Anchor: the Inhabitants of the Country making head against him, had still the worst.

(7) Rollo yet doubtful and in suspence what to doe, desired indeed to returne to his Country, but that the Kings indignation was an obstacle that way; next he affected to try his Fortunes in France, yet feared the issue would be dangerous, the People being exasperated against him, for the harms he had done them: but chiefly the Diademe of England ranne most in his minde, though hee knew the hazard was great, to match his small Forces with an host of a King: in which perplexed thoughts, it chanced him (saith my Author) to fall into a sweet slumber, and in his sleepe he seemed to sit in the Kingdome of France, vpon a high hill, bending his head forward to a Riuer which issued from the top of a Mountaine, at the foote whereof beneath him, he saw many kindes of Birds, which washed their ruddy left wings in the same water, where they all fed together, flew about, built their nests, and at times appointed, brought forth their yong.

Albert. Krant. Rollo his dreame.

(8) Rollo awaking from his pleasing dream, imparted the same vnto his consorts, desiring their iudgements for interpretation; which no way satisfying him, hee called a Christian of his English Captiues, a man industrious, and of great Capacity, and of whose deepe vnderstanding he had a great opinion: this captiue then boldened, (and willing in likelihood, to diuert Rollo from infesting England, told him that his dreame was significant and good, and did prognosticate the happy successe of himselfe and whole Nation: for by this he saw that he was shortly to receiue a quiet possession, and a land of great renowne in the Continent of France, and that himselfe should be cleansed in the Lauer of Baptisme, wherein also the ruddy sins of his People should be washed away, as the water had done the wings of the Birds.

The dreame expounded by an English Christian Captiue.

(9) This interpretation pleased Rollo well, and he easily beleeued that which he most affected, as in the like kinde dreamers commonly doe: therefore prouiding all things for France, he set his countenance only that way; yet because he had already performed great matters in England, he thought to follow Fortune for his best Leader, and before he departed from so fair a land, intended to sound the King by an Ambassage, that so, if he might finde him inclinable to a league, he might haue a refuge against future chances; if not, then was he resolute to goe forward with his iourney: therefore making choice of certaine actiue persons, sent them to the English king Alstan, a Prince of a speciall religion and holinesse of life: these hauing audience, vttered their message as followeth.

Rollo sendeth to sound King Alstan.

(10) We being men distressed, and driuen from our Country, sought out in banishment an habitation to rest in, and going forth, very many followed vs, who incouraged vs to seeke and win a land by Conquest, supplying vs with strength, and giuing vs great hope of victory: which thing when we resolued to take in hand, a Tempest of weather draue vs (O King) into these English Ports, where staying a fit season to put again forth, the Winter with-held vs, and our wants made vs to seeke further into the Land: whereupon our men, euermore brought vp to the warre, being euil intreated of those inhabitants, were moued by such iniuries to prouide for their owne defence; wherein some small skirmishes haue passed betwixt them. Our Prince therfore and General Rollo, doth humbly require peace of thee, and to be permitted to soiourne in thy Land for a time, and to relieue his company with things necessary, wee paying sufficiently for it: these things when thou shalt grant, he shall rest content and pacified, vntill the next spring, at which time he meanes to take his intended voyage.

(11) Alstenus, not ignorant of the Danish cruelty, and with how great Armies they might oppresse the English shoares, did readily grant what they required: And also added a further courtesie, saying withall, I doe greatly desire to see your Duke himselfe: and let him not think much to repaire to our mansions, for he shall find none amongst vs but his most louing friends. When this was signified to Rollo, choosing out the tallest and goodliest persons of his company, and such as were of greatest wisedome, with them he very ioyfully meeteth the King, is entertained, presents him with great gifts, but receiueth greater: Then sitting downe to talke and commune:

Rollo commeth to Alstans Court.

(12) I am (saith King Alstenus) right glad, most worthy Duke Rollo, to see you in this my Court. The renowne of your Nation hath beene related to me, a Martiall kinde of People ye are, & in fight vnconquerable. And you your selfe also for your prowesse, are not vnnoted among the rest of your famous Worthies: your valiant exploits are well knowne vnto vs: It is right pleasing vnto vs to enter with such men into amitie. Behold our whole kingdome is before you, choose out a seate for your selfe, and your people whersoeuer you best like, for we will haue an euerlasting league betweene vs.

Will. Gemetic. lib. 2. cap. 6. Alstans bounty to Rollo.

(13) Rollo glad of so faire promises, replied: Most worthy and renowned King, I highly esteem of your bountifull and most liberall proffers: God grant a happy successe of our affaires. I doe thinke my selfe most bounden & deuoted to your worthines; and if destinie euer answere to our desires, we wil not be vnthankful for this your so great benignity. To seate our selues in your kingdome, though indeed we are very willing, & your Royall proffers do much more incite vs, yet Fate doth not permit it. I haue determined (and will certainely performe,) to goe into France. For your gifts bestowed on me, I esteeme them in the highest degree: and right well content I am to haue a perpetuall League with you, that the like Fortune may betide vs both, the one to be a safeguard to the other. This I both offer, and accept of. This League God grant may to vs both proue happy and fortunate.

(14) With such like interchanges the time much spent, and night drawing on, they were brought to banquet: And early the next morning, comming forth of their lodgings, most louingly embraced each other, when each gaue & receiued presents best suting with their estates and occasions. Neither doth Krantius stay his penne there, but proceedeth to particular affaires betwixt these two Princes, without the concurrence of any of our owne writers.

(15) As how the English rose in Armes against Alstenus their King, taking opportunity of the time, for that Rollo (whom they knew to be ioyned in a most strait confederacy with their Soueraigne) being then imployed in the warres of France, could not come or send to his aide: Alstenus therefore oppressed with a tumultuous kingdome, remembred Rollo his faithfull friend, and sending Ambassadors declared vnto him what distresse he was in; who not vnmindfull of the firme league betwixt them, left his French wars, and prepared for England with all his Forces; where entring the Iland, hee easily quieted the tumultuous rebels, ransacking their Cities, curbing their wildenes, and so reducing them at last to an orderly subiection. For which his great loue, care, & paines, the King not vnthankfull, resolued to requite him with the halfe of his kingdome, appointing the Cities and limiting the bounds, which each of them should rule and gouerne as their owne possessions.

Alstans faith to his friend.

(16) Rollo in the meane time, as carefull of the peaces continuance, as regardlesse of so great remunerations taketh pledges of the Rebels for securing their loialtie to the King, and peaceable bearing towards himselfe; vpon accomplishment whereof, repairing to Alstenus hee thus bespake him.

(17) Seeing (King Alstenus) you haue so highly rewarded me, both with princely entertainements, and bountifull

tiful presents, I can doe no lesse, then willingly bestow vpon you these my paines for your safetie: it is no more then your deserts doe chalenge; neither will I accept, or seeme so vncourteous as to expect, for my paines, any part of your dominion. Your selfe now may well gouerne it; for France calls for my presence: keepe therefore those your Pledges, brought to you by your Subiects, and there is no doubt but you shall hence-forward gouerne your Kingdome in a setled and contentfull quietnesse.

(18) The King could not containe those his eyes, which now beheld in a stranger so strange and vnexempled kindnes, from resoluing into teares; giuing him both hearty thankes, and rich gifts, seeing hee could not fasten on him any portion of his Kingdome: of whom, all that Rollo desired was this, that hee would giue licence to such voluntary Souldiers as would goe with him into France: whereto Alsten, ready in all things to gratifie his desire, gladly condescended, and furnished him with attendants.

(19) But leauing Krantius the Dane, aslikewise Gemeticensis the Norman, to fauour their Country, & these their reports to the best liking of the iudicious; most certaine it is, that the French King Charles, commonly called the Simple, gaue the Duchie of Normandy with his daughter Gilla (whose mother was Æguina, the daughter of Edward the Elder, King of England) vnto Rollo the Dane, as is recorded in an old manuscript belonging to the Monastery of Angiers. And when Rollo was baptized, Charles receiuing him for his God-sonne at the Font, he was there required to doe homage for his Dukedome receiued, and inioyned therein to kisse the Kings foot, which hee did, but with some disgrace to King Charles, and bound it with an oath that hee did not receiue it vpon courtesie.

(20) This Rollo by his second wife Popee, (for Gilla died childlesse) daughter to the Earle of Bessin and Baileulx, had a sonne named William, surnamed Long-espee, and a daughter called Girlota, who was afterwards married to the Duke of Guyan.

William Long-espee, second Duke of Normandy.

(21) William Long-espee (so called of the Long Sword he vsually wore) the second Danish Duke of Normandy, took vnto wife Sporta the daughter of Hubert, Earle of Sentlis, by whom he had onely Richard his sonne: this William receiuing baptisme, receiued therewith a new name, and was thenceforth called Robert, who hauing gouerned his Dukedome with great moderation the space of twenty yeeres, was guilefully murthered by the working of Lewes King of France, to the great griefe of his people, who so far followed the reuenge, that they intercepted Lewes in the Citie Rothomage, and deteined him their prisoner, till he agreed to these Articles: That young Richard should succeed his slaine Father in the foresaid Dukedome; and that thenceforth when the King & Duke should conferre together, the Duke should be girt with his Sword, and the King disabled either of Sword or Knife: to which Lewes yeelded vpon his corporall oath.

Polychr.

Richard 1. the third Duke of Normandy.

(22) Richard thus established, gouerned his Dukedome the space of fifty two yeeres. He was a man of an admirable fortitude, and therefore was called Richard the Hardy. His first wife was * Agnes, daughter to Hugh le Grand, Earle of Paris, Lord Abbot of Germans, and Father to Hugh Capet of France; but she dying issueless, he secondly married Gunnor, a Gentlewoman of the Danish bloud, (whom he had kept his Concubine before) by whom hee had three sonnes and three daughters: the first was Richard that succeeded in his dominions; the second was Robert Arch-bishop of Roan; and the third was called Maliger: his daughters were Hawisa, the wife of Geffrey Earle of Britaine, and mother to Alane and * Guye his sonnes. Maud espoused * Eudes Earle of Chartiers and Blois: and Emma, called the Flower of Normandy, was Queene of England, both by the English King Ethelred, and Canutus the Dane, to both which shee was married.

(23) Richard the second, surnamed the Good, was the fourth Duke of Normandy, and ruled the same for twenty foure yeeres: In whose time the Normans began to be great, and gracious in England, the marriage of his Sister making their way: His first wife was Iudith the Sister of Geffrey Earle of Britaine, by whom he had issue, Richard, the fifth Duke of Normandy, and Robert the sixt, William a Monke, and Nicholas Abbot of S. Andrewes: his daughters by her were, Alice, that died yong, and another of the same name married to Reinold, Earle of Burgoine, and Eleanor espoused to Baldwin the fourth Earle of Flanders, who bare vnto him Baldwin the fifth, father of Maud that was Queene of England, and wife to the Conquerour.

Richard 2. fourth Duke of Normandy. Ran. Higden. calleth him Richard the third.

(24) The second wife to Duke Richard the second, was Estrike, Sister to Canute King of England, from whom he purchased a Diuorce, without any issue begotten on her body; and then taking for his third wife a faire Gentlewoman named Pauia, had issue by her William Earle of Arques, and Mauger Archbishop of Roan.

(25) Richard the third of that name, and fifth Duke of Normandy, in the second yeere of his Dukedome died an vntimely death, not without suspition of Poyson, ministred by Robert his yonger brother, who presently was inuested in the Duchie, for that he left no issue of his body to succeed.

Richard 3. the fifth Duke of Normandy.

(26) This Robert (Duke Richards Brother) was a man of a magnanimous spirit, and of such bounteous liberality as is vncredible. Hee comming to the City Phalesya in Normandy, chanced to see a most goodly and beautifull Damosell, dancing among others of her familiar consorts; her name was Arlet, of meane parentage (the daughter of a Skinner, saith Higden) whose pleasing feature and comely grace so pleased the Duke, that taking her to his bed, he begot on her, William his onely sonne, (who proued the onely man of the Normans bloud) and after vpon a remorse of conscience, vndertooke a pilgrimage vnto Ierusalem, from whence hee neuer againe returned. Arlet in Roberts life time was married to Herlaine a Norman Gentleman, but of meane substance; to whom she bare Odo Bishop of Baion, by his halfe-brother William created Earle of Kent; and Robert created Earle of Mortaigne, a man of a dull and grosse wit; & a daughter named Emma, wife to Richard Count of Auranches, (a Prouince in Normandy,) the mother of Hugh Lupus Earle Palatine of Chester. And thus farre briefly I haue thought good to prosecute the Line of the Normans, for the better illustration of our English Stories.

(27) Duke Robert intending his pious pilgrimage vnto the holy land, assembled all his Nobility vnto the City Fiscan, where he caused them to sweare fealty vnto his sonne William, being then but seauen yeares old, committing him to the Gouernance of one Gilbert, an Earle of much integrity and prudence, and the defence of that Gouernement vnto Henry the French King, and so in the eight yeare of his Dukedome, set on his voyage for Ierusalem; who entring Iurye, and not able to trauaile, was boren in a litter vpon the Saracens shoulders, and neere vnto the Citie, meeting a returning Pilgrime, desired him to report in his Country what he there saw, which is, (said he) that I am carried to Heauen vpon the Diuels backe: but so farre was hee boren that he neuer returned, being preuented by death: which the Norman Peeres hearing, made vse thereof for their owne ambitious ends, without any regard of young William their Pupill and Soueraigne, and growne into factions, greatly troubled the Peace of their Country, wherein Earle Gilbert the Protector was slaine, by Randulphus the young Dukes Cosen-Germaine.

a fall before hee could aſcend the higheſt ſtep, that in loſing his footing he loſt therewith his head.

(29) Strife alſo aroſe betwixt young William, and his vnckle William the baſe-borne Earle of Archis. Whereupon King Henry of France, who till then had held this Wolfe by the eare, fearing ſome hazzard to himſelfe, if he ſhould now let him goe, thought it beſt to aide the Earle in his cauſe, and therefore ſent him ſupply vnder the leading of ſome men of note; but William ſo begirt his Caſtle with ſtrait ſiege, that hee cauſed the Earle by famiſhment to yeeld vp his Fort, and droue the French with diſgrace out of the field: where, with ſuch ſucceſſe hee ſtill proſpered, that Henry now, to ſecure his owne Confines, ſent Odo his brother for Prefect, into thoſe Parts that lay betwixt the Riuers Rein and the Seyn.

(30) William, as watchfull as the French King was jealous, ſent againſt Odo, Robert Count Auceníis, Hugh Gornacenſis, Hugh Mountfort, and William Criſpine, all of them ſtout Souldiers, which ſo brauely bare themſelues, that Odo was the firſt man that made away, and the reſt of the French ſaued themſelues by flight.

(31) William that had ſworne a league with King Henry, and in his Minority had euer found him his gracious Guardian, was loth to endanger the breach of his Oath, or the duty that loue and deſerts had obliged him vnto; and therefore by this Stratagem hee ſought to diſlodge the French. In the ſilence of Night when in the Kings Campe all were at reſt, he cauſed to be cried aloud, the flight of Odo, and his diſcomfiture, with no leſſe terrour then it was; which rang ſo ſhrill in the eares of the French, that Henry thought beſt to be gone: leauing William the abſolute Lord of Normandie.

(32) Which he valiantly defended, and vprightly gouerned all the daies of King Henry: whoſe death preſently cauſed an alteration of State; for he leauing Baldwine, ſurnamed the Gentle, and fifth Earle of Flaunders, Tutor to his yong Sonne Philip, the quarrell betwixt thoſe two Princes had an end; Baldwine on the one ſide ſo working his Pupill, and on the other the Normane, (who was his ſonne in law) that a moſt firme League was ratified betwixt them, and kept vnuiolated ſo long as William was a Duke: where wee will leaue him in proſperitie and peace, and proceed in our intendment, as he did in his Conqueſt here in England.

CHAPTER II.

An.D.1066.

BAttle-Field wonne with the losse of little lesse then sixty eight thousand men, and Harold in Souldier-like exequies boren vnto Waltham in Essex, & there honourably enterred, as wee haue said: William the Conquerour, (for so now may we stile him) returned to Hasting, and thence set forward with spoile of the Country, ouer Thamesis, towards London.

Simon Dun.

(2) Where Edwine and Morcar, the Brethren of the Queene, were in working the English, that one of them should be King, or rather, saith Simon of Durham, to crowne Edgar Etheling, the rightfull heire, in such esteeme with the People, that he was commonly called Englands Darling; vnto whose side most of the Nobles adheared, with the Citizens of London, and the Nauall forces; to which part also ioyned Aldred Archbishop of Yorke, though presently he fell off and stuck to the stronger; for the Prelates, though secretly affecting the right claime, yet terrified with the flashing thunderbolts of the Papal curse (who had sent William a consecrated Banner, an Agnus Dei, and one of Saint Peters Haires, in way of his good speed) durst not goe forward with their purpose (so powerfull was the Pope in blessings and cursings, to defeat the rightfull heires of Kingdomes) but refused to side with the Lords, whereupon all their designements were suddainely quashed.

Lib. S. Alban.

(3) For William hauing wasted through Kent, Sussex, Surrey, Hampshire, and Barkshire, came vnto Wallingford, and crossing there the Thamesis, passed through the Counties of Oxford, Buckingham and Hertford, where staying at Berkhamsted, Aldred Arch-bishop of Yorke, Wolstane Bishop of Worcester, Walter Bishop of Hereford, with the Earles Edwin and Morcar, yea, & Edgar himselfe, yeelded their allegiance vnto the Duke: This curse so preuailing, farre

Trees cut downe to hinder Williams passage.

(4) William intending for London, being on his way, found the passage stopt vp with multitudes of great trees, which by the policy of Fredericke Abbot of S. Albanes, (a man descended from the Saxons noble bloud, as likewise from Canutus the Dane) to secure his Monastery from the destruction of the Normans, were so cut downe: whereat the Duke both wondring and fretting, sent for the Abbot, vnder his assurance of safe returne, and demanding the cause why his woods were so cut; Frederick answered very stoutly, I haue done (said he) the duety both of my birth and profession; and if others of my ranke had performed the like (as they well might and ought) it had not beene in thy power to haue pierced the Land thus farre.

Iohn Stow.

(5) William hearing the bold answere of this Prelate, and knowing it was now a time fitter to pacifie, then exulcerate the English spirits, gaue way to the present necessitie, and withall hastned (as good policy required) his Coronation, which at Westminster was solemnized vpon Monday, being the day of Christs Nativity, and yeere of saluation, 1066. where he receiued the Crown at the hands of Aldred Archbishop of Yorke; causing the Bishops and Barons to take the oath of allegiance vnto him; and himselfe likewise at the Altar of S. Peters, tooke a solemne oath to defend the rights of the Church, to establish good lawes, and to see iustice vprightly administred, as became a good King; and thereupon chose for his Councell, such Men as hee knew to be of great wisedome and experience: next, applying his thoughts for the securitie of his new gotten Empire; fortified such places as lay open to danger, bestowed strong Garrisons vpon the Coasts, & Ships to ride in those Harbours which were most exposed to inuasion.

(6) And the better to assure the South of the Land (best seruing his purpose, if any new troubles should arise) hee tooke his way towards Douer, the locke and key of the Kingdome, as Matthew Paris termes it; that so hee might commaund the Seas from his enemies arriuage, and ouer-awe the Kentish, a most strong and populous Prouince. When Stigand therefore Arch-bishop of Canterbury, and Eglesine the Politique Abbot of Saint Augustines, (being the chiefest Lords and Gouernours of Kent) vnderstood of his approch, they assembled the Commons at Canterbury, laying forth the perils of the Prouince, the miseries of their neighbours, the pride of the Normans, and the wrongs of the Church; all which now were too apparantly seene: the English till then, (they sayd) were borne free, and the name of Bond-men not heard of among them; but now seruitude onely attends vs, if wee yeeld (said they) to the insolency of this griping enemy: These two Prelates therefore, after the example of the vndaunted Machabees, offered themselues to die in the defence of their Country; whose forwardnesse drew the people vnto the like resolution, which by their aduertisements were assigned to meete at a day, the place was Swanscombe, two miles West from Graues-end.

(7) Where accordingly conuening, and keeping secret in the woods, they waited the comming of the Conquerour, all ioyntly agreeing, for that no way lay open saue onely a front, to carry in their hands great branches of trees, wherewith they might both keepe themselues from discouery, and (if neede were) impeach the passage of the Normans: which deuice tooke so strange an effect, that it daunted the Duke, euen with the sight, at his approach; who being as he thought free from the enemy, was now suddainly beset on all sides with woods, whereof seeing some before him to moue, he knew not but that all the other vast woods were of like nature, neither had hee leasure to auoide the daunger. The Kentish inclosing his Army about, displayed their Banners, cast downe their boughes, and with bowes bent prepared for battle; so that hee which euen now had the Realme to his seeming in his fist, stood in despaire of his owne life; of which his sodaine amazement, the reuerend Prelates Stigand and Eglesine taking notice, and also aduantage, presented themselues before him, and in the behalfe of the Kentish thus spake.

Simon Dun.

(9) All things established for Englands securitie, and subiection now to the Normans; hee ordained his halfe brother by the surer side, Odo Bishop of Bayeux, (whom he created Earle of Kent) and his cosen William Fitz-Ozburne (by him made Earle of Hereford) to be Gouernors in his absence ouer the Realme; and in the Lent following sayled into Normandy, leading with him many pledges for their fidelity, besides other Nobles, especially such as he feared to be too potent; amongst whom, Stigand the Archbishop of Canterbury, the two great Earles Edwin and Morcar, Edgar surnamed Atheling, Frethericke Abbot of S. Albans, Agelnothus Abbot of Glastenbury, Walteof the sonne of the warlike Siward Earle of Northumberland, Roger Earle of Hertford, Rainulph Earle of Cambridge, and Gospatricke Earle of Cumberland, were the men of greatest note; yet was hee no sooner gone, but that Edricke, surnamed Sylnaticus (sonne to Alfrick, the brother of Edrick Streona, the treacherous Earle of Mercia,) a man of great spirit, and of no little power, aided by the Welshmen, tooke vp armes and denyed subiection to the Normans, so that by either partie (as in ciuill discords it euer falleth out) great spoyles were made in many places; but most of all in Herefordshire, where Robert Fitz-Scroope left to man the Castle, did much hurt vpon the Tenants of Edricke, and he to requite him with the like, calling to his ayde Blethyn and Sywalhon Kings of Wales, wasted all to the mouth of Wye.

(10) These stirres in England called William out of Normandy, and were so distastfull to his great, but ill digesting stomacke, that hee began to hold the reine straiter, and harder to curbe the head-strong English, giuing the possessions of their Nobles vnto his Normans, and laying vnwonted taxes and heauie Subsidies vpon the Commons, then which nothing bred him more hatred, in so much, that many of them, to enioy a barren liberty, forsooke their fruitfull inheritance, and with their Wiues and Children, as out-lawes, liued in the woods, preferring that naked name of freedome, before a sufficient maintenance possest vnder the thraldome & tyranny of their Conquerours: but in short time, to sustaine their wants, (easily conceiued, but hardly endured,) they so fell to spoyle and robbe, that the high wayes lay vntrodde from Towne to Towne, yea, and priuate houses euery where so guarded with Bowes, Billes, Polaxes, Swords, and Clubs, as if they had beene not harbours of peace, but fortresses of warre; when prayes were made at the shutting in, and opening of their doores, as in times of open hostilitie. On the other side, such as preferred vassalage with some hope of tollerable, (yea, or vntollerable) vsage, they to curry fauour with the Normans, seeming to forget who they were, became as strangers themselues, and did shaue their beards, round their haire, and in garment, behauiour, and diet, altogether vnfashioned

(11) Vnto theſe Male-contents, and voluntary Out-lawes, ioyned Morcar and Edwine, the ſtout Earles of Cheſter and Yorkeſhire, ſetting vp againe for their Captaine Edgar Atheling (which if in due time at firſt they had done, might haue proued ſucceſſefull) who with their complices right valiantly for a time reſiſted the Normans, and in their proceedings put many of them to the ſword. King William as carefull and ſedulous to preuent further miſchiefe, collecting his forces, and not without danger of his life, diſſolued their power, ſo that euery man ſought how to ſaue himſelfe by eſcape: among whom Edwin and Morcar, Weltherſus and Merther, with ſome of the Biſhops and Clergie, went into Scotland: Marleſwin, and Goſpatricke, Noble men of Northumberland went into Denmarke: Edgar Atheling, with his mother Agatha, and his ſiſters Chriſtian and Margaret, tooke the ſeas for Hungarie; but by contrary windes were driuen into Scotland, where they were moſt courteouſly entertained by Malcolme (ſurnamed Cammor) King of that Country, who ſo affected the perſon and qualities of Lady Margaret, that hee entred with her a Nuptiall contract, and the rather in reſpect of her poſſibility and neereneſſe to the Engliſh crowne; whoſe marriage was ſolemnized about the feaſt of Eaſter, in the ſecond of King Williams raigne, whereby Scotland became a ſanctuary to the Engliſh, which daily fledde thither from the preſſures of the Normans.

(13) William thus fruſtrate of all hope from King Malcolme, and daily perplexed at the flight of the Engliſh vnto his kingdome, feared a reuolt and dangerous rebellion; to preuent which, hee cauſed foure ſtrong caſtles to be built, one at Haſting, another at Lincolne, the third at Nottingham, and the fourth at Yorke, wherein he beſtowed ſtrong gariſons: and diſarming the Engliſh of armour, commaunded euery houſe holder to put out both fire; and candle at eight of the clocke at night, at which houre, in euery City, Towne, and Village, hee cauſed a bell to be rung, of the French then called Couerfew (that is, Couer-fire) partly yet in practiſe, and in name very neere, commonly called Curfue: to preuent nightly tumults that might happily be done.

(14) All this his circumſpection notwithſtanding, could not preuent the troubles that preſently aroſe; for Goodwin and Edmund, the ſonnes of the late King Harold, comming with ſome forces out of Ireland, and landing in Sommerſetſhire, fought with Adnothus, (ſometime maſter of their fathers horſe, but now a Normaniſt) whom they ſlew with many others, and taking great booties both in Cornwall and Deuonſhire, departed againe for Ireland.

The chiefe inſtigator to their diſloialty was Githa the mother of King Harold, and ſiſter to Swaine King of Denmarke, with others ſiding againſt the Normans, who now ſeeing the yeelding vp of that Citie, ſhifted themſelues out of danger, and got ouer vnto Flanders.

(15) But fortune to Cumin was no ſo fauourable in the North, nor himſelfe ſo circumſpect as valiant; for lying ſecurely, as hee thought in the City Durham, hee was on the ſodaine ſurpriſed in the night by Edgar Atheling and his followers, where Robert and ſeuen hundred of his Normans were ſlain, one onely eſcaping, who brought the bloody newes thereof to King William, which happened in the third of his raigne, the twenty eight of Ianuary, and yeere of Chriſt 1068. The depth of Winter notwithſtanding, he poſted into the north; whoſe only terror danted all further attempts, ſo that taking ſome of the Authors of this rebellion, he cut off their hands, and ſome their heads, conceiuing hereupon more hatred againſt the Engliſh, and in that ſpleene of diſpleaſure returned to London.

(18) The Conquerour after theſe troubles bare more hatred vnto the Engliſh, whoſe inconſtancie (ſo he accounted their vnquenched deſire of liberty) he daily dreaded, eſpecially the Nobles, and men of power; whereupon hee beganne to deale yet more roughly, for light cauſes thruſting out ſome of them into exile, and depriuing more of their lands and goods, ſeizing moſt part of euery mans reuenews into his owne poſſeſſion, as gained by a lawfull conqueſt, cauſing them to redeeme them againe at his hands, and yet retained a propriety thereof vnto himſelfe, by receiuing an annuall rent, and other prouiſions and ſeruices, whereof if they failed, their lands were vtterly excheated to the crowne; neither ſpared hee the Corporations of Cities, Townes, Monaſteries, or Epiſcopall Sees; but tooke from them their ancient liberties and priuiledges, whoſe redemptions ſet at what rate it pleaſed himſelfe, ſoon weakened their eſtates, which was the onely thing he aimed at, and therefore often blamed Canutus for his ouer-much gentlenes extended towards thoſe, whom he had conquered, whoſe ſteps therein hee ment not to tread.

The Engliſh riſe againſt William.

(22) The King by his Spials hearing the encreaſe of their power, and knowing to his reſtleſſe trouble, the vnwilling ſubiection of the Engliſh, entred conſultation with his Archbiſhop; who as Rehoboams Sages, gaue him counſell ſomewhat to beare with their abuſes, rather then to hazard the ruine of all in fight; and ſo farre preuailed in this his aduice, that an aſſembly was appointed to meete at Berkhamſted in the County of Hertford, where the King entring parley with the Engliſh Nobility, ſo far did winde himſelfe into their good opinions, (being a very politicke, and faire-ſpoken Prince) that they all forthwith laid downe their weapons.

1 King. 12. 6.

(23) And hee for his part fearing to loſe the crowne with ſhame, which he had gotten by the effuſion of ſo much bloud, gaue his oath vpon the holy Euangeliſts, and the reliques of Saint Albane the Martyr, (the ſame being miniſtred vnto him by Abbot Fretherik) ſwearing to obſerue, and inuiolably to keep the ancient lawes of this land; & moſt eſpecially thoſe compiled by King Edward the Confeſſor, though (as the euent ſoone ſhewed) he little ment to doe as hee pretended.

King William ſworne vnto King Edwards lawes.

(24) Peace thus eſtabliſhed, among other conferences beſeeming ſuch eſtates, it chaunced King William to demand the reaſon how it came to paſſe, that his fortune ſhould be in one dayes battaile to ſubdue the Engliſh, which the Danes before him could not doe in many; to which queſtion whilſt each ſtood looking on others, expecting what to anſwere, the ſtout Abbot Frethericke ſtept forth and ſaid:

(25) The reaſon thereof may eaſily be giuen, if the occaſion be well weighed; for wontedly the land was defended by dint of Swords, vntill that their warlike wearers vpon their godly deuotions, laid them from their ſides vpon the Altars of Oriſons, which through ouer-long reſt are growne very ruſtie, and their edges too dull now for the field: for, (ſayd hee) the maintenance of martiall men, with a great part of this lands reuenewes, are daily conuerted to pious imployments, to maintaine and defend theſe holy votaries, whoſe prayers pierce more deeper then the ſword: and therefore thou art obliged O King to maintaine their peace, that haue beene the cauſe of thy ſo eaſie purchaſe.

Lib. S. Alban. M. S. in vita Frethe-ric.

A good ſpeech ill taken.

(26) But William before the words were well out of his mouth, replyed and ſaid, Is the Clergy ſo rich and ſo ſtrengthned, that the land thereby lieth weakened of her men men at Armes, and to keepe onely the religious in safetie shall the Laitie lie exposed to the inuasions of the Danes, and other forreine Enemies? surely out of your owne mouthes I will iudge you, and for redresse will first begin with thee: whereupon hee tooke from the Abbey of Saint Albanes all the lands and reuenewes that lay betwixt Barnet and London-Stone. Abbot Frederick, whose ouerbold answers had now offended the King, without delay called a chapter of his brethren, shewing them their approaching dangers, and to auoid the present storme, went himselfe to Ely, where hee desisted not from his wonted machinations against the Conquerour.

Lib. S. Alban.

(26) This conference ended, and the Kings oath receiued, the English Armies disband themselues, as dreaming they had now good Fortune by the foot, and hoping the greatest stormes of their dangers were past; which presently prooued but a Vaine surmise: for King William hauing compounded with the Danes that lay all this last winter in Northumberland, and payed them a great summe for their departure, beganne extreamely to hate the Rebels, and with full resolution of their destruction, suddainely set vpon them apart, which hee durst not attempt, when they were vnited, so that slaying many, imprisoning others, and prosecuting all of them with fire and sword, well was he that could be first gone.

King William worketh vpon aduantage.

(27) Edgar Atheling got againe into Scotland, and Edwin Earle of Yorkeshire following with the like intent, was slaine in the way by his owne Souldiers; Egelwin Bishop of Durham, Morcar Earle of Chester, Siward surnamed Bran, and Hereward (a very valiant Knight) got into the Ile of Ely, relying wholly on the aduantage of the place.

This Hereward had receiued a hallowed Sword, and benediction, of his vnckle the Abbot of Peterborow, and had most valiantly defended his owne inheritance against the Normans, and with no lesse courage withstood the Conquerour, being made captaine of those now assembled.

Ingulphus.

(28) But the King, lest delay should giue them aduantage, and the Ile harbor more of such his vnbrideled subiects, with a great power hasted thitherward, and stopping vp the East-passage from all flight, or reliefe, drew a causy on the West through the deepe Fennes, euen two miles of length, where likewise hee then built the Castle of Wisbech: against which, they in the Ile raised another of timber and turffes, and called it according to the name of their Captaine, Hereward: at which place, many assaults and bickerings being made, but yet no entrance gotten, Morcar by boat escaped out of the Ile, and in Scotland obtained by price, what these distressed could not by praier; so that Malcolme the King, in rescue & reuenge of them, inuaded Cumberland, and forraged all Theisdale: Hereward also went out of the Ile, and got a gallant crew of choise and youthfull souldiers, which stood most stoutly for the defence of their liberties.

(29) In the meane while, the Monkes, oppressed with miseries, sued for mercy vnto the King, & Thurstan the Abbot repairing to Warwick, where William then lay, offered him entrance vnto the Ile, if hee would restore to their Abbey the ancient possessions: the King then rejoycing, to obtaine that by wit, which Canutus could not doe by maine strength, accorded to the request, and in great hast, but no little difficulty, got into the Ile, where slaying a thousand of the Common sort, hee vsed great cruelty against the better, imprisoning many, and dismembring others, some of their hands, some of their eies, and some of their feete. Egelwine Bishop of Durham hee imprisoned, first at Abington, then at Westminster, whose dyet was either so sparing, or stomack so great in forbearance, or both (for both are reported) that ere long he died of hunger.

The Abbot would hold his, howsoeuer the rest fared.

(30) Howsoeuer the Monkes of Ely kept their promise with William for betraying of the Ile; he contrariwise brake his for their preseruation and peace; for by no meanes their praiers would enter his eares, till the sound of seauen hundred markes had opened the way; to collect which, they were forced to sell both the iewels and ornaments of their Church; which being brought to his receiuers, there wanted (whether by error or deceit) a groat in weight, (for in those daies greater summes passed by weight, not by tale,) whereof when the King vnderstood, hee in great (but captious) rage, denied them all composition for peace, whereupon with much suite hee was entreated to accept of a thousand Markes more, to raise which, they disfurnished their Monastery euen of things of necessary vse.

(31) But the English Fugitiues, who had gotten the Scots to sticke to them, were not yet pacified, but entring into Cumberland, they wasted the Country before them, vnto the Territories of Saint Cuthbert, & city of Durham; to meet whom, King William sent Gospatrick, who lately reconciled to his fauour, and created Earle of Northumberland, shewed the like measure of cruelty vpon the Scotish Abetters, as they had done against the English. The Conqueror therefore not a little moued against King Malcolme, for that his Country was a receptacle of his Rebellious Subiects, and himselfe now the chiefe Leader of the Male-contents into his Kingdome, hasted into Scotland, with a desire and purpose to haue done much more then hee was able to accomplish: for entring Galloway, hee more wearied his Souldiers in passing the Marish grounds and mountaines, then with encounter or pursuite of the Enemy, so that hee was forced to giue ouer his enterprize, and then drew his forces towards Lothiam, where King Malcolme and his English lay, being fully resolued, there to end by battaile, either his troubles, or his life.

The English enter into Scotland but with small successe.

Polyd. v.

(32) But Malcolme wisely considering the euent of war, and that the occasion thereof was not for his owne subiects, but for a sort of forraine fugitiues, beganne to thinke, that the wrongs therein done to another hee could hardly brooke himselfe, and sent therefore to William proffers of peace; whereunto lastly the English King inclined, and hostages deliuered vpon further Conferences, what time (as I take it) vpon Stane-more, not far from an homely hostilerie called the Spittle, a Stone-Crosse (on the one side of whose shaft stood the picture, and armes of the King of England, and on the other the Image & armes of the King and Kingdome of Scotland, vpon that occasion called the * Roi-crosse) was erected, to shew the Limits of either Kingdome; some ruines of which Meere-marke are yet appearing; for King William, granting Cumberland vnto Malcolme, to hold the same from him, conditionally that the Scots should not attempt any thing preiudicial to the Crowne of England, (for which King Malcolme did him homage, saith Hector Boetius the Scottish writer) and the English being reconciled to his fauour, after hee had built the Castle of Durham, returned as cleared from all Northern troubles.

(33) But his Norman Dukedome, stirred somewhat vnto rebellion, called King William into those parts, where, by the prowesse of the English, hee soone brought all things to peace, and returned for England, better conceiting of that Nation, especially of Edgar Atheling, whom he courteously receiued and honourably maintained in his Court, allowing him a pound waight of Siluer euery day to spend; a rare example of a victorious Conquerour, shewed vpon a man so vnconstant, (who twice had broken his oath of fidelity) and dangerous to be so neere vnto his person, being, as he was, a Competitor of his Crowne.

(34) Whiles the King was in Normandy, Ralph de Ware Earle of Suffolke and Norfolke, tooke to wife Emma, the daughter of William Fitz-Osborne, and sister to Roger Earle of Hereford, cosen to King William, and that without his consent; by whose affinity he conceiued no small pride, and euen on the wedding day, when Wine had well intoxicated the braine, with a long circumstance perswaded his Guests vnto a Rebellion; vnto whom yeelded Roger Earle of Hereford, his Brides brother, and Waltheof Earle of North hampton, with many other Barons, Abbats, and Biſhops: But the next morning, when Earle Waltheof had conſulted with his Pillow, and awaked his wits to perceiue the danger whereunto he was drawne, repaired ſtraightwaies to Archbiſhop Lanfranke, who was left Gouernour of the Land in King Williams abſence, reuealing vnto him their Conference and Treaſons intended, by whoſe aduice he went ouer into Normandie, and there with ſubmiſſiue repentance, ſhewed the King what theſe Lords and himſelfe had intended.

(36) William now returned from Normandy, and ſome reliques of rebellion remaining in the Weſt, he haſted thitherward, where, with ſmall adoe, he got Earle Roger into his hands, and condemned him to perpetuall priſon; the Welſh his Aiders (of whom alſo were many at the ſaid Marriage) he vſed with great ſeuerity; for of ſome he put out the eyes, of others he cut off the hands, hanged ſome vpon gibbets, and he that ſcaped beſt, went into baniſhment; neither Earle Waltheof, notwithſtanding he reuealed the conſpiracie, eſcaped vnpuniſhed; for after that the King had taxed him with ingratitude (he hauing formerly reſtored the Earledome vnto him) he cauſed his head to be chopt off at Wincheſter, (although he had before promiſed his pardon and life) his great poſſeſſions being his greateſt Enemies; for he is reported to haue beene Earle of Northampton, Northumberland, & Huntington, thought by the King to be fitter dignities for the Normans his followers; and the deſire of a new Marriage, moued Iudith his Wife not a little to ſet forward and haſten his death.

(40) King William hearing of his ſonne Roberts proceedings, was not (as great cauſe there was) a little offended thereat, and with a powerfull Army haſted to Normandy: where neere vnto the Caſtle of Gerbory, at a place called Archenbraye, hee joyned battell with his ſonne; where the fight was ſore and dangerous on both ſides, the Generals being ſuch men as they were; but in the heat of the foot battels that fought it out reſolutely, Robert commaunded a power of Horſe to breake in vpon the Rereward of his enemies, and himſelfe valiantly following, chanced to light againſt his owne Father, and with his Lance thruſt him through the Arme, bearing him off his Horſe to the ground. King William thus wounded & ſalne, called for helpe to be remounted, ſtorming to ſee his bloud ſpilt in his owne Land, and againſt his owne ſonne, which neuer had beene in battailes of other Countries, nor drawne by the weapons of forraigne enemies, and in great rage threatned the reuenge: Robert, that knew his Father by his voyce, haſtily alighted, and in his Armes tooke him from the earth, humbly deſiring his pardon for this vnknowne fact, and forgiueneſſe of his ouer-haſtie attempt; then mounting him vpon his owne Horſe, brought him in ſafetie out of the preſſe; who hauing eſcaped ſo great a danger, and ſeeing himſelfe for the preſent too weake to withſtand the enemie, left the honour of the field vnto Robert, with the loſſe of many his ſouldiers, ſlaine there both in the battaile and chaſe, beſides a great number that were hurt & wounded; among whom, William Rufus his ſecond ſonne was one, a man of a better temper, and more filiall regard to his parents, and therefore more deſeruedly and tenderly beloued then Robert; for which diſhonour now done to his Father, and diſloialty for his vnnaturall Armes, hee bitterly curſed him, and execrated the time wherein hee begat him: howbeit, others doe write, that for his moſt vndaunted courage at that time, iſſuing and ending in ſuch dutifull and tender care of his fathers ſafetie, hee preſently forgaue his former offences, and euer after had him in better reſpect.

laid great ſubſidies vpon the land: and that the ſame might amount to his great benefite, (though with the greateſt grieuance of the people) hee cauſed an exact ſuruey to be taken of the whole kingdome, yea and of euery particular part and commodity thereof; ſo that there was not an hide of land, lake, water, or waſte, but he knew the valuation, the owners, and poſſeſſors, together with the rents, and profits thereof, as alſo of all Cities, Townes, Villages, Hamlets, Monaſteries, and Religious houſes; cauſing alſo all the people in England to be numbred, their names to bee taken, with notice, what euery one might diſpend by yeere; their ſubſtance, money, and bond-men recorded: how many yokes of oxen, and plough-lands were in the Realme, and what ſeruices they owed, who held of him in Fee; all which was certified vpon the oathes of Commiſſioners. This done, he exacted ſixe ſhillings to be paied him for euery hide of land; which amounted to an huge maſſe of money. Englands exactions.

(43) This exaction was gathered with ſuch extremity, & paid with ſuch impoueriſhing of the Engliſh, that they greeuouſly groned vnder their miſerable eſtate, whereby more hatred grew daily to the King, and his Normans; whoſe loue againe to them-ward was ſo little, that hee ſought by all meanes to bring the Engliſh name, and Nation to ruine: for it is noted by Caſtor, and Rowſe, that no Engliſh man was permitted to beare any office of Credit, or Countenance in this Conquerours dayes, and accounted it was a great ſhame to be called an Engliſhman, or to marry into their bloud.

(47) Other great calamities are noted to haue hapned vpon his people, as burning feuers ſtrangely conſuming the people: Murrens deuouring infinite numbers of Cattle; abundance of raine, and concourſe of water-flouds beyond credite, whereby the Hilles were ſo ſoftned to the very foundations, that ſome of them fell, and ouerwhelmed the Villages which were in their way: moſt of the principall Cities of England much endammaged by fire, and London eſpecially, where the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul (as much as was combuſtable) was conſumed to aſhes; and if that may alſo be noted (which cauſed not the leaſt wonder) tame, and domeſticke fowles, as Hennes, Geeſe, Peacockes, and the like fled into the Forreſts, and Woods, and became very wilde, in imitation of men, degenerating then into ſauages: for in thoſe times euen the Church-men (and therefore leſſe maruaile of others) became vnlike themſelues: Walter Biſhop of Durham, bought of King William the Earledome of Northumberland, maintained Murtherers, and was murthered himſelfe. Odo, another Biſhop, and Earle alſo, to reuenge his death, made Northumberland deſolate, beheading and diſmembring the poorer ſort, and at great ranſomes fining the rich. And Pope Gregory for his part played Rex in this Land, ſending hither his Buls with damning Curſes againſt the married Clergie: commaunding that none ſhould heare their Maſſes: which how it was diſgeſted, either by God, or man, let vs heare Paris an ancient Monke (and therefore herein no partiall man) ſpeake his minde.

Gregory 7.

(49) This Gregory (before called Hildebrand) sate in Peters chaire with such pranks of impietie, that his gouernement was odious to the Romans, who wished an end of his raigne and life, so that certaine Southsaiers imploied in that busines gaue forth, that after Gregory, Odo should be Pope. Odo, our said Earle, the Conquérours brother, fed with full hope that hee was the man, sendeth to Rome to buy him a Pallace, adorning it with stately and ouer-lauish trimmings; Salutes the Senators with great gifts and complements, stuffeth bagges with money, and letters to such as might doe much in the election, and prouides honourable personages to attend him to Rome. Among the which for chiefe, was Hugh Earle of Chester, with many great men and Knights of the Land: for the Normans variable, and desirous to see forraine Countries, were contented to forsake their faire lands in the West Climate, to accompany this proud Prelate ouer the Riuer Poo.

Odo, King Williams brother, affecteth the Papacy.

This jolly traine was set forward into the Isle of Wight, and there in great pompe ready to set saile into Normandy, when on the sodain King William vnlooked for, was euen among them, and in his great Hall, in presence of his Nobles, thus spake:

King William condemneth his brothers Ambitions.

"(50) Excellent Peeres, I beseech you hearken "to my words, and giue me your counsell: at my sai- "ling into Normandy, I commended England to "the gouernement of Odo my brother Bishop. In "Normandy many forraine foes haue risen vp a- "gainst mee, yea and inward friends I may say, haue "inuaded mee: for Robert my sonne, and other "yonglings whom I haue brought vp, and giuen "Armes, haue rebelled; vnto whom my false "Clients, and other bordering enemies haue giuen "their assistance: but they haue not prospered, "God (whose seruant I am) euer defending mee: "neither haue they gotten any thing of mine, be- "sides Iron in their wounds: They of Anion pre- "pared against mee, whom with the onely feare of "warre I haue pacified. These businesses you know "haue drawn me into Normandy, where I haue staied "long, and imploied my painfull endeuours on pub- "like behooues. But in the meane time, my brother "hath greatly oppressed England, spoiling the Chur- "ches of Lands and Rents, hath made them naked "of Ornaments giuen by our Predecessors, and hath "seduced my Knights, with purpose to traine "them ouer the Alpes, who ought to defend the "Land against the inuasions of the Danes, Irish, and "other Enemies ouer strong for me; but my greatest "dolour is for the Church of God, which he hath af- "flicted, and vnto which the Christian Kings that "raigned before me, haue giuen many gifts, and with "their loues honored, for which now (as we beleeue) "they rest, reioycing with a happy retribution in a "pleasant State: Ethelbert, Edward, Saint Oswald, Al- "thulph, Alfred, Edward the Elder, Edgar, and my co- "sen and most deare Lord Edward, haue giuen Riches "to the Church, the spouse of God: But my Brother "to whom I committed the whole Kingdome, vio- "lently plucketh away their goods, cruelly grindeth "the poore, and with a vaine hope stealeth away my "Knights from mee, and by oppression hath exaspe- "rated the whole Land with vniust taxations; con- "sider thereof, most Noble Lords, and giue mee (I "pray you) your aduice, what is herein to be done.

His Oppressions.

(51) At which pause, when all stood mute, as fearing to giue their opinions in so weighty a poynt, concerning so great a Person, the King thus continued his speech.

"Hurtfull rashnesse is euer vnsufferable, and must "at length be repressed. This man hath oftentimes "banded himselfe against his owne father, and vp- "on a stomacke, blowne vp with pride and folly, hath "fallen off to the King of France: therefore lest with "ouermuch lenity, we buy too late a repentance, he "shall remaine Prisoner, yet not as a Bishop, whose "name I both honour and reuerence, but as an Earle, "subiect to the Lawes and Censure of his King.

His Treacheries.

His imprisonment.

Which accordingly was done; vpon seizure of whose estate, this Prelate was found so well lined in purse, that the heapes of yellow mettall did moue admiration to the beholders, and many of his bags were taken vp out of the bottome of Riuers, where they were hidden full of gold ground into powder.

His Auarice.

(52) Soone after, some displeasure hauing arisen betwixt King William, and Philip King of France, he hauing first generally caused to be taken the Oath of English Alleageance to himselfe and successors, with a mightie masse of money (fitted for some great attempts) departed to Normandy; where falling sicke, and keeping his Bed more then his wont, the French King hearing that his disease was in his belly, gaue him this frumpe; Our Cosen William (said he) is laid now in Child-bed: Oh what a number of Candels must I offer at his going to Church? surely I thinke a hundred thousand will not suffice.

Will. Malms. Matth. Paris.

King William hearing thereof, is said to make this answere; Well, our Cosen of France I trust shall be at no such cost; but after this my Child-birth, at my going to Church (swearing by the resurrection and brightnes of God,) I will (said he) find him one thousand candles, and light them my selfe. And accordingly towards August following, when both the Trees, Fruites, Corne, and Ground, was most flourishing, hee entred France with a mighty Army, spoyling all the West parts thereof before him; and lastly, set the City Meux or Mauntz on fire, wherein hee consumed the faire Church of our Lady, in the wals whereof was enclosed an Anchoret, who might, but would not escape, holding it a breach of his Religious vow to forsake his Cell in that distresse. The King busied in these attempts, cheered his men to feede the fire, and came himselfe so neere the flames, that with the heate of his harnesse, he got a sicknesse, and the same encreased by the leape of his Horse, that burst the inward rimme of his belly, and cost him his life.

Stow saith two Anchorites.

(53) At which time feeling death to approach, he deferred not to addresse his last Will, wherein he commaunded all his Treasure to be distributed to Churches, Gods Ministers, and the Poore, limiting to each their seuerall portion and quantity, which hee caused to be ingrossed in writing by Notaries before him: Amongst which, he bequeathed to the Church and Monkes of Saint Stephens at Cane in Normandy, two Mannors in Dorsetshire, one Mannor in Deuonshire, another in Essex, much lands in Barke-shire, some in Norfolke, a Mansion house in Woodstreet of London, with many Aduowsions of Churches; yea, which is to be wondred at, hee gaue his Crowne, and Regall Or-

Princes friends.

(57) Wherein; as we ſee the inſtability, both of Mans life, and Glory, (a point fitting for great Princes euer to thinke on;) ſo by the ſequell we ſhall perceiue, how ill-rooted and vngrounded the friendſhip is, which attends the greatneſſe of ſoueraignes, whoſe Fauourites chiefe or only ends are their owne Ambition and Gaine, the fewell whereof once beginning to decay, the fire of their ſeeming-deuotion will bee quickly colde. For no ſooner had this late-glorious Princes Soule bidden farewell to his Body, but his dead Corps was preſently abandoned by his followers of neereſt place, and beſt meanes, who poſted homewards apace to defend their owne; and by the meaner and his inferiour ſeruants, hee was diſpoyled of Armour, Veſſels, Apparell, and all Princely furniture, euen ſo farre from all wonted and due reſpect, as that they left his dead Body naked vpon the floore; like true Kites, preying whileſt any thing was to be had.

His Corps forſaken of all ſorts.

The qualities of Court-Kites.

The ſudden fame of his death ſtroke ſuch feare into the Commons hearts as was admirable, euery man ſhifting for one, but all neglecting the funerall rites of their King, vntill that one Harluins a poore Country Knight, vndertooke the Carriage of his Corpes vnto Cane, and at his owne coſt, both by Sea and Land vnto Saint Stephens Church, which this dead King had formerly founded.

At his entrance into Cane, the Couent of Monkes came foorth to meet him, and to celebrate the buriall with all Ceremonies beſeeming; but behold euen at that inſtant, a ſudden chance of fire happened, which preſently inuaded a great part of the Towne, that, as his Corpes before, ſo now his Hearſe was of all forſaken, whiles they addreſſed themſelues to repreſſe that furious Element: which done, and the Funerall Sermon ended, the Stone-Coffin ſet in the earth, in the Chancell betwixt the Chorale and the Altar, and the body ready to be laid therein, one Aſcelinus Fitz-Arthur, a man of ſome Note, ſtood vp and forbad the buriall: This very place (ſaid he) was the floore of my Fathers houſe, which this dead Duke violently tooke from him, and heere vpon part of my inheritance founded this Church: This ground therefore I challenge, and in Gods behalfe, forbid that the Body of my diſpoiler, be couered in my Earth, neither ſhall it be interred in the precincts of my right. Whereupon they were enforced to compound with him for a preſent ſum of money then deliuered, and with conſent of his ſonne Henry, for a hundred pound weight of ſiluer after to be paid, and ſo the Exequies went forward; when, behold again the Corpes laid into the Tombe, was with the largeſt, which being preſſed, the belly (not bowelled) brake, and with an intollerable ſtench ſo annoyed the by-ſtanders, that neither Gummes, nor Spices, fuming from the Cenſures, could be any whit ſenſible to relieue them, inſomuch that all with great amazement haſtning away, they left the Monks to ſhuffle vp the buriall, and they were ſoone glad to get them to their cels.

His Hearſe alſo abandoned of all.

His buriall place denied him.

Annoiance at his funerall.

Hence Stowe notes their report for fabulous, who wrote that his Body was found vncorrupt 500. yeeres after his death.

(58) This then was the life and death of this great Monarch, the Conquerour of Men, but not of Death, nor ſuruiuing Enuie; a bright example of the dimme glory of Man, who in life had the poſſeſſions of Kingdomes and Dukedomes, men at Armes, riches, and honour, and all things thereto adhering; but after his death, neither Ornaments, nor Attendants, nor place of buriall, till it were bought; all which, priuate men ſeldome want: ſo vaine is the pompe of this world, and ſo vncertaine the ſtate of her darlings.

(59) Hee was for ſtature indifferent, of countenance ſterne, his fore-head high, and haire verie thinne, fat and corpulent of body, with his belly bearing out, ſo ſtrong of joynts and armes, that few could bend his Bow; of witte ready, and very politique, in ſpeech eloquent, reſolute in attempts, in hazards valiant, a great Souldier, and as great in ſucceſſe; rough and couetous towards the Engliſh, in his taxes, lawes, and in giuing to his Normans their lands; whoſe Charters were of a farre other tenour, forme, and breuity, then thoſe teadious and perplexed conueyances, ſince in vſe, as by theſe few inſerted may appeare:

(61) In the like Charter, granted to his Nephew Alane Earle of Britaine for Lands in Yorkeſhire, hee writeth himſelfe William ſurnamed Baſtard; and yet it ſeemeth, hee was offended at Guy of Burgundy for tearming him Nothus; perhaps, becauſe that word ſignifieth ſuch a one, whoſe Father is vnknowne, whereas King Williams was not only known, but renowned alſo.

(64) But moſt certaine it is, that in the very ſame place where King Harolds Standard was piched, and vnder which himſelfe was ſlaine, there William the Conquerour laid that Foundation, dedicating it to the Holy Trinity, and to Saint Martine, that there the Monks might pray for the ſoules of Harold and the reſt that were ſlaine in that place: whoſe Priuiledges were ſo large, that they, and others of the like condition, were afterwards diſſolued by Act of Parliament, when it was found by experience, that the feare of puniſhment being once taken away, deſperate boldneſſe, and a daring will to commit wickedneſſe, grew ſtill to a greater head: for it was enfranchiſed with many freedomes, and among others, to vſe the words of the Charter, were theſe: *If any Thiefe, Murtherer or Felon, for feare of death, flie and come to this Church, let him haue no harme, but let him be diſmiſſed, and ſent away free from all puniſhment. And twenty three degrees had paſt; euen at that time he died.

His Wife.

(67) Maud the wife of King William, was the daughter of Baldwine the fifth, ſurnamed the Gentle, Earle of Flaunders; her mother was Alice, daughter of Robert King of France, the ſonne of Hugh Capet: Shee was married vnto him when hee was a Duke, at the Caſtle of Angi in Normandy, and in the ſecond yeere of his reigne ouer England, ſhee was crowned Queene vpon Whit-ſunday, the yeere of Grace, 1068. And although ſhe maintained Robert in his quarrell for Normandy, and out of her owne coffers paid the charges of warre againſt his Father, and her owne Husband; yet, becauſe it did proceed but from a motherly indulgence for aduancing her ſonne, it was taken as a cauſe rather of diſpleaſure, then of hatred, by King William, as himſelfe would often auouch, holding it an inſufficient cauſe to diminiſh the loue, that was linked with the ſacred band of a matrimoniall knot. Shee departed this life the ſecond day of Nouember, the ſixteenth yeere of his reigne, and of Chriſts humanitie, 1083. for whom he often lamented with teares, and moſt honourably enterred her at Cane in Normandy, in the Church of S. Maries, within the Monaſterie of Nuns, which ſhe had there founded.

(68) Robert, the eldeſt ſonne of King William, and of Queene Maude his wife, was ſurnamed Curtuoiſe, ſignifying in the old Norman-French, Short-Bootes: he ſucceeded his father onely in the Duchie of Normandy, and that alſo he loſt afterwards to his brother Henry King of England, at the battell of Ednarchbray (in that Dukedome) the yeere of our Lord 1106. where he was taken priſoner, and hauing his eies put out (an vnbrotherly puniſhment) was committed to the Caſtle of Cardiffe in South-Wales; and after twenty eight yeeres impriſonment, there deceaſed, the yeere before the death of his ſaid brother, Anno 1134 and was buried at Glouceſter, in the midſt of the Quier of Saint Peters Church; where remaineth a Tombe with his Carued Image at this day. Hee had two wiues, the firſt, Margaret daughter of Herbert, Earle of Maygne, both married in their Child-hood, and ſhee died before they came to yeeres of conſent: The other was Sibyll, daughter of Geffrey, and ſiſter to William, Earles of Conuerſana in Italy, and Neece of Robert Guiſcard, Duke of Apulia: By her he had two ſonnes William and Henry; this Henry was he that was ſlaine by miſchance, as he was hunting in the New-Forreſt in Hampſhire.

(69) Richard, the second sonne of King William and Queene Maude, was born in Normandy, and after his Father had attained the Crowne came into England, where, being then very yong, as hee was hunting in the New-Forrest of Hampshire, he came to a violent & sudden death, by the goring of a Stagge; (others say, by a pestilent ayre,) and is noted to be the first man that died in that place, the iustice of God punishing on him his Fathers dis-peopling of that Country: his body was thence conueied to Winchester, and there buried on the Southside of the Quire of the Cathedrall Church, where there remaineth a monument of him with an inscription entitling him a Duke, and some suppose of Boloigne.

William Rufus, or the Redde.

(70) William, the third Son of King William and Queene Maud, was borne in Normandy, in the 21. yere of his Fathers Dukedome, ten yeeres before he was King, 1059. hee was surnamed of the Red colour of his haire, in French Rows, in Latine Rufus; he was brought vp vnder Lanfranke the learned Lumbard, who was Archbishoppe of Canterbury, of whom he receiued both instructions of knowledge, and the order of Knighthood; hee serued vnder his Father at the battaile of Gerberoth, in Normandy, 1079. wherein he was wounded: and hee alwaies framed his actions so pleasing to his Fathers humor, as that he thought him much worthier then his elder brother to succeede in his Kingdome.

Henry Beau-clerke.

(71) Henry, the fourth, and youngest sonne of king William and Queene Maud his wife, was borne in England at Selby in Yorkeshire, the third yeere of his Fathers raigne, and of our Lord God, 1070. his childhood was trained vp in learning, at Cambridge saith Caius; but the ancient Annales of Saint Austins in Canterbury, say, he was Philosophiâ peregrè informatus, instructed beyond Sea in Philosophy; where for his notable knowledge in the Liberall Sciences, hee was surnamed by the French, Beau-clerke, thatis, the fine Scholler. Vpon his returne he was made Knight, being 16. yeers old, by his Father at Westminster, in Whitsontide, the nineteenth yeere of his Raigne, Anno 1086. and though at his Fathers death he had nothing bequeathed him but Treasure, yet afterward he succeeded his Brothers, both in the Kingdome of England and Dutchie of Normandy.

Cicelie.

(72) Cicelie, the Eldest daughter of King William and Queene Maude his wife, was borne in Normandy, brought vp in England, and carried againe into Normandy, where in the ninth yeere of the Kings Raigne, and the yeere of our Lord 1075. she was by her Father on Easter day, with great solemnity offered vp in the Church of Feschampe, and vailed to be a Nunne in the Monastery there; but was afterward elected by the Nunnes of our Lady at Cane, to be Abbesse of their Monasterie, founded by her Mother, which she gouerned, and where she died and was enterred.

She is vailed a Nunne.

Constance.

(73) Constance, the second daughter of King William, and Queene Maud, was the first wife of Allayne Earle of little Brittaigne, surnamed in the Brittish, Fergent; in English, Red. In regard of which marriage, and his seruice done at the conquest of England, his Father in law gaue him all the lands of Earle Edwine, whereon he built the Castle, and wherof he made the Earledome of Richmond, which long after, belonged to the Earles and Dukes of Britaigne his Successors; although he had his children by another wife; for shee died very young and without issue; and was buried in the Abbey of S. Edmondsbury in Suffolke.

The Earledome of Richmond erected.

Alice.

(74) Alice, the third daughter of King William and Queene Maud, was married to Stephen Earle of Bloys in France, and had issue by him William an Innocent, Thibaud surnamed the Great, Earle of Bloys and Champain, Stephen Earle of Mortain and Boleine, (who was King of England) Henry a Monke of Cluny, after Abbot of Glastenbury, and Bishop of Winchester, Mary married to Richard Earle of Chester, and Emme, wife of one Harbert, an Earle of France, and mother of Saint William Archbishop of Yorke: Shee suruiued Earle Stephen her husband, and in her widowhood tooke vpon her the profession of Religion in the Priorie of Nunnes at Marciguy in France, where she ended her life.

Gundred.

(75) Gundred, the fourth daughter of King William, and of Queene Maud, was married to William of Warrein, a Nobleman of Normandy, who was the first Earle of Surrey in England; by whom shee had issue William the second Earle, Progenitors of the Earles that followed; and Rainold of Warrein, her second sonne, who had also Issue. Shee died in Childbed, three yeeres before her husband, at Castleaker in Norfolke the 27. of May, in the 20. yeere of her Fathers reigne, being in the yeere of our Lord, 1085. and is buried in the Chapter-house of Saint Pancrase Church within the Priory, at the towne of Lewes, in the County of Sussex.

Ela.

(76) Ela, the fifth daughter of King William, and his Queen Maud, in her Child-hood was contracted in marriage to Duke Harold, when hee was in Normandy, being then a yong Widower. Notwithstanding, hee refusing her, tooke another wife, and vsurped the Kingdom of England, after the death of King Edward, whereby he occasioned his owne ruine, and Conquest of his Country, which afterward ensued when her Father sought reuenge, so much (as some write) to the discontentment of this Lady, that for griefe of these mischances, shee euer after refused marriage, and led a single and solitarie life; though others, vpon better warrant collect, that shee died young, and before William her Father set forth for England; Harold himselfe pleading, that hee was free from all couenants and promises to Duke William, by reason of the death of this his daughter.

Margaret.

(77) Margaret, the sixth and yongest daughter of King William and Queene Maud, was in her childhood giuen in marriage to Alphonso King of Gallicia in Spaine, that afterward was so renowned for the Conquest of the City Lysbon, for his victories against the Mores, and for the slaughter of their fiue Kings, and was the founder of the Kingdom of Portugall, the first King thereof, and the first bearer of the fiue Shields of the said fiue Kings, which are to this day the Armes of the same. But this Lady being thus contracted, deceased before those things happened, and before she came to yeeres of lawfull consent to the marriage.

CHAPTER III.

An.D.1087. William Rufus comes into England.

William posting for England, & Archbishop Lanfrank his earnest soliciter by liberall gifts giuen, and promises made to abrogate the ouerhard lawes of his Father, had the readier passage into the opinions of them that could doe most: and the more to notifie his intended milde gouernement, with other his noble inclinations to princely vertues, as eye-witnesses of his fauours towards the English, hee brought with him from Normandy, Morcar, the stout Earle of Chester, and Wilnoth the sonne of King Harold, both of them releasd out of prison, and then held in especiall fauour with him. But most of the States standing for Robert Curtoise his elder Brother (a man deemed of a more liberall disposition, and better temperature towards the Subjects) their titles had beene tried by swords, had not Lanfrank and Wulstan, both wise and reuerend Prelates, by their Counsels and Meditations stayed their hands.

(2) Consent thus gotten, and all voices giuen for William, he was crowned their King at Westminster, vpon Sunday the twenty sixt day of September, and yeere of Saluation, 1087. by the hands of Lanfrank Archbishop of Canterbury; vnder whom he had beene educated euen from his Childe-hood, and by him made fit both for Warre and Gouernment, had not the variable inclination of his owne minde carried his actions past the limits of any stayed compasse.

His disposition.

(3) Robert vpon discontents that Normandy was still detained, before his Fathers sickenesse, was gone into Germany, to solicite their assistance for his right to that Duchie: but hearing of his death, hasteth into the Prouince, and was there peaceably receiued, and made their Duke: which title notwithstanding, seemed to him dishonourable; his yonger brother being inuested to a Kingdome, and himselfe disinherited; no other cause mouing, but his ouermuch gentlenesse, being by nature composed nothing so rough, as was Rufus.

His disposition.

(4) The like emulation incited Odo, Bishoppe of Baieux (his vncle) against Lanfrank the Archbishop, who now ruled all, and had worn him out of fauour with the Conquerour his halfe-brother, whom hee taught the distinction of imprisoning Odo, as an Earle, not as a Bishop: now therefore seemed the time most fitting for a just reuenge: & albeit that Rufus brought him from Normandy, where he had beene captiuated, and restored him his honours & dignities in England; yet hee, vngratefull man, enuying that Lanfranck should goe before him, complotted the downefall aswell of the one, as of the other. And drawing into this conspiracy, Robert Earle of Mortaigne and Hereford his brother, with many other of the English Nobility, wrote his Letters into Normandy vnto his Nephew, hasting him to repayre into England, and recouer his right, which by his meanes hee promised should soone be effected.

Odo: emulation against Lanfrank.

(5) The busines thus wrought to Duke Roberts hand, and the English resorting daily into Normandy, assured his hopes of a happy successe, onely the hinderance was want of money, and that very much as the world then went with him, hauing euer borne himselfe no lesse then his birth, nor euer had made his bags his summum bonum. In these extreames, he well saw the lesse was to be followed, and to set a Dukedome at stake to cast at a Kingdome, he thought it ods sufficient, though the chance were doubtfull: Therefore to his younger brother Henry, who had store of Gold, and wanted Land, hee morgaged the Countie of Constantine, a Prouince in Normandy, and then sent to Odo, that hee should expect his landing on the West-coast of England by a day prefixed.

(6) The Bishop now growne bold vpon Duke Roberts great power, shewed himselfe the first in the Action; and fortifying Rochester, beganne to molest the peace of Kent, sending to his complices abroad to doe the like, which was not long in performing: for in the West, Robert de Mowbray Earle of Northumberland, assisted by Geffrey Bishoppe of Constance, sacked Bath, and Berkley, with a great part of Wilt-shire, and strongly fortified the Castle of Bristow against King William: In Norfolke, Roger Bygod, in Leicestershire Hugh Grentemeisnil did shrewdly waste those Countries: Roger Mountgomery Earle of Shrewsburie with his Welshmen, assisted by William Bishop of Durham (the Kings domesticall Chaplain) Barnard of Newmerch, Roger Lacie, and Ralph Mortimer (all of them Normans or French-men) with fire and sword past through the Country of Worcester: and surely, the stirres were so great, and Duke Robert so fauoured, that by the judgement of Gemeticensis, had hee hasted his arriuage, or followed the occasion, the Crowne of England had easily beene set vpon his head.

(7) All in an vprore, and Rufus thus turmoiled, he appointed his Nauie to scowre the seas, and to impeach his brothers arriuage: then gathering his forces, and knowing well how to please the vulgar, promiseth againe to abolish their ouer-hard lawes, & presently to put downe all vnjust Impostes and Taxations, whereby the People were soone drawne to stand in his defence; and among them Roger Mountgomery was reconciled to the King.

King William promiseth to mollifie his lawes.

Thus now growne strong, & his enemies decreased, hee led his Army into Kent, where the sedition first beganne; the Castles of Tunbridge and Horne he recouered, as likewise Pemsey, wherein his vncle Odo had strongly immured himselfe, whose lacke of victuall, by King Williams strait siege, allaied the pride of that great-hearted man; so that he not onely surrendred the same, but promised the deliuerie of Rochester also, strongly manned, with Eustace Earle of Boloigne, and a sort of other gallant Gentlemen, euen the flower of Normany and Flanders.

He waxeth strong.

(8) Odo comming to Rochester for the deliuery of the * Castle, according to his promise, was by them surprized, and laid in strait prison, whether in displeasure, or vnder colour, and with consent of Odo, I will not say; but certaine it is, that the King tooke the matter so to heart, that he sent forth his Proclamation through England, commaunding that euery man should repaire to that siege, whosoeuer would not be reputed a Niding, a word of such disgrace, and so distastiue vnto the English, that multitudes seemed rather to flie, then runne to that seruice; whereupon the Castle was surrendred, and Odo banished into Normandy, lost all his liuings and honours in England.

(9) Whilest these things were in acting betwixt King William and his Barons, Duke Robert with his Normans was landed at Southampton, hauing passed some conflict with the Kings ships at the sea: whom Rufus so feared (if mine Author say true) that he sent Messengers vnto him in most submisse maner, protesting that he tooke not the Crowne as his owne, by any right; but rather to supply the time in his absence: neither did hee account himselfe King, but as his substitute to hold the crown vnder him; yet seeing the matter had beene so farre passed, and the Emperiall Crowne set on his head; hee most humbly desired that it might so rest, proffering to pay him three thousand Markes by yeere, and to resigne it to him at his death: whereat Duke Robert shaking his head (belike he saw no other remedy) easily consented, and returned forthwith into Normandy.

Rufus pretendeth submissiueness to his brother. Polychr. lib. 7. c. 5.

(10) And, if wee compare this with the Monke of Saint Albans report, wee may well beleeue, that William was forward enough in his offers, though euer as vnready in performance; for the Barons then being vp, and he not able to allay them, did that by his word, which he could not by his sword, protesting to them that he was willing to resigne the Kingdom, and would be content either with Money or Possessions, if those that were his Fathers Ouer-seers should thinke it meete; and for any Ordinances touching the affaires of the Common-weale, he would referre it wholly to themselues, prouided alwaies his owne honour should not thereby be impeached. But when the Cloudes of these feares were altogether ouerblowne, no budde once appeared from these faire planted grafts.

Math. Paris. William Rufus, a cunning Time-seruer.

Faire words appease fooles, and often deceiue the wise.

(11) For Lanfranke deceased, and both King depriued of a politike director, and Common-wealth of a principall Statist, hee presently shewed the bent of his inclination, lauishly giuing where no deserts had engaged, and exacting extreame tributes, when no Necessitie required; alwaies couetous, yet neuer thriftie; and still gathering, yet neuer enriching his Coffers: All Ecclesiasticall promotions then vacant, he assumed into his owne hands, and kept the See of Canterbury without an Archbishoppe aboue foure yeeres, setting to sale the free-rights of the Church, and he that would giue most came soonest to preferment, whereby both the Lands and good esteeme of the Clergy was daily diminished.

(12) The Storme thus cleared without any thunder; King Rufus set the eye of desire vpon Duke Roberts dominions, who lately had done the like with his; and suddenly burst into Normandy, as Scipio did into Africke, pretending reuenge of injuries done to his Kingdome; first therefore surprizing the Castles of Saint Valery and Albemarle, he stored them with his owne Souldiers; then piercing forward did great spoile in the Countrie. Robert destitute of meanes and knowing his Normans euer vnfaithfull, sent to Philip the

(13) Peace thus establisshed, and both their powers vnited, they bent altogether against Henry their yongest brother, who fearing after-claps, had strongly fortified the Castle of Mount Saint-Michael, situated vpon the confines of Normandie and Britaine: him, whom they ought to haue prouided for, (saith Gemeticensis) they went about to expell, and all the Lent long laid siege against him.

Both brethren oppugne Henry the younger brother.

Will. Gemet.

It chanced one day as his men sallied out, & made a brauado in the face of their beleaguers; King William alone, more bolde then wise, rode against them, thinking none so hardy as to encounter him single; but presently a Knight slew his horse vnder him, & his foote entangled in the stirrupe hee was ouerthrowne; his enemy therefore with drawne sword, was ready to haue slaine him, had hee not reuealed himselfe by his voyce: the armed Men with great reuerence then tooke him vp, and brought him another horse; when the King not staying for the stirrup, sprang into the saddle, and with an angry countenan ce demanded, who it was that ouerthrew him? the Knight as boldly answered, and shewed himselfe who he was; By Lukes-face, quoth William (for that was his oath) thou shalt bee my Knight, and be enrolled in my Checke, with a Fee answerable to thy worth.

(14) During this siege, Prince Henry being sore distressed for water, and knowing Duke Robert to be of the milder temperature, sent him word of his want, desiring to haue that permitted, which God had made common, and giuen euen to brute beasts, aswell as to men; Duke Robert therefore commaunded him to be supplied, whereat William was wroth, telling his Brother he wanted discretion, and policy in warre, which allowed all aduantages to surprise the Enemy: And doest thou (said Robert) esteeme more of water, which is euery where to be got, then of a Brother, hauing no more but him and mee? In which dissension, Earle Henry got thence; and by policy tooke a very strong towne called Danford, where presently was a reconciliation made amongst these three Brethren, who thereupon forthwith tooke the Seas together for England.

(20) But the danger paſt, and health recouered, he beganne to be more ſicke in minde, ſoone repenting him of his too-ſoone Repentance: for as in ſpending his owne wealth, hee was very prodigall, ſo was he very diligent to enter into other mens eſtates, and to gaine from them what hee could, and therefore tampereth with Anſelme, perſwading him, that the trouble of the Archbiſhops place was very burthenous, eſpecially for a man wholly brought vp within the walles of a Monaſtery, deuoted to contemplation, and vnexperienced in the mannage of great affaires of State. But all this Art could not induce him to let goe his hold-faſt of the Kings abſolutely paſſed promiſe, nor yet to ſatisfie his great deſire with money, and therefore the King paid himſelfe out of his Lands. Likewiſe from Roger of Lincolne hee exacted fiue thouſand pounds; and the Commons hee fined for tranſgreſſion of his penall lawes; and in truth moleſted all for money: None were rich but Treaſurors and Collectors, none in fauour but vnconſcionable Lawyers, and none rewarded but Promoters: ſo that his ouer-haled ſubiects fled daily out of the Realme; againſt whom hee publiſhed Proclamations, with an inhibition that none ſhould depart without his ſafe Conduct.

(35) By which incredible pride and Popiſh incroachments, attempted by the meanes of theſe chiefeſt Prelates of the Kingdome, King William Rufus (no doubt) ſaw it was high time for him to preuent farther miſchiefes to his State, by following his Fathers ſteps in timely repreſſing ſuch Papall intruſions: yea ſo farre was he from yeelding his necke to that yoake, that hee auowed, that the Popes, though boaſting of Peters Chaire, had not from him any power of binding or looſing, whoſe godly ſteppes they wholly neglected, following onely after Lucre and worldly Honours: that alſo it was but impoſture to teach Interceſſion, and bootleſſe to vſe Inuocation to Saints, euen to Saint Peter himſelfe. And as for the reſt of the Romiſh Clergie, who then gaue themſelues ſtrangely to worldly and fleſhly pleaſures, wearing their guilt Girdles and Spurres, and trimming their buſhie Locks; their looſe liues the King much deteſted, and ſought to puniſh; which moſt incenſed their Choler: and theſe were the haires no doubt in thoſe Monkiſh writers Pennes, that euer blotted his faire name, vnder their faſt-running, and vneuen hands. For ſo much may we gather from Gemeticenſis, the Recorder of his life, who hauing reported many Acts of this Kings, ſeemeth laſtly to checke himſelfe for going ſo farre: where (he ſaith,) Theſe and many other like things wee could truly report of him, were it not we think it vnconuenient largely to relate his actions, becauſe hee perſecuted verie many of Gods ſeruants, and the holy Church not a little, for which it is thought by the moſt part of wiſemen, that he repented too late and vnprofitably.

Nothing, ſaid the Monke; for I entred my profeſſion to be poore, and hitherto haue beene, little eſteeming the pompe or riches of the World. Then thou art the man, (replied the King) and ſhalt be their Abbot, more worthy in thy pouertie, then they for their price; and ſo conferring on him that high honour, checked the others, to their open infamy and reproach.

His owne dreame, wherein it ſeemed the veynes of his Armes to be broken, and abundance of his bloud ſtreaming on the floore; as likewiſe that Monkes, who in his ſleepe ſaw the Crucifixe to ſpurne the King to the ground: theſe with many like, were held as preſages of his death, which preſently followed. Of all which, or the moſt part, what better cenſure can wee giue, then that which King William himſelfe (when this laſt viſion was told him) did deliuer; ſaying, Well, a Monke he is, and can dreame (Monachiluter) as Monkes vſe to doe, onely for to gaine. Giue him an hundred ſhillings, leſt he ſhould thinke he had dreamed booteleſſe.

(40) Whatſoeuer force thoſe preſages had, it is true, that vpon the ſecond day of Auguſt, as hee was hunting in the new-Forreſt, and in the place called Chorengham, all his Company being ſcattered from him; ſauing onely a French Knight; whoſe name was Walter Tirrell, the King with his arrow ſtrooke a Stag, which yet not greatly hurt ranne away; to marke therefore the courſe that it tooke, he held vp his hand betwixt his eye and the Sunne, when vnawares alſo Walter Tirrell ſo ſhot, that his Arrow glancing againſt a tree, ſtrooke the King in his breſt, who haſtily breaking off ſo much as ſtucke out of his body, with one onely groane fell downe and died. Of which ſudden chance, his followers ſoone vnderſtanding, moſt of them made away, but thoſe few which remained, laid his body (baſely God wot, but as neceſſity ſuffered) into a Colliers Cart, which drawne with one ſilly leane Beaſt, through a very foule and filthy way, the Cart broke, and there lay the ſpectacle of worldly glory, both pittifully goared, and filthily bemired, til afterward he was thence conuaied vnto Wincheſter, and buried vnder a plaine flat Marble-ſtone in the Quire of Saint Swithens, the Cathedrall Church of the City, whoſe bones were ſince taken vp, and laide into a Coffer, with the bones of Canutus. Hee died after hee had raigned twelue yeeres, eleuen moneths lacking eight daies, being the yeere of his age forty three, and of Chriſt Ieſus, 1100.

CHAPTER IIII.

An.D. 1100. Wil. Malmsbury. Iohn Rowſe. Annales S. Aug. Matth. Paris.

HEnry, the yongeſt ſonne of the Conqueror, and third King of his race, was born heere in England, and brought vp in Learning euen from his child-hood, whereby hee gained to himſelfe the high honour very rare in thoſe daies, eſpecially in Princes, to be, and to be ſtiled the Beauclerk: whoſe portion of Treaſure was not a little, giuen him by his father, neither any whit ſpared by himſelfe to purchaſe friends at the death of his brother, Henry* of Newburgh the right Noble, vertuous and learned Earle of Warwicke, euer making his way both with the Clergy and Nobles, who *refuſed to admit any King but with capitulation and couenants to their owne likings.

(2) The ſteps then by which hee mounted the Throne of Maieſty, were the diſlikes of Williams ouer-hard curbing of his Natiues, as he euer called the Engliſh, the raſh & giddy head of his brother Robert; his abſence in Syria, for whoſe returne to ſtay was dangerous, and whoſe election for King of Ieruſalem, was likely to imploy his perſon there ſtill: his Engliſh-birth, hauing both a King and Queene to his Parents; his faire promiſes for reformation of bad and rigorous Lawes, impoſed by his Father and Brother, the reſtoring of the Clergy from exile, and to their Church-Liuings; remiſſion of Taxes exacted on the Subjects; and due puniſhments of ſuch perſons as were the chiefe Cauſers thereof; in which behalfe to ſatisfie the People hee committed Ralphe Biſhop of Durham to the Tower. Then promiſing by Oath to frame juſt Lawes grounded on thoſe of Saint Edward (then which nothing was more deſired) did winde himſelfe ſo farre into the loues of all, that with a generall concurrence he was ſaluted King.

(4) His first businesse was to put in execution what he had promised; and because he might be thought vnfit to guide a large kingdome, who cannot reforme those who are euer at his elbow, began, (as a good Prince ought) with his owne Court and Household (as knowing that to be the paterne and warrant of others enormities) whence hee cashiered all Court-minions & nice or effeminate wantons, and enacting a decree against his Courtiers rapines, Adulteries and Robberies, punished their Thefts with * death, and Lechery with the losse of their Eies, and other parts peccant.

(5) Then he restor'd to the English the vse of lights, which his father forbad by the ringing of a Bell, and had now continued for the space of thirtie three yeeres, ordaining likewise many good Lawes, and common Liberties, exemplified at large in Matthew Paris, which summarily may be thus abridged.

King Edwards Lawes reuiued againe.

(6) To these his Ordinances he set his Name and Seale, with the subscription of sundry Peeres, commanding as many Copies as there were Counties in England to be transcribed and kept in the Monasteries of euery Prouince. Then did hee recall Anselme Archbishop of Canterbury forced out of the Land by Rufus, and bestowed all vacant Church-liuings vpon the worthiest persons. But to ground his new planted affection more deepe in the hearts of the English, hee became a suter to Edgar King of Scotland, to haue his sister to wife, which was Maude the daughter of Queen Margaret, Sister to Edgar Atheling, and Grandchilde of Edmund Ironside, whereby his issue might meerely be both of the English bloud, and of the ancient English Kings.

(7) Shee by report of some Writers had vowed Virginity, and was brought vp in a house of Religion at Westminster, (hauing entred the profession of a Nunne vnder her Aunt Christian) whose sanctity and knowledge both in matters humane and diuine, with her mother Margarets, are highly commended (saith Gemeticensis) in a book written of their liues: notwithstanding others hold that she vailed her selfe but for a shift, to put off some vnworthy matches, which her father Malcolme would haue imposed her; and indeed this scruple was such a core in Anselm his mouth, that he would not pronounce the words of Contract vntill her selfe had cleared the doubt by her open confession.

(8) Duke Robert, who now had bin fiue yeres in the holy warres, and therin borne himselfe with such valour, that he of all the Christian Princes was thought the worthiest to bee annointed King of Ierusalem, had their voice and election, standing in the Temple before the Altar, vpon Easter-Eue: and that the rather by a miracle of his Taper, which tooke light of it selfe, or from Heauen (if wee will be so light to beleeue it:) but he hearing of the death of Rufus, refused that in hope to haue England; for which his neglect of Diuine appointment, it is said God neuer after prospered him: Then returning from Syria into Normandy, was there ioifully receiued, and assumed again his Dukedome (which he had engaged to his brother William) without repaiment of any mony: where hearing that Henry his younger, was stept into his throne of England, laide projects in his minde how to defeate him. And to further these his designes, Ralphe Bishop of Durham, corrupting his keepers, brake out of the Tower of London, & gat into Normandy, where he instigated Duke Robert against his brother of England; others also delighting in alterations, solicited Robert to make into England, with promise of their assistance to recouer the Crowne.

(9) King Henry for his part resoluing to hold what he had got, neglected no meanes to keepe the Diadem as it was set, and therefore rigged forth his Nauie to secure the Seas, manned his Fortresses, and with a great Army repaired towards the coast, where neere vnto Hastings hee lodged his Campe, relying more vpon his owne strength and valour of his People, then any just title he had to the Kingdome.

King Henry strengthneth himselfe against Duke Robert.

(10) Duke Robert by this time had taken the Seas, and was vpon the Kings fleete before they were aware, where preparing for Conflict, the most of the English fell to the Normans, either by the perswasion of the Duke, or in hatred of Henry, that then began to tyrannize ouer them, as they did imagine: By which meanes the Duke, had safe-landing at Portesmouth, and did not a little reioice in this his fortunate beginning; threatning his brother to be reuenged for his wrongs & blaming the Nobility for suffering him thus to be abused, whilest he for the common good of Christendome, was imployed in the Holy-Lands warre. King Henry, as wise, as the other was valorous, wrought vnder-hand for an agreement of peace; for hee very well saw, that the euent of warre hath commonly issue from the first successe, and at one and the same time doth bolden and weaken the courage of the multitude; therefore certaine Noble-men on both sides so trauised the businesses, that the Brethren in short time became friends, and a composition made to both their contents. The agreement was thus, that, because Henry was borne after his fathers Conquest of this Land, and stood now the Crowned King with common consent, hee should during his life, enioy the same, paying Duke Robert in way of fealty three thousand Markes by yeere: and the suruiuour to be heire to his brother deceased, if hee died without a sonne. In which it was also concluded, that all, either English or Normans, which had taken part with the King or Duke, should be pardoned of all offences, and their Liuings againe restored: for the Confirmation whereof, and the performance accordingly, twelue Princes vpon either parties took their Corporall Oathes; and the Armies presently dissolued.

But the Sunne-ſhine of theſe faire daies, began forthwith to be ouer-caſt, by the incitation of ſuch as endeuoured to ſow diſcord betwixt the two Brethren: and not onely thoſe in Normandy, which euer buz'd jealouſies into Duke Roberts eares, but euen in England alſo, ſome fell in diſlike of King Henry, and affecting alteration, with the malignant eye of enuy beheld the glory of his beauteous Crowne.

(13) Neither were thoſe men buſier to raiſe ſtirres abroad, then was Archbiſhop Anſelmus to doe it at home; who being a man of a ſtiffe reſolution, in a Councell holden at London, drew on him the offence both of the King and Clergie: for therein, firſt, he excommunicated all married Prieſts, * halfe the Clergie of England at that time, being either maried or the ſons of married Prieſts; next he inhibited all lay-men to heare their maſſes. (23) Robert Curtuoiſe, that now vnfortunate Prince, and William Mortaigne, that valiant, but headſtrong Earle, were forthwith ſent into England and impriſoned; the Earle in the Tower of London, and the Duke in Cardiffe Caſtle in Wales, after hee had gouerned the Dutchy of Normandy ninteene yeeres; and was for eſteeme in Chiualrie accounted among the beſt Captains that the world then afforded, had hee not beene (as commonly martiall ſpirits vſe to be) too raſh and vnſtaied in his other enterpriſes; which headineſſe did now draw vpon him a penance of twenty ſixe yeeres continuance, in the afflicted ſtate of a forlorne Captiue. And Henry now no longer as a brother, receiuing the keyes of Normandy, as a Conquerour returned into England.

For the next yeere following, and twentieth of his raigne, Lewis came into Normandy as hot in rage to doe ſomewhat, as before he departed thence calme and cold; where forthwith he began to moleſt the Country; which K. Henry for a while ſuffered, till his friends noted him of cowardize; to "whom he replied; that he had learned of his Father, to "break the foole-hardines of the French, by patience, ra-"ther then by force: that they ſhould not wonder, if he "were loath to bee prodigall of their bloud, whom "he found ſo faſt friends vnto him: that hee would "not gladly winne a Kingdome with their deaths, "whoſe liues hee ſtill found deuoted to all hazards "for his cauſe: that hee vſed this backwardneſſe, "onely to ſtay them whom he ſaw ſo forward to te-"ſtifie their zeale voluntarily; euen with their bloud: "which to proceed from prouidence, and not from "daſtardlineſſe, they ſhould ſoone perceiue. But at this meeting the King was so liberall of rich gifts to the Pope and his Cardinals, that therefore the Pope (saith a Monke) held him a most wise and eloquent perswader, and his actions very iustifiable: But it seemeth the Cardinals were neither so eloquent nor learned as they should be, for that (saith hee) two youths in the Kings Company, Sonnes of the Earle of Mellent (learned both, and therefore fit to bee with that learned King) reasoning of some points with them, and disputing Scholler-like with Logicall Syllogismes, the Grand Rabbies (vsed to other exercises at Rome, then studying) were quite gauelled, & had nought to say, but that more learning was in these Westerne parts, then they had thought. But as these Church-stirres did not a little disquiet the King, so also did new Welsh tumults, raised by Meredith ap Blethyn, who with the three sonnes of Cadogin, Eneon, Madoc, and Morgan, sore troubled the Kings people and peace, by breaking into the Marches, and especially into Cheshire, where they burned two Castles. The King therefore making towards them, had sent his maine Armie to conduct the Carriages, whilst himselfe with a small Company tooke a neerer way through the Mountaines and Straites; which being fore-laid by the Enemy, was with great courage set vpon, and through the aduantage of the place, many of his men slaine, and more hurt by the Welsh Archers, whose showers of Arrowes rained thicke vpon them from the higher ground: amongst which, one was so levelled at the King, that it strucke him on the breast, yet being surely armed, did him no hurt; but hee therewithall wonderfully dismaied, and by likelihood fearing some treason amongst his owne, (for, then hee swore by our Lords death, his vsuall oath, that no Welshman shot that Arrow, but one of his owne Prouincials) and considering that by these his ouer-rash proceedings his glory purchased in more famous parts, might againe be lost in this wilde and rude Country; came to a Parley and Peace; receiuing of the King a thousand head of Cattle, and leauing Lord Fitzwarren Lieutenant of the Marches, returned to England, where hee held three Parliaments in the same yere, one at Norwich, another at Northampton, and the third at London.

The chiefe in this action was Robert Earle of Mellent, who was lately fallen off from the King: Henry therefore hasting into Normandy, besieged his Castle Pont-Audomar, and tooke it, and at that time built a large and high wall with many Bulwarkes about the Tower of Roan, repaired the Castles of Caen, Arches, Gisors, Faleise, Argenton, Damfort, Vernon, Ambres, and sundry others.

(46) In this the Kings absence, but yet with his licence, Iohannes Cremensis the Popes holy Cardinal, came into England, sent by Honorius the Second, there to redresse the still continued sinne-seeming abuse of the Clergy, in retaining and vsing, according to Gods owne Ordinance, the Society of their wiues. This Pontificall Prelate was entertained by all the Bishops and Abbots with great and costly Presents, and afterward being solemnely set in a Councell at London, vpon the birth-day of the Blessed Virgine, made a solemne Oration in praise of Virginitie and Chastity, with a terrible inuectiue against the maried Priests: and to amplifie their sinnes the more, he shewed what extreame impiety it was, to rise from the bedde of vnlawfull lust, (for so was their chaste Marriage termed) and with polluted hands to touch the Sacrament of the body of Christ: but the same night following he * hauing that very day consecrated that holy Sacrament, was himself taken with a Whore, the matter being so apparant, that it could not bee hid, (neither ought it to be silenced, saith Huntingdon) to the great reproach of those most vnchaste boasters of Chastitie, as both Paris and Higden themselues doe confesse: and so hee returned to Rome with shame enough, but with little successe in that intended businesse: till some few yeeres after * King Henry, seeming very desirous to settle his pretenced continency in the Cleargy; in a Councell held at London, obtained (through simplicity of the Archbishop of Canterbury, saith Paris, that himselfe should haue the execution of iustice & punishments of the Priests, that offended either in keeping of their wiues, or vsing of Concubines, (for likely those that liked not the one, loued the other, as An.D. 1126. Emperour Henry (the Kings ſonne in law) dieth.

(47) Whileſt King Henry about his ſaid affaires lay in Normandy, newes was brought him that Henry the Emperor, his ſonne in law, was dead; whereupon hee preſently ſent for his Daughter the Empreſſe; and with her he returned into England, where calling a Parliament, in the preſence of himſelfe, and of Dauid King of Scotland, hee cauſed the Nobles, (and firſt before all other, Stephen his Sifters Sonne who firſt did violate it,) to ſweare fealty to her, as to his lawfull, and now onely heire, by whom they ſhould againe come to bee gouerned by the ancient Engliſh Royall bloud, from which hee ſhewed her to be deſcended: which Oath was this, that they ſhould, as much as in them lay, after King Henries deceaſe, (if he died without Heire-Male) eſtabliſh her Queene of the Monarchy of Great Britaine, now called England. *But whether they did or no: (*ſaith Gemeticenſis) belongs not to me to tell: but this our Story ſhall hereafter relate, and make knowne.

The Empreſſe comes into England.

The Peeres ſweare fealty to Empreſſe Dowger the Kings daughter. Malmſ. Nouel. lib. 1. Hunting. lib. 8.

(48) Giraldus and Higden, and ſome ancient Manuſcripts affirme (but with very little probabilitie or credit) that Henry the Emperour died not at this time (as was giuen forth;) but that rather vpon a remorſe of conſcience, for impriſoning his owne naturall Father, Henry the third vnto death; and alſo his Spirituall Father the Pope, with his Cardinals; repenting theſe outrages, hee laid aſide his Imperiall Roabe, and ſecretly fledde into England, where at WeſtcheHer, hee became an Hermite, changing his name vnto * Godſtall, where he ſo liued the ſpace of ten yeeres, and was buried in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Werburga the Virgine. Vpon which his ſuddaine flight and miſſing, the Empreſſe Maud * ſome ſay, was ſuſpected to bee guilty of his death, and for that cauſe was kept continually in the Queenes Chamber. Indeed, that ſhee abode ſtill in Chamber with the Queene, Paris records; but hee giues a wiſer reaſon thereof, for that her Father did loue her exceedingly, as being now his ſole Heire; and where ſhould an Empreſſe rather liue then with a Queene? a Daughter, then with her Mother? a faire Lady, a Widow, and an Heire of ſo great a Kingdom, then where her perſon might bee ſafeſt from danger, her minde from inueigling, and her carriage from ſuſpition? But as for that other idle coniecture, it is razed out, both by thoſe Writers, who record his Buriall, and Monument at Spire, (as * Higden himſelfe ſignifieth) and alſo by the pen of William Gemeticenſis, who reporteth her to bee a woman generally well thought of, and approued among the greateſt Princes of the Empire, for her prudent and gratious behauiour towards the Emperour her husband; inſomuch that they became ſuters vnto her, ſeeking by all meanes to attaine her to gouerne them, and to that end attended her to King Henry in Normandy to ſolicite the ſame; to whom in no wiſe hee would giue his conſent, meaning to make her his Succeſſor in the Kingdome: Whereunto Malmsbury (who then liued) accordeth; ſaying, ſhee was very vnwilling to haue come out of thoſe parts of the Empire, where both her dowry and acquaintance lay, and that the Princes of thoſe Countries came more then once into England, to haue her for their Empreſſe, but that the King would not part with the Heire of his Crowne.

(53 Were it not reported by ſome Writers of note, I might heere well paſſe ouer certaine preſaging dreames (as the Monkes interpreted them) which King Henry had, being ready now to goe into Normandy: for to his ſeeming he ſaw a ſort of ruſticke plough-men with their Inſtruments of husbandry; after them Souldiers with their weapons of Warre; and laſtly, the Biſhops with their Croſier ſtaues, all of them angerly threatning, and attempting his death: wherewith hee was ſo perplexed, that leaping out of his bed, hee called for helpe; but ſeeing it but a dreame, as a dreame hee eſteemed it, and paſſed ouer into Normandy: where long hee ſtaid not, but that his Daughter Maud, vpon ſome diſpleaſure, departed from her husband, and came with her Father into England. Some write that ſhe was the prouoker of certain diſpleaſures betwixt her Husband and Father, which ſo affected his minde with paſſions of wrath and griefe, that many thought it was a great haſtning of his end; and indeed Malmsburie witneſſeth, that the King vpon his death-bedde paſſionately mentioned the wrongs and indignities wherewith her husband had diſquieted his mind. Howbeit ſoone after this her departure from him, by conſent of the States, who met at Northampton; ſhee was reconciled to her Husband; ſent vnto him vpon his intreaty, and bare him a ſonne, whoſe name was Henry; for ioy whereof, King Henry aſſembled his Lords, and againe made his ſaid Daughter, and the lawfull Heires of her body his Succeſſors in his Dominions.

Maud. (63) Maud, the daughter of King Henry, and of Queene Maud his firſt wife, was borne the fourth yeere of her Fathers raigne. She was the ſecond wife of the Emperour Henrie the fourth, eſpouſed at ſixe yeeres of age, and at eleuen with great ſolemnitie was married and crowned his Empreſſe at Mentz in Germany, 6. Ianuary, Anno 1114. the ninth of her husbands, and foureteenth of her Fathers Raignes. His Naturall Iſſue.

Robert. (66) Robert, the naturall ſonne of King Henry, was Earle of Glouceſter, and married Mabil daughter and heire of Robert Fitz-hammon Lord of Glamorgan, by whom hee had iſſue William Earle of Glouceſter, Richard Biſhop of Bayon, Roger Biſhop of Worceſter, and Maud the wife of Randolph Gernon, the mother of Hugh Keueliot Earle of Cheſter, and Richard his brother: Earle William married Auis daughter of Robert Boſſu Earle of Leiceſter, and had iſſue three daughters and heires of that Earledome, which by Auis the ſecond of them, in the end deſcended to Clare Earle of Hertford. This Earle Robert died the laſt of October, in the twelfth yeere of King Stephen, and was buried at Briſtow in the Church of S. Iames, which hee had founded, and his body laide in the midſt of the Quire; vnto him William Malmsbury dedicated his Booke called Hiſtoria Nouella.

Richard. (67) Richard, another natural ſonne of King Henry, was as it ſeemeth by an ancient Regiſter of the Monaſtery at Abington, born in the raigne of King William Rufus, of the widow of Anskill, a Nobleman of the Country adioyning to the ſaid Monaſtery; and it ſeemeth he is that Richard that was drowned in the Norman Seas, neere Barbfleet, among the reſt of King Henries children.

Raynold. (68) Raynold, the naturall ſonne of King Henry, was borne of a daughter vnto Sir Robert Corbet, Lord of Alceſter in Warwickſhire, by the gift of the King in fauour of her, who was after married to Henry Fitz-herbert his Chamberlaine. This Raynold was created Earle of Cornwall, and Baron of Caſtle-comb, with conſent of King Stephen, and had iſſue foure Daughters; of whom haue ſprung many faire branches.

Robert. (69) Robert, another of that name; was borne of Eduth, the ſiſter of Iue, ſonne and daughter of Forne, the ſonne of Sigewolfe, both of them great Barons in the North: which Eduth afterwards King Henry gaue in marriage to Robert Doilie, Baron of Hook-Norton in Oxford-ſhire; and with her gaue him the Mannor of Eleydon, in the County of Buckingham, by whom hee had iſſue Henry Doylie Baron of Hook-Norton, who oftentimes mentioneth this Robert in his Charters, euer calling him Robert his brother the Kings ſonne.

Gilbert. (70) Gilbert, another naturall ſonne of King Henry, is named in the additions to the ſtory of William Gemeticenſis the Norman Monke, in the Chronicle of that country, written by Iohn Taylor, being a Tranſlator of that worke out of Latine into French, and laſtly, in the Treaties betwixt England and France, written in the French tongue by Iohn Tillet, Secretarie to their late King Henrie the ſecond, and yet in them, not any other mention is made, but onely of his name.

William. (71) William, alſo a naturall ſonne of Henry the King, had giuen vnto him the Towne of Tracie, in Normandy; of which he tooke his ſurname, and was called William of Tracie: But whether hee were the Progenitor of the Tracies, ſometime Barons in Deuonſhire, or of them that now be of the ſame ſurname; or whether Sir William Tracie, one of the foure Knights that ſlew Thomas Becket Archbiſhop of Canterburie, were any of his poſterity, is not certainely reported: nor any thing elſe of him, more then that hee died a little after his Father, which was in the yeere of Chriſt, 1135.

Henry. (72) Henry, another naturall ſonne of King Henry, was borne of the Lady Neſta, daughter of Rees ap Tewdor Prince of South-Wales, who was the Wife of Sir Gerald Windſor, and of Stephen, Conſtables of the Caſtles of Pembrooke, and Abertiuie in Wales, and Progenitors of the Families of the Fitz-geralds, and the Fitz-Stephens in Ireland; hee was borne and breed, and liued, and married in Wales, hauing iſſue two ſonnes, namely, Meiler and Robert, of which, Meiler the elder married the daughter of Hugh Lacie, Lord of Methe in Ireland; hee was at the conflict in the Ile of Angleſey, betweene Magnus the ſonne of Harold Harfager, King of Norway, and Hugh of Mountgomery, Earle of Arundell and Shrewsbury, wherein hee was ſlaine, as ſome ſay, with the ſaid Earle, Anno 1197.

Maud. (73) Maud, the Naturall daughter of King Henry, was Counteſſe of Perche, and the firſt Wife of Earle Rotroke, the firſt of that name, ſon of Arnolfe de Heſding, the firſt Earle of that County: Shee had iſſue by him one onely daughter, named Magdalen, wife to Garcy the fourth King of Nauarre, mother of King Sanches, ſurnamed the wiſe, from whom all the Kings of Nauarre are deſcended: Shee died vpon Friday the twenty ſixth of Nouember, in the twentith of her Fathers raigne and yeere of Grace 1120. being drowned in the Sea with her brother Duke William.

Maud. (74) Maud, another of that name, and naturall daughter of King Henrie, was married to Conan the firſt of that name, ſurnamed the Groſſe, Earle of little Britaine in France, ſonne of Earle Alan by Ermengard his ſecond wife; by Alan ſhee had iſſue Howell, pronounced illegitimate, and diſherited by his ſuppoſed father Conſtance, that died without iſſue; and Bertha the wife of Eudes Earle of Porrohet, mother of Earle Conan the yonger, who by Margaret ſiſter of William King of Scots, had iſſue Conſtance, maried to Geffrey ſonne of King Henry the ſecond.

Iulian. (75) Iulian likewiſe, an other naturall daughter of King Henry, was married to Euſtace the illegitimate ſonne of William Lord of Breteuil in Normandy, who was the ſonne and heire of William Fitz-Osborn, and elder brother of Roger, both Earles of Hereford in England, and this Eustace had hee beene lawfully borne in wedlocke, had beene heire to the Earledoms of Hereford and Iuerie : notwithstanding he had as small a part in that inheritance of the Towne of Pacie from which he tooke his surname, being commonly called Eustace of Pacy, and had issue by this Iulian his wife, William and Roger of Pacy his sonnes.

(76) A naturall daughter of King Henry recounted by the continuer of the History of William Gemeticensis, and by Iohn Tillet his follower, is reported by them to haue beene married to one William Goet a Norman; but in neither of these writers is any mention made of her name, or of his estate, issue, or other relation.

(77) Another naturall daughter of King Henrie is without name, recited by the said Authors, and by them reported to be married to the Vicount of Beaumont, which is a Towne within the Countie of Maygne. Shee had issue by him, as Roger of Houeden writeth, Richard Vicount Beaumont, Father of Queene Ermengard the wife of King William of Scotland: and Robert the Abbot of Mount-Saint Michael mentioneth another of her sons, named Ralphe, who (as he saith) was Bishop of Angiers.

(78) Another naturall daughter also of King Henry is recited by the Normane and French writers before auouched, and reported by them to be married to Mathew of Montmorancy, the sonne of Bouchard of Mountmorancy, from whom perhaps descended the House of Mountmorancy, who after came to be Earles and Dukes, being growne to bee one of the greatest houses in France, next to the Princes of the bloud, for possessions, alliances, and honour.

(79) Elizabeth the last naturall daughter of King Henry recounted by the former Authors, was vnmarried in the time of the one, and her husband vnknowne to the other; but both of them agree, that she was born of Elizabeth the sister of Walleran Earle of Meulan, who was sister also of Robert Bossue Earle of Leicester, wife of Gilbert Earle of Pembrooke, and mother of Earle Richard Strangbow, the Conquerour of Ireland. Elizabeth.

CHAPTER V.

An.D.1135.

King Henries Iſſue defeated of the Crowne by Stephen.

THough the Empreſſe Maud had fealty ſworne vnto her in the life time of her Father: and again both her ſelfe, and iſſue ordained to be his ſucceſſors in Englands Throne, as hath beene ſaid; yet ſo powerfull is Ambition, where the Obiect is a Diademe, and ſo weake are all aſſurances which are built on the wauering Multitude, that King Henries prouidence, was ſoone defeated, and with his death all fealties reuerſed, and that by him onely who had * contended to bee the formoſt of the Laitie in taking that oath, euen Stephen Earle of Mortaine and Bolloine; a man whoſe deſcent was very Noble, being the third ſonne of Stephen Earle of Bloys and Champaigne, who was the ſonne of Earle Eudes, and he of Earle Theobald, the ſonne of Gerlon the Dane, the companion of Rollo Duke of Normandy; his mother was * Adelicia the third daughter of William the Conqueror by Queen Maud his wife: And himſelfe was aduanced to be Earle of Mortaigne by King Henry his vncle, whoſe Crown he now endeauoured to vſurpe, being otherwiſe for his many princely parts, worthy to weild a Scepter, if his claime thereto had beene iuſt and warrantable.

And to helpe forward thoſe audacious beginnings, Roger Biſhoppe of Salisbury, the late Kings Treaſurer, proteſted (Malmsbury, who reports it, himſelfe heard it from him) that they were free from the oath made to the Empreſſe; for that without conſent of the Barons ſhe had married out of the realme; but that which wrought moſt, was the teſtimony of Hugh Bigot, * Seneſcall vnto King Henry departed, who comming ouer with Stephen, tooke his corporall oath, that the King on his death-bed, vpon ſome offence taken againſt his daughter Maude, diſinherited her, and appointed this Stephen, his nephew, to be his ſucceſſour. Theſe colourable inſtigations ſo moued the * too-credulous Archbiſhop and the Peeres, that they all ſwore fealty vnto him, and became his Liege-men.

(3) His firſt landing in England, (being at Whitſand-bay) by a tempeſt of thunder ſo wonderfull and terrible, that the people thought verily the end of all was at hand, did prognoſticke the ſtorms of troubles which his perjurie brought with him; for euen then both Douer & Canterbury fortified themſelues againſt him, though London gaue better leaue to his entrance, whoſe Perſon and preſence drew euer the affections of the beholder, being in all parts compleate with natures endowments, of perſonage paſſing comely, of diſpoſition louing, cheerefull, and affable to the meaneſt, alwaies very liberall; but now eſpecially, knowing his Purſe the beſt Lawyer to plead for his Title; and in Martiall proweſſe gaue place to none of that time, wherein, though his whole raigne was continually ſpent, yet (by reaſon of King Henries great Treaſure left) neuer burthened hee the Commons with any exactions, a thing that euer gaineth the loue of the common ſort: neither is he taxed with any other obſeruable crime, ſaue onely his perjurie againſt the Empreſſe Dowager, and her ſonne.

(4) Hee entred his gouernement the yeare of Chriſt Ieſus, 1135. the ſecond day of December, and was crowned at Weſtminſter the twenty ſixt of the ſame Moneth, being Saint Stephens day, by William Corbell Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who with the reſt of the Prelates doing him homage, and knowing now hee would yeeld to any conditions (for performance whereof his * Brother of Wincheſter did there engage himſelfe for a pledge) they all tooke their oath of allegiance, conditionally, (traiterouſly, I might ſay) to obey him as their King, ſo long as he ſhould preſerue their Church-Liberties, and the vigour of Diſcipline: And that the Lay-Barons made vſe alſo of this policie, appeareth by Robert Earle of Glouceſter, who ſware to be true Liege-man to the King, as long as the King would preſerue to him his dignities, and keepe all Couenants, whereupon the King promiſed for the preſent, that he would ſpeedily reforme the ouer-hard Lawes of his Predeceſſors, and mollifie the extreames thereof, to their owne likings, vnder his Seale and Charter: and ſo thence haſtening to meete the Corps of his deceaſed Vncle, (which was now brought into England) he honoured that pompous funerall, with his owne, and all his great Prelates and Peeres attendance at Reading; whence preſently hee went to Oxford, where he ſealed his fore-promiſed Charter, of many indulgent fauours: * prefacing therein, that hee attained the Crowne by Election onely; and that Pope Innocentius confirmed the ſame; whereby may bee conceiued, that his Holineſſe, either out of hatred to the Empreſſe, (whoſe husband * Henry was no friend to the Papacie) or for ſome other holy ends, had no ſmall hand in aduauncing Stephens perjured and diſloyall intruſion. The Tenour of the * Charter it ſelfe is; That all Liberties, Cuſtomes, and Poſſeſſions, graunted to the Church, ſhould be firme and in force; that all Perſons and Cauſes Eccleſiaſticall ſhould appertaine onely to Eccleſiaſticall Iudicature: that none but Clergy-men ſhould euer intermeddle with the vacancies of Churches, or any Church-mens goods; that all bad vſages in the Land touching forreſts, exactions, &c. ſhould be vtterly extirpate; the ancient Lawes reſtored, &c. As Stephen well knew, that they had choſen him their King, onely to make their vſes of him, ſo theſe immunities he granted, rather to bleare their Eies, then * with any purpoſe to manacle his owne hands with ſuch Parchment-Chaines.

But in Wales the buſineſſe proſpered not ſo well, where at Cardigan a great battell was fought, with ſuch ſlaughter and ouer-bearing of the Engliſh, that the men, by women, were taken and led away Captiue, and ſo many drowned by the fall of a Bridge ouer Temd, that a paſſage was made ouer the water with the dead Carkaſes therein heaped.

Hee therefore conſenting, inuaded the Borders, and tooke from the Engliſh both Carleile and New caſtle, which he ſtuffed with Garriſons. Againſt theſe, King Stephen prepared, and with a great power came into thoſe parts, where diuers accidents by diuers reporters are related, yet all agree that ere-long peace was concluded, Carleile ſtill enioyed by King Dauid, and the Earledome of Huntingdon by Prince Henry his ſonne; for which he did homage at his fathers commaund, Dauid himſelfe refuſing ſo to doe, (as Hector Boetius the Scotiſh Writer affirmeth) for that he had giuen his faith before vnto Maud the Empreſſe.

This good ſucceſſe thus fortunately begunne, hee hoped further to proſecute, by meanes of a League, which hee lately had made with Lewis the ſeuenth, King of France: and hereupon created Euſtace his eldeſt ſon liuing, Duke of Normandie, commanding him to do his homage for the ſame to Lewis.

(11) Hauing thus at once ſwept the two greateſt rubbes out of his fortunes way, hee well hoped that all cloudes of diſpleaſure, and oppoſition, were now ouer-blowne, when vnexpectedly newes came, that England was in tumults, the ſparkes of conſpiracie kindled ſecretly before in the hearts of factious Peers, now openly breaking forth, vpon aduantage of his abſence in Normandy: therefore, hauing not altogether compoſed his buſines in thoſe parts, he tooke ſhip for England in the depth of the winter; and euen in the Vigill of Chriſts Natiuitie, beſieged, and after tooke the Caſtle of Bedford, that was manned againſt him in the behalfe of the Scots; about which time Dauid their King hauing entred Northumberland in the quarrell of Queene Maude, the ruder ſort of his Armie (as commonly the beſt gouerned is not emptie of ſuch) reuenged too tragically the wrongs of the Empreſſe, in ripping vp the wombes of women with childe, and toſſing their Infants vpon the points of their ſpeares, ſlaying the Prieſts at the Altar, and diſmembring the ſlaine bodies in moſt vnhumane manner.

(12) Againſt theſe, King Stephen made haſtilie forward, affirming it no policie, to giue one houres reſt vnto the Enemie: and threatning more then hee accompliſhed, entred Scotland; whence after ſome ſmall reuenge wrought, hee was haſtily recalled; ſo many of his Nobles in England now in Armes againſt him, that hee was in a ſort beſet on euery ſide. And what other could hee, a Vſurper, expect from them, but Treaſon, whom himſelfe had formerly taught to be Traitors to their rightfull Soueraigne? But yet (as no Rebellion was euer without pretence of Reaſon and Iuſtice) they alledged, that hee had * violated his Oath touching their Forreſts, and other Immunities of Church and Common-wealth: but Church and Common-wealth were but publike colours for priuate grudges, (as Malmesburie, who then liued, well vnfouldeth,) which the Great-Ones conceiued againſt their King, becauſe he would not grant them ſuch Caſtles, Commands, and Lordſhips, as themſelues liked and expected of him, whom they thought to be ſo obliged vnto them, that he ought denie them nothing. The endleſſe and ſhameleſſe importunities of theſe men, ſometimes hee put off, alleadging thereby, the impaire of his Crownes reuenewes; ſometimes hee was faine to ſatisfie, diſtruſting their falling from him: whoſe loialty notwithſtanding beeing built on ſo vn-noble grounds, was but coloured, and therefore could not long be permanent. Neither was it. For Robert of Gloceſter (the Empreſſes halfe-brother, and now her chiefe Counſellor and Captaine) finding thoſe particular diſlikes apt to be wrought on, and made ſeruiceable for a common behoofe; whetted on with the touch of conſcience, and counſells of religious learned men, (who vrged him, with the hazard both of his credit, and ſoule, for neglect of his firſt, and only-lawful Oath to the Empreſſe) ſent threatning meſſages vnto King Stephen, charging him with his Oath of Allegiance vnto Ladie Maude his Soueraigne, againſt whom hee had ſhewed himſelfe a moſt perfidious man, and had impiouſly drawne him, with others, to doe the like; and ſo denouncing Stephen an open Enemie to the State, and himſelfe vnto Stephen, made ſtrong his faction with the aſſiſtance of many Nobles; among whom, Milo, a chiefe man of warre, and High Conſtable to King Stephen, reuolted from him, and became a great helpe to their proceedings.

One freſh motiue to theſe Noble-mens diſcontents was the Kings * ſeizing on ſome great men and their lands, on bare ſuſpition of their loyaltie; and on the other ſide, the extraordinarie fauour, which Stephen ſhewed to William de Ypre, and his Flemings (which they interpreted as a contempt of themſelues and their Nation) whoſe counſells he generally followed, and chiefly relyed vpon: In diſdaine whereof, they ſent word to the Empreſſe, that within fiue Moneths, ſhee ſhould haue the Realme at commaund, according to their Oathes made to her Father.

(17) To make all ſure as he went, Stephen thought it good to demoliſh and race thoſe Caſtles lately built, (hauing had experience to what troubles they had brought him) and to preuent the building of new; and namely, that of the Diuiſe, now (as he ſurmiſed) in fortifying againſt him: hee therefore ſent for Roger Biſhop of Salisbury (the Founder both of that Caſtle, as alſo thoſe other of Sherborn & Malmſbury) a man who in a bad cauſe had ſtood King Stephen in good ſtead, howſoeuer ſome enuying his greatneſſe, had incenſed the King againſt him and other Prelates, as if they were fallen from his ſide. The Biſhop ſtanding peremptorily on his innocencie, yet miſtruſting the euent, craued the company of Alexander Biſhop of Lincolne, and of Nigell Biſhop of Ely; ſo with a great and well-appointed traine, repaired to Oxford vnto the Court, where Stephen had ſummoned a Grand-Councell of the States.

(18) The King, who expected of Church-men humility, ſeeing them now armed as men for the field, commaunded his attendants to take armour likewiſe, and ſo entring communication of diuers matters with his Peeres and Prelates, their Souldiers caſually meeting, fell at variance, where the Biſhops friends had the worſe, ſo that many of them were wounded, and the reſt forſaking their maſters ranne away. This great aſſembly thus diſturbed, the King required the Biſhops to ſatisfie his Court for theſe outrages of their ſeruants, which ſatisfaction ſhould be, to deliuer the keyes of all their Caſtles to the King, as pledges of their fidelity, which they refuſing, the Biſhops of Salisbury and Lincolne were laid hold of; but Ely eſcaped to the Caſtle of Diuiſe: Alexander was impriſoned, till hee had yeelded him his Caſtles of New-warke, and * Slaford; Roger the Caſtles of Sherborne, and the Diuiſes (accounted then one of the goodlieſt Caſtles of Europe) beſides fortie thouſand Markes in ſiluer; (which loſſes the Biſhop did not long ſuruiue.) The King imployed the money to purchaſe Lady Conſtance, ſiſter to Lewis King of France, to be wife vnto his ſonne Euſtace: all which was to ſtrengthen himſelfe againſt the Empreſſe Maud, whoſe comming hee continually feared, and now before his expectation ſhee was landed in England, at a fit time for her deſignes, when all the great Prelates, (who formerly were his chiefeſt friends) were highly incenſed againſt the King for ſuch oppreſſion of their Brethren.

(19) The place of her arriuage was at the * Port of Arundell, into which Caſtle ſhee was joyfully receiued by William de Albeny, who had married Queen Adeliza, the late wife to King Henry, whoſe Dowrie it was; from hence Earle Robert diuerting his courſe onely with tenne Horſe-men, and as many Archers, (for in all hee brought ouer but one hundred and forty with him for ſo great an exploit) paſſed through the Land vnto Wallingford and Glouceſter, ſoliciting his Complices for the aide of his ſiſter the Empreſſe. * A man who then liued, holds him, in this bold attempt with ſo ſmall forces, no way inferiour to Iulius Caſar, whom Liuie reports to haue begun his ciuill warre, & to haue ſet himſelfe againſt the whole World, onely with fiue Cohorts of Souldiers.

(20) King Stephen as then lay in ſiege of Marleburgh-Caſtle, but hauing intelligence of this more dangerous an enemy, diſlodged thence, and with all expedition made towards Arundell; whereat the Empreſſe, wanting her Counſellor, was wonderfully perplext, yet wanted not a womans wit to helpe at neede; inſomuch that by the report of Geruaſius, leſt her dignity and right might any way be endammaged, ſhee tooke an oath, that none of theſe the Kings enemies, by her aduice or conſent had entred the Land, but with condition to carry themſelues orderly, without impeachment of the honour and allegiance due to the King; By which policy (to giue it no worſe name) ſhe ſo ſatiſfied king Stephen (whom all do cenſure for too-much credulity and facility towards his foes (that hee cauſed her to be conuayed honourably vnto Briſtow, where ſhee remained the ſpace of two Moneths, and then got thence vnto Wallingford.

(21) Earle Robert in the meane while diſperſed the newes of the Empreſſes approach, vnto whoſe aid ſo many gathered, that the ſame Monke reporteth, no man was able to ſet downe their multitudes in context of Hiſtorie, much leſſe by way of Computation: then beganne (ſaith he) both labour and dolour, which brought the whole Realme to a moſt grieuous diuiſion, and in a maner to an vtter ruine: for thoſe that fauoured the King, what euill ſoeuer could be wrought or imagined, they did againſt them, that tooke part with the Empreſſe: and contrariwiſe, Earle Robert, whoſe power daily encreaſed, tortured with cruelties all thoſe that ſtood for the King; and to augment a more miſchiefe, the Flemings left their owne Countrey, and came ouer by multitudes, like vnto a Company of hunger-ſtarued Wolues, ſeeking to bring the Lands felicitie vnto nothing.

(22) Stephen, whoſe head was now full of troubles, delaid no time to forward his Fortunes, but ſtraightwaies beſieged Maud and her brother in Wallingford-Caſtle; notwithſtanding, wearied with long labour and profiting little, he cauſed a Tower of wood to be there erected, which he ſtrongly fortified with men and munition, and then remooued to the ſiege of Malmesbury. His brother alſo of Wincheſter, a ſtout and politique Prelate indeede, beſtirred all his wilie wittes in Stephens behalfe; for inuiting certaine Noble-men to his Palace at Wincheſter, retained them priſoners, till hee had compelled them there, to reſigne their Caſtles to the King. In the meane while Earle Robert ſubdued and ſpoyled Worceſter: Ralph Painell, in the Empreſſes fauour, burned Nottingham; and Ranulph Earle of Cheſter, joyning in wiſhes with Robert (whoſe daughter he married) ſhewed himſelfe not not vnwilling to annoy King Stephen, though he had receiued great honours at his hands. The Empreſſe herſelfe, the better to ſecure her owne perſon, and to giue acceſſe vnto her fauourites, tooke into Lincolne, where ſhe meant to make her abode, ſtoring the City with all prouiſions neceſſarie.

(23) King Stephen, as vigilant as the other was politique, made ſtraight-waies thitherward, and begirt the Citie with a ſtraite ſiege, where he had ſurpriſed his greateſt Enemie, had ſhe not found meanes thence to eſcape: and ſo poſſeſſing himſelfe of the Citie, ſetled it, and the whole Countrey in very good quiet. Soone after whoſe departure, Ranulph Earle of Cheſter, with his Counteſſe and Brother, comming to Lincolne, to keepe their Chriſtmas; the Citizens knowing the Kings jealouſies, and deſirous to currie-fauour with him, ſent ſecret intelligence, that if he would ſurprize both thoſe Brethren, he had now the fitteſt aduantage: whereto the King giuing eare, came thither with great expedition; and whiles they, thus circumvented, ſtood on their guard in the Caſtle, the Earle eſcaped forth, and went to craue ayde of the Empreſſe, for reſcue of his Wife and Brother whom hee left beſieged. Earle Robert, hearing the newes, and glad of ſo faire an opportunity, ioyned with Ranulph, and they both gathered all their powers both of Welſh and Engliſh, for the releeſe of their friends in Lincolne: where, reſolutely firſt wading through the Riuer, (which parted them from the Kings Armie, and was then deepe) vpon Candlemas day, and yeere of Chriſt Ieſus one thouſand one hundred fortie one, they pitched their Tents, and in the Kings ſight ordered their Battaile: One Squadron whereof, was lead by Earle Ranulph: the Diſherited were the Guiders of another; in the third was Earle Robert himſelfe; and the Welſh-men ſerued for the Wing. Their troupes thus marſhalled, Ranulph appointed in rich Armour, and full of braue reſolution, ſpake thus to his followers, in the preſence of Robert of Gloceſter.
